European Jews urge EC to denounce anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The umbrella organization representing European Jewry is calling on the European Parliament to do more to stem the alarming rise in anti-Semitism from Britain to Lithuania.

The European Parliament ought "to pass a resolution that openly condemns anti-Semitism in general and the latest wave in particular," said Moshe Kantor, president of the European Jewish Congress (EJC). "The European Parliament has a responsibility to condemn these acts because they are phenomena that have no place in 'our modern European community of values.' We are strongly urging the European Parliament to pass a resolution along these lines, to stop stalling because of political reasons, to separate what is happening in the Middle East from what is happening in the streets of Europe."

Moshe Kantor

European Jews have increasingly come under attack, with the number of anti-Semitic incidents in 2009 already half the number for all of 2008. The occurrences range from shouts of "death to the Jews" at anti-Israel rallies to serious physical assaults. The EJC reports that in Antwerp, a home with 12 children was set on fire. No one was hurt in the attack. In Odense, Denmark, a Dane of Palestinian origin shot two Israelis at a shopping mall where they were working, while in Finland, the Green party was accused of anti-Semitism for comparing the Star of David to a swastika. In Florence, a bomb was found at the city's Chabad House, while synagogues in Amsterdam, Arnhem and Haaksbergen, The Netherlands, were subject to arson attempts.

Anti-Semitic incidents in the United Kingdom have been particularly rampant, with 220 occurrences reported from Dec. 27, 2008, to Jan. 19, 2009. They included 10 assaults and 50 anti-Semitic daubings, as well as threats to individual Jews and organizations.

Kantor said the lessons of the Holocaust have not been learned in Europe. "This situation today is worse than it's been in decades," he said in an e-mail interview. "Jews feel extremely unsafe and feel that little is done to prevent this. We have witnessed an alarming rise of anti-Semitism in the last month, due in part to the situation in Gaza. We must not forget these phenomena are against common European values, those that helped establish the European Union. The fight against anti-Semitism in Europe is a constant one. We've made much progress, yet it persists."

Kantor was gratified by the position taken by EU President Hans-Gert Pottering, who expressed solidarity with European Jewry during International Holocaust Remembrance Day on Jan. 27. In addition to "paying homage to all the victims of the Shoah," in a letter to Kantor, Pottering stated: "On this anniversary, we are also called upon to speak out clearly and reject any instances of anti-Semitism and intolerance in our own countries in our own time. The European Parliament has consistently taken a strong stance against racism, xenophobia and anti-Semitism. These are phenomena which have no place in our modern European community of values. They are a threat to our belief in a European Union whose cornerstone is respect for human dignity of each and every human being."

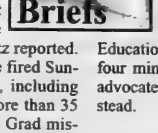
Kantor said that the EU president "cannot force the political groups to pass resolutions, only set the tone. In this light, we are very disappointed with certain political groups in Parliament that have completely sidelined the question, because they consider it to be politically incorrect to mention anti-Semitism in Europe when so many have died in Gaza. To us, this amalgam is not only unnecessary, but conceptually wrong. Jewish individuals, businesses and places of worship in Europe deserve attention and recognition as well."

Kantor said that "parliamentarians and parliamentary groups do not want to be seen as insensitive toward Palestinians by recognizing anti-Semitism in Europe... We completely reject this idea that one can not speak out against anti-Semitism because of fears that it will be offensive to certain people. This notion itself is a major problem."

Israel Briefs

Israel responds to rockets

Israeli air strikes struck several targets in southern Gaza in response to rocket fire on Israel. Monday morning's strikes were aimed at two Hamas outposts, according to the Israel Defence Forces. Palestinian sources said a member of Islamic Jihad was injured and later died. The military denied the report, saying the man didn't sustain his injuries at the time of the attack, Ha'aretz reported. Two Qassam rockets were fired Sunday on Israel from Gaza, including one that hit Ashkelon. More than 35 rockets, mortar shells and Grad missiles have been fired at Israel since Israel and Hamas declared unilateral ceasefires after Israel's Gaza operation. The rocket attacks and responses continued as Arab media reported progress was being made on both an 18-month ceasefire and a prisoner swap for kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.



$162M for new PM's residence

Israel's cabinet approved $162 million to build a new official prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. The design approved Sunday included an official residence, meeting rooms and offices, as well as venues for the Supreme Court and the Knesset. The aim is to save money on renting space throughout the city for offices and on shuttling the prime minister from his residence to his office. Education Minister Yuli Tamir, one of four ministers who rejected the plan, advocated building classrooms instead.

Turkey, Israel mend fences

Some Israeli and Turkish officials said relations remain good after a public falling-out Jan. 29 between the countries' leaders. "We give special importance to our bilateral ties with Israel and we want to preserve ties with that country," Cemil Cicek, Turkey's deputy prime minister, said last week. "We are now looking toward the future." Ha'aretz reported that top officials of both countries were meeting to calm tensions. Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan stormed off stage Jan. 29 at a panel at an economic forum in Davos, Switzerland. He had said during the panel that Israel must deal with Hamas, the terror group that controls Gaza, in the wake of the recent Gaza war, launched after Hamas ended a ceasefire. Israeli President Shimon Peres asked how Turkey would deal with a terror group attacking its people with rockets. Erdogan tried to answer but was cut off by the mediator. He accused Israel of "barbarianism" and left.

Israel to keep its A1 credit rating

Israel is capable of withstanding the recent shocks to its economy – including the Gaza war, a leading credit rater said. In a January report on Israel, Moody's said it won't change its relatively high A1 rating it gave Israel last April.

Canadian wins Masters golf tournament in Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Former Winnipeger Ron Solomon pulled off what he calls an "unexpected" victory in the master's division of the Israel Open, held recently at the Gaash Golf Club.

Solomon, who made aliyah some 2-1/2 years ago, won in the over-50 age group, where he competed against 40 other participants.

"It felt great winning the tournament," Solomon said in an e-mail interview. "Before the tournament, there was a website set up with predictions on how players might finish, and my name wasn't even mentioned, as not many people knew me. Now I'm getting phone calls from people asking me to join them for a game. It seems I've earned some respect in golf circles."

"Although there are some other tournaments [in Israel] throughout the year, this was the big one," Solomon added.

As a result of his victory, Solomon, 57, is currently "playing golf two or three times a week, which is considerably more than before I won the Israeli Open." The Gaash Golf Club is located on Kibbutz Gaash, about 15 kilometres north of Tel Aviv on the Mediterranean Sea.

Solomon, while working as an elementary and high school teacher in Winnipeg, enjoyed golf as a hobby and tried to learn whatever he could about the game. Shortly after moving to Israel, he landed a job teaching the sport to children, ages eight to 17, at the Caesarea Golf & Country Club.

"I haven't really played in many tournaments before, and this was my first one in Israel. The only other tournament I ever won was the club championship at Winnipeg's Glendale Golf and Country Club, but that was back in 1989," he said.

Solomon said he hopes to play for Israel's golf team in the master's division in the Maccabiah Games in July.

"Winning this tournament gives me a good chance to make the team. There are three qualifying rounds to make the team. One was in January, another in February and the third in March or April. These qualifying rounds don't have as much merit in making the Maccabiah team, since the Israel Open was the main qualifying tournament. But I'll practise two or three times a week prior to these qualifying games," Solomon said.

"There are also some international tournaments throughout the year in which I would be interested in playing. If I am fortunate enough to make the Israeli team, I could play in them, as they are generally team events."

Ron Solomon

Solomon noted that he won the Israel Open "after finishing two shots better than the person who finished second," Leslie Ben Amir.

He attributed his victory to "a few key shots in the last nine holes.

"Probably the turning point was on the 145-yard 13th hole. I was three shots behind at that point, and the leader got up and hit his shot 2-1/2 feet from the hole. I hit next and put my ball three feet from the hole. I made my putt for a birdie and he missed his.

"Another key shot was on the 17th hole. We were tied at that point, and I sank a 25-foot birdie putt, which put me up by one shot with only one hole to go. I hit an excellent shot on the 185-yard, par-three 18th hole to clinch the victory," he said.

As a result of his Open victory, Solomon may start offering golf lessons to adults. "But right now, I'm happy teaching kids," he said.

When asked how he celebrated his victory, Solomon answered, "I had a beer with my cousin David, who was walking with me during the last nine holes. Of course, I called my wife Michal and kids to tell them the good news. There was also a very nice banquet that evening where the trophies were presented."

Solomon also said that one of the things he enjoyed about the Israel Open was that "my 11-year-old son, Eytan, was my caddie the first two days of the tournament."

Next year's Israel Open will be played at the newly redone Caesarea golf course, which was designed by legendary course designer Pete Dye. The Maccabiah Games are also scheduled to be played on the Caesarea course.

"That course will prove to be a much tougher challenge to all the golfers than the course at Gaash," Solomon said.

Super Bowl culture takes root in Israel

By STEVE KLEIN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If you had been among Gadi Gadot's 100 guests at his Super Bowl party that ran into early last Monday morning, you might have been surprised by what you heard – Hebrew. The festivities and excitement among the crowd indicate that the culture of American football is taking root in Israel.

"About 80 per cent were [sabras]," said Gadot, referring to native-born Israelis. The party, the sixth in a row he has held, included a broad mix of participants. Some were members of an Internet football fan forum, which is strictly in Hebrew, plus players in the Israel Football League (IFL) and their friends.

The festivities have been held in the same Ramat Hachayal restaurant (in the Tel Aviv area) for the past four years, though Gadot, 48, points out "it's not about the place but the group."

Forum members, who made up about half the party, "know each other from their nicknames but don't know the faces." The party is the one time a year they get to see "how each other looks in real life."

While other get-togethers around the country favoured one team, most notably a Pittsburgh Steeler party in Kfar Sava, the crowd in Ramat Hachayal, according to Gadot, displayed no particular loyalty.

Many leaned toward the Steelers, probably because the AFC champs had more support in Israeli NFL fantasy leagues.

As the game went on, "sympathy for what Arizona accomplished grew," but in the end most were happy to see Pittsburgh win, Gadot said.

Gadot, who is part of IFL management, can't recall how he got attracted to the U.S. sport, only that he found it "a clever game where you need strategy and tactics." He said he wants to promote the culture of the game to show people it's not just a game for television, but a sport they can watch right here in Israel.

Caring from a distance

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

It's a familiar theme. When I speak to a child of one of my patients, he or she will mention the other siblings who live "away."

It is a common phenomenon in North America that we have become increasingly mobile, and families often separate over the years. I am one of those children who have lived far away from my parents and sister most of my life: first during my studies in Scotland, then during my internship and residencies in Boston and Montreal, and then during my four years living in Israel.

When I settled in Toronto, my parents were relieved that they were only a 10- or 12-hour drive away, and about the same distance from my sister, who lived in Chicago.

As each of my parents declined in health over the years, the distance became more burdensome. After my mother's death, my father was alone in Brooklyn and gradually failing. My sister and I did our best to attend to his needs. Ultimately, however, it became clear that a move to be close to one of us was necessary. He chose Chicago.

Since then, my sister has been the "it" sibling assuming the role of primary care provider, and I am the back-seat quarterback, trying to be available for advice and input, as well as periodic social visits and occasional urgent health-related trips.

In one of my clinics, I had two occasions where the "it" daughter expressed frustration at having her distant-but-loving siblings trying to second-guess and often be critical of her decision-making.

In one case, it was a brother and in the other a sister, who, away from the cauldron of challenge, potential conflicts and enormous calls on time and energy, were quite critical – and in one instance dismissive – of the "it" sibling's decisions about care arrangements.

"My sister thinks I'm exaggerating. She doesn't believe mom is at risk living alone and says I should just tell her to stop calling me 10 times a day. She saw her about seven months ago on a weekend visit and thought she was just fine – maybe a little repetitive, but that did not impress her as meaning anything serious. She could not understand that mom would call 10 minutes after a phone conversation and ask the same question, sometimes five times in an hour."

The other complaint I heard was similar: "My brother does not think mom has dementia. He does not like me even to mention the word. He keeps telling me I have to find better ways to cope. I am struggling with my own family, two teenaged children and my husband who has been ill, and my brother and sister are happy to call and be critical of everything I do."

This scenario is very common, and I recall being in situations where as my sister described what she was contending with, I could see myself slipping into my "expert" role and trying to give advice that was, in fact, off base, as I was hundreds of miles away. I learned that when advice was sought, I would give it, but always frame it as an affirmation of who she was, what her commitment and role were, and how being the "it" caregiver, her perspective was the most important one.

In practice, I always try to offer to meet with siblings who are out of town, to help resolve conflict and focus the family's efforts on their parent's primary care provider and treat their sister or brother with respect. Children who live at a distance must find ways to support siblings who are carrying out the family's collective responsibility, especially when they are playing their role in long-distance mode.

ROASTED GREEN BEANS AND CASHEWS

- 2 lbs. green beans, trimmed and halved
- 3/4 c salted roasted cashews, chopped
- 4 medium shallots, chopped
- 2 tblsp extra-virgin olive oil

Preheat oven to 500°F with rack in lower third. Toss green beans with cashews, shallots, oil, and 1/2 tsp each of salt and pepper, then spread evenly in a large oven sheet pan. Roast, stirring occasionally, until green beans are tender and nuts are golden brown, about 25 min. Season with salt and pepper.

Epi on Education

I was recently invited to a very special video conference at Bialik Hebrew Day School at which two scientists at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem spoke to the older grades about the Dead Sea Scrolls. This was preparation for the treat that Toronto will have in June when a rare exhibition of the scrolls will be mounted at the Royal Ontario Museum. Now that I have given three wonderful institutions a plug, let me proceed with the real message of this column.

Seymour Epstein

I was taken by the central motif of the talk, which was to show how the scrolls are but one way to communicate our most precious literature and values in a long chain of media and techniques that we, as a people, have used over the centuries of Jewish life. From early cuneiform in clay to ancient early letters on papyrus, we progressed with new technologies through scrolls on parchment to codices (books), then to printing at the end of the 15th century, ending up for now at something like this website: www.imj.org.il/shrine_center/Isaiah_Scrolling/index.html.

It's precisely because we so valued our texts, and the law and lore within them, that we immediately embraced new media in order to best communicate from one generation to the next and across all geographic borders. One detail of the 15th and 16th centuries is fascinating: printing presented different kinds of challenges to Christianity, Judaism and Islam.

Christians saw the great advantage in moveable type and started to print sacred texts. In fact, the layout of our page of Talmud was designed by Daniel Bomberg, a Christian.

Islam turned its back on printing, deciding that the Qur'an was too holy to be printed by a machine. It continued to write its sacred texts in beautiful calligraphy. While the Qur'an was later printed from whole plates, the first moveable type printing of the Qur'an was in the 20th century.

Jews took an interesting middle path in becoming some of the first printers in Europe while maintaining the sacredness of the Torah by keeping the hand-written scroll for ritual reading in the synagogue. It's yet another illustration of how we both revered the past and respected the future.

Are we taking care of our own?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment are very much alive and well. The invasion of Gaza has made this abundantly clear.

Throngs of articles, videos and statements have been sent back and forth between us, each one worse than the other, reflecting the hateful and vile thoughts of anti-Semites, including comparisons of Israeli activities in Gaza to those of Hitler and his henchmen.

The odious people who write this stuff figure they're hitting us where it hurts.

One example is a response I received to one of my YouTube postings – titled My Enemies: I Am a Jew – in which a man writes: "America is not going to babysit Israel forever. Sooner or later, the Nazi cancer of Israel will be destroyed. Israel's destruction, with God's help, will happen. Death to Israel."

The war in Gaza has brought out the worst in people who abhor us and want to destroy Israel.

The question that needs to be addressed, therefore, is what are we doing as a community to ensure that we're safe, and that every member feels equipped to defend themselves both verbally and physically?

A friend of mine told me that when he was in high school during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, a buddy of his was beaten up after school by thugs yelling "Dirty Jew." Feeling the need to take action, every day after school for weeks, he (my friend) and two of his companions would go to the bus stop where the boy was beaten up and stand guard to make sure such a thing didn't happen again. We were taking care of our own.

I have spoken to many Jews who tell me about days not so long ago when Jewish community members in Toronto, during difficult times, volunteered to watch out for fellow community members and kept an eye on cemeteries and other institutions – a Jewish community watch, if you will.

They tell me that Jews volunteered en masse to walk in the cold of Canadian winter nights to protect us – to take care of our own.

There was once a grassroots movement for self-defence here in Toronto, and an appreciation of what that meant. Over the years, we've institutionalized security so that a handful of Jewish community workers are responsible for liaising with police and dealing with anti-Semites. While they do an excellent job, I believe this has been a mistake. It's not enough, and it reflects the all-too-comfortable position we have adopted as Jews in the Diaspora. Toronto is a relatively safe place to live for Jews, but Gaza reminds us that there's cause for concern, and many opportunities calling out to all of us to pitch in.

In our community of close to 200,000 Jews, we have within us the ability to develop teams of community volunteers who can march hand in hand with our university students (who are definitely on the front lines of anti-Semitism); watch our schools, shuls and cemeteries; learn how to fight, using words or otherwise, and stand at a bus stop early in the morning or late at night if a kid asks us for protection.

I, therefore, ask you to forward me your name and e-mail address if you are interested in being part of such a movement. I ask organizations that have the ability and interest to oversee such Jewish self-defence units to e-mail me and ask for these names. I will forward them to you.

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, the renowned philosopher and Jewish activist, criticized the Jewish people of his generation for being inactive when bold activism was called for. Today, after Gaza, we have the flexibility, ingenuity, resources and strength to take care of our own.

Let's not allow the same to be said about our generation!

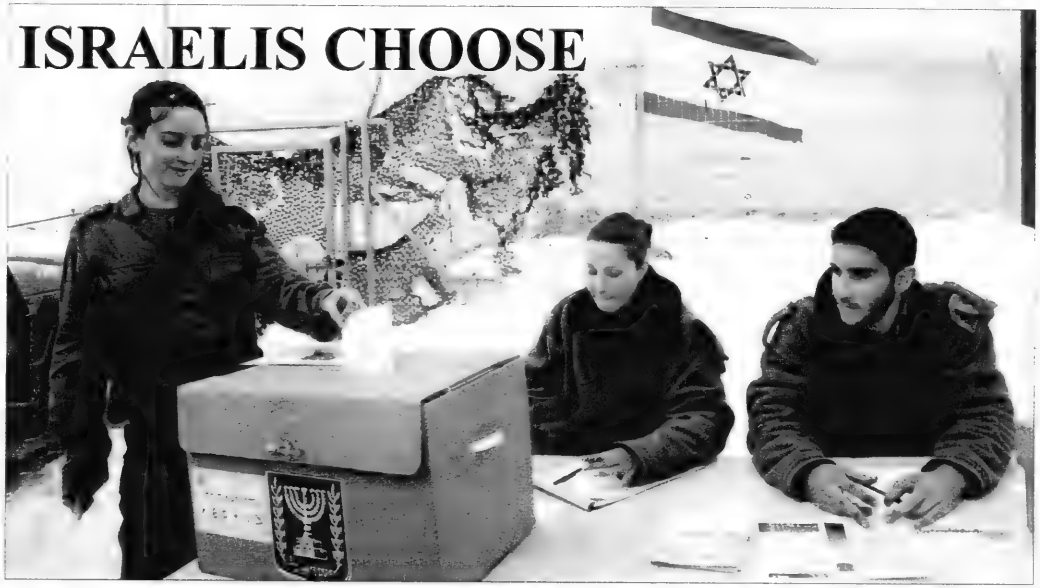
ISRAELIS CHOOSE



Israeli soldiers stationed on Mount Hermon in the Golan Heights voted a day before the public in Israel's general elections. When all the votes were finally tallied, Kadima emerged with a one-seat victory over Likud. As The CJN went to press on Feb. 13, Israeli President Shimon Peres had yet to call upon one of the leading parties to try to form a coalition. Students under 'siege' at York U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

York University has been a hotbed of anti-Israel activity for years, but "the siege" against Jewish students on campus of late is more intense than ever before, says Aaron Rosenberg, co-president of Hasbara at York.

Within the past two weeks, a Jewish student at York received a death threat against him and his family, while another Jewish student was allegedly assaulted by a member of an anti-Israel campus group. In two other incidents, a mob chanting anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist slurs trapped Jewish students inside the campus Hillel lounge, and an anti-Israel rally was held in Vari Hall rotunda.

Most recently, on Feb. 12, the rally against Israel, organized by Students Against Israel Apartheid (SAIA), attracted some 150 to 200 students who urged York President Mamdouh Shoukri to "fully endorse a public forum on an academic boycott of Israel" and to sever all ties with Israel.

The protesters, who were told to dress all in black in solidarity with Gazans, chanted slogans such as "Free, free Palestine" and "Who's campus? Our campus."

Rosenberg said Jewish students are tired of being bullied by anti-Israel groups that intimidate people who don't support them, and they responded by staging a counter-protest that attracted nearly 200 students.

York student Annie Gamliel said the latter group's message was one of peace.

"The rally was huge. It was very well maintained. There was a lot of York security and the Israel side made sure they had one, very clear message," she said.

"We were singing, we were chanting, 'Drown out the hate with peace.' They were saying, 'Who's campus? Our campus.' We were saying, 'Who's campus? Everyone's campus.'"

Rosenberg was happy about how well Jewish campus groups worked together.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Cotler Raises Flags

OTTAWA — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said he hopes the election of a new Bangladeshi prime minister will end the "unjust prosecution" of a pro-Israel Muslim journalist who was jailed for spying after trying to attend a writer's conference in Tel Aviv. In a meeting earlier this month with Bangladesh's high commissioner to Canada, the former justice minister said he's "deeply concerned" by accusations of blasphemy, treason and sedition against Salah Uddin Shoaib Choudhury, who fosters interfaith dialogue among Muslims, Jews and Christians. Choudhury has been in solitary confinement for more than a year and faces the death penalty if convicted, said Cotler, who is Choudhury's international counsel.

WORLD

Police Arrested

CARACAS — Seven police officers were among 11 people arrested for involvement in an attack on a Venezuelan synagogue. One of the arrested men is said to be a guard at the shul. In last month's attack on the Tiferet Israel Sephardi synagogue in Caracas, vandals damaged Torah scrolls and painted epithets such as "death to the Jews" on the shul's walls. A roster of member families was also stolen. Critics say the attack was fuelled by anti-Semitic rhetoric from Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez that grew increasingly strident during Israel's Gaza operation. Chavez broke diplomatic ties with Israel on Jan. 6, during the war, expelling its ambassador and embassy staff.

Church Divests

LONDON — The Church of England divested from the U.S. firm Caterpillar. The move, announced last week, took place in December, the Church said. The announcement said the $3.3-million move was made for purely economic, not political or ethical, reasons, though the Church has long been urged to divest due to the firm's involvement in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. It came just before the Guardian newspaper published a letter from some clergy condemning the Church's "unethical" investment policy. Caterpillar sells bulldozers to Israel that are used in house demolitions in the West Bank and Gaza.

Shul Bomber Jailed

LONDON — A former Al Qaeda member was sentenced to 18 years in jail for his part in the 2002 bombing of a Tunisian shul. A Paris court ruled Feb. 5 that Christian Ganczerski, a German convert to Islam, helped kill 21 people when he gave the signal to bomb an ancient monument and synagogue in Djerba. Most of the dead were European tourists. Prosecutors had asked for a 30-year sentence and tried to show he had ties to senior Al Qaeda terrorists. The brother of the man who rammed himself and a fuel tanker packed with explosives into the Djerba shul also got 12 years in jail for helping carry out the attack.

Reports Denounced

MOSCOW — The head Chabad rabbi of Azerbaijan denounced reports of orchestrated attacks on Jews. Rabbi Meir Bruk said reports by the PanArmenian news agency were an effort to drive a wedge between Israel and Azerbaijan. On Feb. 11, the agency reported that several apartments where Jewish families live in the coastal town of Sumgait had been robbed and their residents attacked.

Al-Jazeera English Coming to Canada?

VANCOUVER — The Canadian managing director of Al-Jazeera's English service says the Qatar-based news channel could be available in this country later this year.

Tony Burman, former editor-in-chief of CBC News, said a Canadian cable firm will soon apply to the CRTC, the broadcast regulator, for permission to carry the channel. He was in Canada last week on a panel marking the 10th anniversary of the University of British Columbia's journalism school, the Vancouver Sun reported.

Burman said it's ironic the service isn't available in Canada, partly for political reasons, when it's available in Israel and interviews Israeli leaders and officials.

Al-Jazeera has been criticized for airing Islamist and virulently anti-Semitic content. Earlier this month, British lawmakers condemned it for broadcasting a controversial Muslim cleric's sermon in Arabic that celebrated the Holocaust and prayed for the killing of all Jews.

Sheik Yusuf al-Quaradawi, who hosts the popular program Shariah and Life on Al-Jazeera's Arabic-language service, described the Shoah as "divine punishment" and prayed to Allah to kill Jews "down to the very last one."

John Whittingdale, head of the House of Commons media select committee, called on Al-Jazeera to apologize and to ban al-Quaradawi from appearing in the future. But the network refused to apologize, claiming it can't control the content of live broadcasts.

Jews Rally

JOHANNESBURG — Israel supporters rallied in Johannesburg in response to an illegal anti-Israel protest. The Feb. 6 anti-Israel rally was held by the Congress of South African Trade Unions and the Palestinian Solidarity Committee outside a Jewish community centre in a densely populated Jewish residential area. Johannesburg City Council had denied the groups permission to hold the rally protesting the South African Jewish community's pro-Israel stance. Some 100 protesters gathered by the centre, where they were countered by 300 members of Jewish groups in an organized counter rally behind the centre's security gate. Police were present to prevent violence. "We draw the line at such demonstrations in our schools and neighbourhoods," said Avrom Krengel, head of the South African Zionist Federation. Several schools closed for safety.

UJA campaign closes with $61 million raised

Finally tally expected to come close to last year's total

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto's 2009 campaign has raised $61 million to date – less than last year's total of $66 million and well short of its $70-million goal.

The amount was announced at last week's UJA campaign closing event, held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

But Howard English, a spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN after the event that organizers expect the final donation tally to come close to or match last year's total.

With the economic downturn, organizers realized that their original goal was unrealistic, English said.

Although no new goal was announced, he added, "we determined that if we could match last year's amount, we'd be doing exceedingly well."

English said that donors from last year who have yet to contribute could make up the shortfall. "In the past, our anticipated total, beyond the official total, has been pretty accurate."

Although he expressed confidence that UJA would reach $66 million, he said that in the event of a shortfall – especially in light of increased needs in the community because of the economy – "our goal is to preserve the core services that we fund, and to ensure that needs are cared for.

"There are some internal cost savings that we're looking at."

Keynote speaker Miri Eisen, an Israeli government spokesperson, thanked audience members for their support of Israel.

"The Jewish world… is an integral part of our own strength," Eisen said.

One hundred years ago

From the editor's desk...

As of this writing, two days after the general election in Israel, every political pundit and commentator of every media outlet in the Diaspora is offering an opinion on the results.

Inter-party (and even intra-party) bargaining and bartering have begun. We must now await the results of this next, somewhat unseemly phase in the Israeli electoral system.

Without new or wiser insights to add than those that have already been written, spoken, shouted or sighed since the balloting, I write this week about an important anniversary for Canadian Jewry that must not go unnoticed.

One hundred years ago this month, the remarkable, brilliant, enigmatic but ultimately tragically fated poet, writer, journalist, editorialist, scholar, social activist A. M. Klein was born.

The late literary figure Miriam Waddington, who collected, studied and annotated the entire body of Klein's poetry, wrote that he was born in Montreal on Feb. 14, 1909. Later records indicated, according to Prof. Zailig Pollock of Trent University, Klein's authoritative biographer, that Klein was born in 1909 in Ratno, a small town in Ukraine, and was brought to Montreal with his family, probably the following year.

The mist surrounding his place of birth matches somewhat the mist regarding the latter period of his life. For reasons that are still not clear, Klein fell into a deep depression in the mid-1950s that silenced his pen until his death in 1972.

But for a quarter century, Klein was the most inspiring writer and thinker among Canadian Jewry.

He lived his entire life in Montreal, chronicling, through elegant prose and fine poetry, Jewish life there and its many intersections with the people and folkways of Quebec. His volume of poems, The Rocking Chair and Other Poems, received the Governor-General's prize in 1948.

Nearly four decades after his death, Klein is remembered today mostly among literary circles and especially appreciated for his affinity for and mastery of language. "Skilful" hardly describes Klein's deft ability to shape and create images through his inventive yet devoted use of words. He was accomplished in English, Hebrew, French and Latin.

But the main reason I make note of the anniversary is to recall or introduce to readers that Klein was a courageous, unflinching champion on behalf of the Jewish people and our causes. He was, in short, an example of the type of bold, spirited, but thoughtful defender of Jews and the Jewish cause that we need today.

In the magisterial collection of Klein essays and editorials (A.M. Klein, Beyond Sambation, edited by M.W. Steinberg and Usher Caplan, University of Toronto Press, 1982) Steinberg wrote that Klein's greatest journalistic concern "was over the increasing manifestation of anti-Semitism, discriminatory and violent, in eastern and central Europe... He appealed to the moral conscience of western nations and was deeply outraged at the relative indifference shown by the so-called liberal democratic nations of the western world to the plight of the victims... The moral apathy of the world at large distressed him."

Klein was also a very proud and impassioned elucidator of Jewish values and traditions.

Among the many examples of this aspect of his soul, I reproduce one of the poems that he wrote in the early 1940s, called Heirloom.

My father bequeathed me no wide estates;
No keys and ledgers were my heritage;
Only some holy books with yahrzeit dates
Writ mournfully upon a blank front page -

Books of the Baal Shem Tov, and of his wonders;
Pamphlets upon the devil and his crew;
Prayers against road demons, witches, thunders;
And sundry other tomes for a good Jew.

Beautiful: though no pictures on them, save
The scorpion crawling on a printed track;
The Virgin floating on a scriptural wave;
Square letters twinkling in the Zodiac.

The tallow stains of midnight liturgy -
These are my coat of arms, and thus unfold
My noble lineage, my proud ancestry!

And my tears, too, have stained this heir-loomed ground,
When reading in these treatises some weird
Miracle, I turned a leaf and found
A white hair fallen from my father's beard.

The 100th anniversary of the birth of A. M. Klein is an important occasion for the Jews of Canada. In recalling the man and reflecting upon his work on behalf of his people, we are reminded of what our own work must be today.

UJA says thank you to volunteers at Campaign closing

Campaign 2009 coming close to last year's record-breaking total

By Daniel Horowitz

More than 250 members of Toronto's Jewish community made their way to Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue last week as United Jewish Appeal celebrated the close of its annual campaign.

The evening gave campaign organizers an opportunity to thank the community for supporting UJA's Campaign 2009, while paying tribute to the more than 1,000 committed volunteers who lent their talents to the campaign in a variety of ways.

Despite these challenging economic times, the campaign - chaired by Fran Sonshine and Henry Wolfond - has already reached $61 million, and when the final numbers are in for the year, UJA expects to come very close to last year's record-breaking total of $66 million.

Prominent Israeli spokesperson, Colonel Miri Eisin addresses the crowd.

Those attending the celebration received an insider's perspective from retired IDF Colonel and prominent Israeli spokesperson Miri Eisin, who shared her views on the Gaza conflict, the results of the Israeli election, and how Barack Obama's presidency will affect the United States' relationship with Israel.

Entertainment was provided by Dr. Arthur Benjamin, the man Reader's Digest calls America's best math whiz.

"When Henry and I first took the reigns last year at this time, we had no idea what the future held," Sonshine told the audience. "We couldn't have known that we would be faced with a worldwide economic crisis, or that Israel would retaliate after eight years of Hamas rocket attacks. And, we also couldn't have known what a powerful and rewarding experience this year would turn out to be."

"With all of this happening in the world around us, our community came together like never before," said Wolfond. "As the economy declined, the people who rely on UJA dollars the most needed your support more than ever, and you were there."

A number of UJA volunteers received awards over the course of the evening, including father and son telethon veterans Donald and Richard Bennett who, together, raised more than $1.5 million by simply letting their fingers do the walking.

Their talents, combined with the direction of Telethons chair David Weinberg and hundreds of volunteers, helped telethons raise almost $4.8 million towards Campaign 2009, an impressive 29 percent increase over last year's telethon results.

Recipients of the Platinum Dialer award, father and son telethon team Richard (l) and Donald Bennett display their winning technique.

Community leaders Howard Sokolowski and Fred Waks received special mention for their roles as catalysts of UJA's Israel@60 Challenge Fund. As driving forces behind securing many of the 25 Challenge Fund gifts, Campaign 2009 brought in an extra $1.5 million. Just as importantly, more than 130 increased gifts from other donors qualified for matching from the total Challenge Fund pool of $1.5 million, for a net effect of $3 million.

"Few chairs and campaign leaders, in their respective roles, have been so involved, so active, and so personally dedicated to the success of the campaign as Fran, Henry, Women's Campaign & Advocacy chair Lisa Draper, and the chair of campaign operations, Sherry Firestone," said UJA Federation Board chair David Koschitzky. "As mentioned, this year has seen its share of highs and lows, but no matter what came their way, these leaders faced it head on and prevailed."

Koschitzky went on to introduce the incoming chairs of Campaign 2010, Debbie Kimel and Ken Tanenbaum, as well as Andrea Cohen, incoming chair of Women's Campaign and Lisa Draper as incoming chair of campaign operations.

"What a year and what a great campaign," reflected Ted Sokolsky, UJA president and CEO. "Led by the passionate and tireless efforts of Fran Sonshine, Henry Wolfond, Lisa Draper and Sherry Firestone, the message resonated within Jewish Toronto that when times are tough, those who rely on UJA Federation and our partner agencies need us more than ever. I couldn't be prouder of our supporters across this great community, our volunteers, and our entire campaign leadership."

High-tech Israeli companies make pitch to banking sector

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There was a time when the Israeli trade commissioner had to spend his time educating Canadian businesspeople about the achievements and potential of Israeli industry, particularly its high-tech sector.

Then, to complicate matters, it turned out that Israeli industry wasn't particularly focused on doing business in Canada.

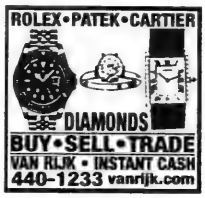
Jonathan Levy

Bringing the two sides together has been a challenge, but there appears to be momentum building in which the two sides increasingly see each other as viable – and profitable – business partners.

Building on that developing relationship, the Israel Economic Mission, which is part of the consulate in Toronto, is hosting a "networking reception" on Feb. 23 and 24 that will bring together 11 Israeli telecom and software companies with Canadian banks, insurance companies, IT businesses and law firms. The event will be held at the Toronto Stock Exchange Gallery and the Ontario Investment & Trade Centre.

Jonathan Levy, Israel's Toronto-based trade commissioner and consul for economic affairs, said the conference will highlight Israeli high-tech solutions for financial institutions.

"We expect something good to come out of this. When you prepare well and bring together the right people from both sides and bring new solutions to the Canadian market to address issues faced here, like compliance, fraud, cutting costs or improving client services, it can be a win-win situation," he said.



Israeli companies are world leaders in a number of areas, while at the same time, "we realize Toronto is an important financial centre. Canada has a successful banking sector, a sector that has been praised for its handling of the financial crisis. They haven't been exposed to Israeli IT solutions."

Financial service industries' "reliance on computer technology is critical, and we want to showcase Israeli solutions that are relevant to banks in Canada," Levy said.

Among the Israeli participants are Actimize, which provides software solutions to protect against money laundering and fraud; Correlsense, which tracks financial transactions; and PerSay Ltd., which is a leader in biometric products used to verify users' identities.

IBM, the giant American technology company, is co-sponsoring the conference. IBM has had a presence in Israel for decades, Levy said, and along with Motorola, it was one of the earliest western companies to see the potential for developing high-tech products in the Jewish state. One of its units identifies promising technological innovations that can be fitted into IBM platforms. Through arrangements with the Israeli partners, it offers those solutions to its vast client base, he said.

Other conference sponsors include the Toronto Stock Exchange, which is eager to list Israeli companies, as well the law firm Fraser Milner Casgrain and Cosmopolitan Toronto Centre.

Levy expects senior people from Canadian banks to attend. "We've built relationships with the banks. We have an advisory board that consists of IT specialists within the financial community in Canada who work with us to realize this initiative."

Last year, the economic mission identified three sectors on which to focus: information technology (IT) and telecom, clean tech and life sciences. To bring Israeli accomplishments in these fields to the attention of Canadian businesses, the mission undertook a number of initiatives. It co-sponsored a joint Ontario/Israeli clean tech workshop; it took part in Globe 2008, Canada's largest environmental business exhibition; it brought 10 Israeli companies to the Canadian Telecom Summit.

Some of these efforts have borne fruit. Waterloo, Ont.-based Research In Motion (RIM) now applies an Israeli solution to permit its technicians to remotely test electronic devices. Telus employs a system developed by MCE Systems that permits the simple transfer of data, such as address books, from one cellular device to another; and RIM's BlackBerry employs a downloadable application called Worldmate that was developed in Israel.

Canadians are increasingly aware of the quality of high-tech products being developed in Israel, Levy said. Additionally, Israeli firms are looking to Canada to diversify their businesses in the current turbulent financial climate.

"Canada has been off the map for Israeli companies, which concentrated on the United States, Europe and, currently, Southeast Asia. They are learning that Canada is a place of opportunity," Levy said.

Participation was capped at 11 Israeli companies. Others have been turned away.

"It's not a one-time thing," he said. "If it's successful, and I know it's going to be successful, we'll continue in the future with events that highlight Israeli high-tech solutions that are relevant to Canada."

Eisen addresses challenges facing new government

Israel has grown and is thriving despite a lack of natural assets such as water, oil, diamonds or coal, and despite having "fought wars that we do not want to fight," she said.

Following last week's election, which was held the day before the Toronto event, Eisen said the three main challenges facing Israel's new government are Iran, the Palestinians and "the future of our domestic social fabric," an issue evident in increased socio-economic gaps.

The retired Israel Defence Forces colonel – who was Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's foreign media adviser until December 2007, and more recently was a senior government spokesperson during Israel's operation in Gaza – said that until 1980, Israel had the smallest gap in the western world between rich and poor, but today it has the largest.

As well, she added, there is a growing gap between Jewish Israelis, who make up 75 per cent of Israel's population, and its Arab Muslims, who form 20 per cent.

She noted that members of the latter group don't call themselves Israeli Arabs. Rather, they consider themselves Palestinian Arabs who have Israeli citizenship.

A third social issue that Eisen raised is the growing gap between Israel's haredi Jews and the 80 per cent of Israeli Jews who are secular, or as she put it, "traditional, non-practising Jews... the synagogue they don't go to is the Orthodox one."

"We need to face these gaps," said Eisen, who made aliyah with her family from California at age eight in 1971. "We're trying to address it on many levels."

Eisen stressed repeatedly that Israel is "modern, western, Middle Eastern, Jewish and a democracy," and that each of those aspects is significant in describing it accurately.

"Most countries would take these gaps and have a pretty full agenda," she said, but Israel also faces "two challenges that are always there and that are not elephants in the room, because we talk about them."

Iran's government has "led the extreme ideology which openly calls for the annihilation of the 'Jewish entity'... and it is trying to achieve nuclear capability. You don't have to be a rocket scientist to put two and two together," Eisen said.

Closer to home, the Palestinian issue needs to be resolved in a way that will ensure Israel remains both a Jewish state and a democracy, she added. "There was a reason we were established as a Jewish state on May 14, 1948... We need, and we yearn for, a resolution with the Palestinians."

A voting result whose meaning we don't know

Some 65 per cent of eligible Israeli voters cast ballots in the national election last week. By comparison, five months ago in the Canadian elections for Parliament, 59 per cent of eligible voters cast ballots. It was the lowest turnout ever in a Canadian federal election. In November, 61 per cent of eligible American voters found their way to the voting booths in the general election. It was the highest voter showing in the U.S. in 40 years.

By any measure, Israel's democracy is vibrant and vigorous. Israelis are very serious about their politics. They are very fond of parties – a dozen parties elected members to the Knesset last week – but they're very hard on their politicians. They are prepared to travel very far with them through very rough terrain and on every reasonable road, although too often, as we have seen lately and as Israelis have learned, the high road is not where politicians always try to lead them.

But it's hard to know which road and with whom Israelis will travel as a result of last week's election.

The top two parties – Kadima led by Tzipi Livni and Likud led by Benjamin Netanyahu – essentially tied in the number of members each will place in the Knesset, with 28 and 27 respectively. The third-largest party in the chamber will be Yisrael Beiteinu, led by Avigdor Lieberman with 15 members. The fourth-largest party, Labor, led by Ehud Barak, won 13 seats. The fractured line of the remaining eight parties divided the rest of the 37 Knesset seats, from Shas with 11 to Habayit Hayehudi (the Jewish Home), which won three seats.

The next few weeks in Israeli public life will now become a form of daily in-camera shopping, in which offers and bids among potential coalition partners will be rejected or accepted and immediately communicated on camera to an awaiting, but cynical, public.

If it is not presumptuous for a Jew in the Diaspora to suggest, the greatest governmental priority for the State of Israel at this moment in its and in Jewish history is solidity, stability and unity of purpose. And if it is not further presumptuous for a Jew in the Diaspora to suggest, the most effective way to achieve such stability is by a coalition of the three "centrist" parties whose combined Knesset membership would produce an assured majority.

The first order of legislative business for this stable alliance should then be meaningful electoral reform that would forever ensure the ability of future governments in the Knesset to govern and make sound national policy for the benefit of the broad Israeli electorate without special deference to the narrower interests embodied in small, power-wielding parties.

Despite the hodge-podge result last week in Israel whose meaning we don't yet know, we congratulate the Israeli voters for so effusively cherishing and embracing what we do, too: democracy.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israel's problems with human rights stem from its control of the West Bank and Gaza, as well as its policy of establishing settlements there, the U.S. State Department said in its annual report on human rights. It added that while Arabs living in Israel have equal rights under the law, they nevertheless feel powerless and alienated.

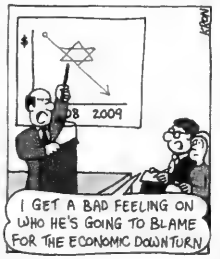
Rejection of Yossi Fackenheim's conversion

I was appalled by the article on the rejection of Yossi Fackenheim's conversion by the Jerusalem Rabbinic Court ("Israeli rabbi rejects Toronto conversion," CJN, Feb. 5). This is especially offensive, since Yossi is the son of Emil Fackenheim, who was one the greatest Jewish scholars of the 20th century. But it raises an even more significant issue as background to this ruling – namely that Jewish life is being controlled by the haredi segment of the community. That control is demonstrated by the recent controversy over conversion that was imposed by the Israeli rabbinate covering the rest of world Jewry – an imposition that would nullify the conversions of thousands of other individuals going back many years, as is the case with Yossi.



Here I hark back to the two letters written by Orthodox rabbis in the Jan. 29 issue of CJN, criticizing Rabbi Dov Marmur's article of Dec. 18 ("Say no to the haredim!"). While taking Rabbi Marmur to task over some of his comments, Rabbi Avi Shafran of Agudath Israel of America goes on to state that "we Orthodox cherish all our fellow Jews," but that is conditioned by the "Divine mandate to which all of us are heir." Thus other Jews are just not Jews unless they conform to Rabbi Shafran's criteria.

It's time that Rabbi Shafran and his supporters recognize that Yossi Fackenheim and Rabbi Marmur are just as Jewish as they are. We live in the modern age, when diversity of outlook is essential if the Jewish people are to survive. Let us take that circumstance seriously and allow all our fellow Jews to express their loyalty to their Jewishness as they see fit, and not according to the particular interpretation that the haredim wish to impose on others.

McGill anti-Israel motion

Kol hakavod to McGill University's Jewish and gentile students who did what was right at the Students' Society of McGill University (SSMU) General Assembly (GA) on Feb. 5 ("Gaza fallout hits Canadian universities: McGill defers motion," CJN, Feb. 12). In a typical propaganda move by those who seek to demonize Israel, a resolution was put forward to the GA to condemn the bombing of schools in Gaza and to condemn Israel for preventing Palestinians from leaving Gaza. For the record, the schools were attacked to destroy rocket factories, and the travel restriction aims to impede the import and export of arms and terrorists. Of course, none of Israel's legitimate security concerns were in the "non-political" resolution.

I was extremely proud to see 450 Israel-supporting students in McGill's Shatner building. Even more impressive was their determination to stick it out until an hour after the event was supposed to be done, despite not knowing initially whether we were in the majority or waiting for an unwinnable vote, and despite biased event management by a SSMU executive who ignored an obvious majority of "no" ballots held up against the anti-Israel resolution.

To all those who helped organize Israel's supporters to show up and make their voices heard, thank you. It helps myself and others feel comfortable and secure on McGill's campuses.

Kellogg program

The Kellogg Management Education for Jewish Leaders program also included the executive directors of three Toronto congregations, because rabbis and administrators work together as a team to advance the overall plans for a synagogue community ("Rabbis hone business skills to deal with changing times," CJN, Jan. 1). Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, Rabbi Michael Dolgin and I were joined by Rayner Conway, executive director of Temple Sinai; Sheldon Maerov, executive director of Beth Tzedec Congregation, and Jessica Pelt, executive director of Shaarei Shomayim.

Plans for the next session of the Kellogg program, from Nov. 29 to Dec. 3, with a new cohort of rabbis and executive directors, are underway. Interested rabbis and executive directors may contact me for more information by calling 416-781-3514, ext. 228.

Perspectives

Israeli election brings unclear result

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Although all the votes have been counted, it was still not clear (as of The CJN's deadline), who really won the Israeli election.

Tzipi Livni's Kadima emerged as the largest single party, but the right-wing parliamentary bloc, led by Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu, captured the majority of the Knesset seats. Kadima appears to have won 28 seats to the Likud's 27, but altogether the right-wing and religious bloc captured 65 seats in the 120-member Knesset.

At post-election parties Feb. 10, both sides claimed victory.

Indeed, given the mixed result, both Livni and Netanyahu have a chance to become Israel's next prime minister. Like two poker players in a high-stakes game, it could depend on who blinks first.

The strength in Netanyahu's hand is that he has the votes to form a coalition with the hawks, at least some of whom Livni needs to form one made up mostly of doves. The snag for Netanyahu is that he desperately does not want to form a narrow right-wing government that would be isolated on the international stage.

Livni's strength is in the moral victory of her party having won the most seats and the fact that Israel's president, who has the role of designating who gets the first crack at forming a government, almost always gives the leader of the largest party the initial opportunity.

Unfortunately for Livni, the law clearly states that the task should be conferred on the Knesset member with the best chance of success. To determine who that may be, the president is supposed to consult with all the parties represented in parliament. If Netanyahu can keep his bloc together, a majority will recommend him to President Shimon Peres in consultations slated for this week.

Still, the game is far from over.

Livni can pressure Netanyahu by refusing to take part in any government he leads, leaving him only with the right-wingers. Netanyahu can pressure Livni by refusing to join a national unity government she leads, denying her a working majority in parliament. Both sides want a national unity government that cuts across the right-left divide. The standoff is over who leads it.

Yisrael Beiteinu's Avigdor Lieberman could be holding the ace.

With 15 seats, Yisrael Beiteinu is now the third-largest party in the Knesset, ahead of Labor, which won only 13.

Kadima supporters celebrate party's narrow victory. Will the celebration be short-lived though? [Israeli photo]

Although normally counted in the right-wing bloc because of his hard line against terror and harsh statements on Israeli Arabs, Lieberman says he is keeping his options open.

Indeed, on some issues Lieberman could find common ground with Livni. For example, both may favour changing the electoral system and introducing a form of civil marriage in Israel – issues that resonate powerfully among Lieberman's heavily Russian immigrant support base. Lieberman could get more on these issues from Livni, who has no fealty to the religious parties, than from Netanyahu, who is committed to including the Orthodox Shas party in his government.

Shas is adamantly opposed both to electoral reform and civil marriage, which would end exclusive Orthodox religious control over marriage in Israel. During the campaign, Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef described casting a ballot for Lieberman as "a vote for the devil." In his election night speech, Lieberman vowed to get even.

It was significant that Livni's first informal coalition meeting last Wednesday was held with Lieberman. A few hours later, however, the Yisrael Beiteinu leader met with Netanyahu.

When push comes to shove, Lieberman probably would find it difficult to defect from the right-wing bloc to Livni's camp. Most pundits believe that the show of keeping his options open is merely a tactical ploy for Lieberman to get more from Netanyahu – possibly the post of defense minister – in return for eventually supporting the Likud leader. Indeed, Lieberman makes no secret of the fact that he feels part of the "national camp," and that all things being equal, his clear preference would be for a right-wing government.

Another question mark over Lieberman is the fact that he is being investigated on serious fraud allegations. A ban on his serving in certain ministries could complicate coalition negotiations.

So what are the some of the coalition options?

• A narrow right-wing government led by Netanyahu and comprising Likud, Yisrael Beiteinu, Shas, United Torah Judaism, National Union and Jewish Home. This 65-seat coalition would be a stable government, but would not give Netanyahu room to manoeuvre either on the Palestinian or Syrian peace tracks, and likely would be seen by the international community, including the new U.S. administration, as intransigent.

• Lieberman throws his support to Livni, who is able to bring Likud on board for an emergency national unity government for a fixed time period comprising Kadima, Yisrael Beiteinu, Likud and Labor – a total of 83 seats – dedicated to one goal: changing the electoral system. Livni, Netanyahu, Lieberman and Labor's Ehud Barak all said that the uncertain election results have underscored the need for reform.

• Livni blinks first and agrees to serve in a Netanyahu-led national unity government consisting of Likud, Kadima, Yisrael Beiteinu, Shas and the religious National Home Party – 83 seats.

• Netanyahu blinks first and agrees to serve in a similar government but with rotation of the prime minister – Livni for two years and then Netanyahu for two years. This is the compromise many pundits think may emerge. It gives Livni a chance to be prime minister and allows Netanyahu to head a government with a degree of peacemaking leeway and greater international legitimacy. This was the model adopted in 1984 by Shimon Peres, then head of the Labor Party, and Likud's Yitzhak Shamir. The difference then was that the two blocs, centre-left and religious-right, were actually tied at 60-60.

Both Livni and Netanyahu would like to bring Labor into a governing constellation, with Barak as defence minister, given the huge regional challenges Israel faces, especially the Iranian nuclear threat. But because of Labor's poor showing in the elections, the predominant feeling within Labor is that the party should stay in opposition to rebuild.

Given these unprecedented election results, will Israel's leaders be able to build a coalition to meet the country's complex needs – a looming Iranian nuclear threat, terrorist groups armed with rockets on its northern and southern borders, and a potentially crippling economic crisis? Or will they have to agree on terms for changing the electoral system first?

What Livni and Netanyahu do in the next little while could be crucial not only for the short-term, but for Israel's long-term well-being.

Reason for embarrassment

The buildings on the corners of a busy intersection in central Jerusalem have Canadian connections. On one side, the hotel and the shopping mall were designed by the Israeli-Canadian architect Moshe Safdie.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The building opposite, currently under construction, will resurrect a famous hotel. It's said to be financed by Canadians.

Soon the fourth corner will also have a link to Canada, for its designer is the Canadian-born Frank Gehry. The site has been in the news since the Jerusalem municipality granted it to the Simon Wiesenthal Center for its proposed museum of tolerance. As part of the site is a disused Muslim cemetery, several organizations have protested the choice of venue. However, last October, Israel's Supreme Court allowed the project to go ahead.

One of those in favour of the museum but opposed to its erection on the site is Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the North American Union for Reform Judaism.

He writes: "While winning the legal argument, Wiesenthal has lost the moral one. What is legally permissible may be ethically questionable and religiously offensive. Indeed, there is something perverse and ironic about building a monument to tolerance that will be a permanent source of tension in the region and that undermines mutual respect and trust that tolerance requires."

The Wiesenthal Center has been in existence for more than 30 years, with offices in several cities, including Toronto. Its aim is to teach about the Holocaust, fight anti-Semitism and promote tolerance. Its Museum of Tolerance in Los Angeles has earned wide acclaim.

The Center's founder and dean, Rabbi Marvin Hier, has pointed to the legality of the Jerusalem site and stressed the lofty purpose of the enterprise. He has written that human remains found there will be treated with the utmost respect.

Yet Rabbi Yoffie speaks for many of us, for there's something provocative about the project. True, the Muslim Religious Council has ruled that this is an abandoned site, on which building is permitted, and the person who alerted the public may be a notorious anti-Semite and Hamas supporter. But to dismiss others who object, in Rabbi Yoffie's paraphrase, as "Israel bashers and left-wing fanatics" is to engage in intolerant rhetoric that negates the very essence of tolerance.

Though Rabbi Hier cites many supporters – including Canadian MP and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler – there are others who strongly disapprove of the choice of venue. Among them is Prof. Yehoshua Ben-Arieh, a former rector of Hebrew University and an expert on the geographical history of Jerusalem. He's reported to have said that building the museum will cause long-term damage to Muslim-Jewish relations.

We can't stop the building, but we have reason to be embarrassed about it.

Sport a scarf for Israel

At university and college campuses across, students rush to their classes, bundled up head to toe in boots, jackets and, in some cases, a very special scarf.

Mahla Shapiro, a student in her second semester at Emily Carr University of Art and Design, has designed a scarf specifically to raise awareness of Israel on Canadian campuses.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

Shapiro, who took a year off university to study Jewish religion and philosophy in Jerusalem, is passionate about Israel and Jewish advocacy. The idea for the scarf came to her when she realized that something needed to be done about what she described as "a university campus with little care or understanding of the situation in the Middle East."

Deciding on how to raise awareness and support of Israel on her campus wasn't easy. She explained why she opted to design a scarf instead of doing something more traditional.

"I felt flyers get thrown out, and T-shirts are worn only once in public and then to bed, as many feel embarrassed walking on campus two days in a row in the same shirt, but a scarf is ideal. People feel comfortable wearing a scarf every day.

"The weather at the moment calls for a scarf, whether you live in Toronto, Montreal, Halifax or Vancouver, and most importantly, the scarf is worn on the outside to keep warm. It could act as a conversation starter on buses and spark discussion among others on campus or walking throughout urban cities."

Although Shapiro is based in Vancouver, there has been interest in the scarves from all over Canada. They cost $18 each, which mostly covers production costs. Any proceeds will go to Israeli charities.

To get distribution up and running, Shapiro had to get help from Jewish organizations. She explained the process of getting started: "I began working, drawing drafts, and meeting with representatives of different organizations, [such as] Hillel UBC and NCSY Vancouver." With the help of these organizations, the scarves are poised to be hot sellers across Canada.

The Emily Carr student has used the scarf to combine her two passions, Israel and art. And because she considers the scarf to be an important project, she doesn't complain about the many hours of time that she put in designing it, or the increase in her phone bill from networking all over Canada to spread her message.

She said the hardest thing for her wasn't the work, it was deciding what would appear on the scarf, and especially which quotations would have the most prominence and what would have to be left out.

She worked with rabbis and teachers in Israel to learn what type of things could be written or depicted on the scarf according to Jewish law.

But the scarf has more than just words. It also has pictures and designs that relate to Judaism and the Jewish struggle.

The scarf comes on the heels of a new fashion trend: keffiyahs have swept campuses and streets across Canada. Many of them are sold in support of the Palestinians, and now there is a viable option for those who want to sport their own political affiliations in their everyday lives. We have seen the little support that Israel has garnered in the public sphere. You might say that pro-Israel activists face a frigid climate, and this scarf can help them battle the cold conditions.

For people who want to find out more about getting their own scarves, Shapiro has set up a Facebook group called "Scarf In Support of Israel." You can reach her there, and you can proudly support Israel in the cold Canadian winter.

So stay bundled up, and don't forget your scarf.

Amnesia abounds, on all sides

Here we go again. Amnesia abounds. The same stories are repeated over and over. The same self-professed sagas of victimhood are perpetuated ad nauseam for more than 60 years. The same disinformation gushes forth from the twin fountainheads of the Israeli and Palestinian propaganda machines. The same sense endures that this conflict, amid the tragedies in Darfur and Congo today as much as those of Rwanda and Serbia in years gone by, deserves the world's constant attention.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

What more is there to say? The same articles are published the world over, lamenting the moral bankruptcy implicit in the latest violence perpetuated by both sides and latent in all of their interactions for the past 60 years.

The amnesia is palpable on both sides. Only the other's missteps are remembered, never one's own. And the result of such a process – endless turmoil undisturbed by societal self-reflection – plagues both peoples.

Is the collective Israeli consciousness so myopic that the tough lessons from the Second Lebanon War in 2006 are already inaccessible?

Just one year ago, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni nearly ousted Prime Minister Ehud Olmert for his mishandling of that war. And yet, in the run-up to last week's election, there she was, making the rounds of the American news media explaining why Israel had to act, this time against Hamas.

There was no acknowledgement of the similarities in context between the wars, and no recognition of the dangers to Gazan innocents along the same lines as those faced by Lebanese civilians, and no concern about creating heroes out of Mohammed Deif or Ismail Haniyeh in Gaza, the way Israel did with Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah in Lebanon.

Speaking of Lebanon, is Nasrallah too busy in his pulpit inveighing against the misdeeds of the Zionist regime and the Egyptian-assisted blockade of Gaza to recall that his country has kept – read: jailed – generations of Palestinians in refugee camps?

The moral outrage that has poured forth from Jordanian Palestinian sympathizers is no less hypocritical: few countries have been so historically apathetic toward a refugee problem so close to home as Jordan. In the 1970s, Jordan killed tens of thousands of Palestinians in an attempt to control Palestinian nationalist groups inside its borders and has since adhered to a policy of keeping quiet on the issue of Palestinian rights within Jordan.

Egypt, too, is hindered by this ubiquitous historical amnesia. President Hosni Mubarak walks a thin line. He has maintained the peace brokered between Israel and former president Anwar Sadat while simultaneously fostering a poisonously anti-Israel social climate in the media. State-sponsored media decry the evils of Israel, while no space is given to discussing Israel as anything but an enemy.

A question crystallizes, one that's pressing and puzzling: why is the self-reflective gaze so difficult to attain?

This goes well beyond the platitude that one man's freedom fighter is another's terrorist. Why is historical amnesia so common and, more importantly, how do we shatter its effect, which brings only others' transgressions into focus?

Well, it has a lot to do with when you start the clock. Take the latest war in Gaza for example: both Israel and Hamas claim that the other instigated the violence. If you begin after a rocket attack on an Israeli town, the actions of the Israel Defence Forces fit entirely within a reality of trepidation over terrorist violence. If, however, you begin one week before the military strikes started, when the fragile ceasefire frayed and Israel cut off all entry into Gaza – including supplies of food, fuel and other humanitarian necessities – then the actions of Hamas fit a bunker mentality of a beleaguered and besieged populace.

Or you can go back six months, to when Israel simultaneously planned this incursion on the one hand while it agreed to the ceasefire on the other.

Let the amnesia begin.

It would be a disgrace to those who were killed in Gaza if their memories were appropriated to call for more violence – if the cycle of amnesia were to continue and their deaths used as provocations and justifications for continued bloodshed and the deaths of others.

Only by breaking down the amnesia narrative that feeds the divide and cripples the region can the dead be honoured.

The historical amnesia can only be dislodged by a little soul-searching on the part of each nation. The pertinent question, then, is when do we start the clock? How far back we go determines much about how we view the conflict. This question is not currently being asked, but it's desperately important for any resolution.

The Kirshner File

Election plunges Israel into uncertainty

Confounding the predictions of pollsters, Tzipi Livni's centrist Kadima party won the greatest number of Knesset seats in last week's general election in Israel, the fifth in a decade.

In one of the closest contested elections in memory, Kadima narrowly defeated Benjamin Netanyahu's right-wing Likud party by a one-seat margin. Both sides, however, declared victory, consigning Israel to a period of political limbo.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

This was not the outcome observers expected. On the eve of the Feb. 10 election, public opinion surveys indicated that Netanyahu would defeat Livni – the foreign minister in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's lame-duck government – by a four-seat margin.

Nonetheless, Netanyahu, the former prime minister, has a better chance of forming the next government because the rightist bloc in parliament, known as the National Camp, commands more than 60 seats in the 120-seat chamber, while the centre-left bloc can only muster about 50-plus seats, assuming that Israeli Arab seats are also included. (Historically, Israeli Arab members of the Knesset from purely Arab parties have been excluded from Israeli governments).

It will fall to Israel's president, Shimon Peres, a member of Kadima, to decide which candidate can cobble together a coalition government, the only kind Israel has ever had.

Last year, after Olmert tendered his resignation, Livni tried unsuccessfully to form a government. If the past is any guide, Israelis will have to endure weeks of uncertainty to find out who their prime minister will be. The prime ministerial selection process, a classic example of unbridled horse-trading that has soured many Israelis on politics, is extremely time-consuming.

In the meantime, Olmert, his reputation sullied by a series of scandals, will stay on as caretaker prime minister – free to negotiate yet another ceasefire with Hamas following the recent three-week war in the Gaza Strip, and free to try to wrest Gilad Schalit – the Israeli soldier who has been held in Gaza since his abduction in the summer of 2006 – from captivity.

The wild card, the possible king maker who may hold the balance of power right now, is Avigdor Lieberman, whose far- right Yisrael Beitenu party, with 15 seats, has become the third-largest party in the Knesset, just ahead of the once powerful and now greatly diminished social democratic Labor party, led by Ehud Barak, the defence minister.

Lieberman – a Russian immigrant from Moldova who was elected to the Knesset in 1999 and who lives on a settlement in the West Bank – has had a fairly close political relationship with Netanyahu and has briefly held three cabinet posts – national infrastructure, transportation and strategic affairs – since 2001.

Successively director-general of the Likud and of the prime minister's office, Lieberman was first appointed to the cabinet by Ariel Sharon and then by Olmert.

A hard-liner, Lieberman opposed Sharon's decision to unilaterally withdraw from Gaza in 2005, believes that Israel should have toppled the Hamas regime in Gaza during Operation Cast Lead, and doubts whether a temporary truce with Hamas will hold or should be pursued.

Surprisingly enough, given his ultra-nationalist credentials, he supports a two-state solution. But in a radical departure from conventional Israeli thinking, he says that heavily populated Israeli Arab areas inside Israel, such as Wadi Arra, should be traded in exchange for settlement blocs in the West Bank. To Israeli Arabs, his proposal smacks of forcible transfer and racism.

Most controversially, he said that Israeli Arabs, comprising about 20 per cent of Israel's population, should be stripped of their citizenship unless they pass a loyalty test attesting to their attachment to Israel as a Jewish/Zionist state.

Lieberman's "No loyalty, no citizenship" slogan, which outraged Israel's Arabs and Jewish Israeli liberals alike, was in keeping with his opinion that the Israeli Arab minority is a possible fifth column.

In recent months, he has called for the execution of Arab Knesset members who meet Hamas representatives and has claimed that the goals of Balad – an Israeli Arab party that espouses a secular state in place of Israel – and Hamas are identical: Israel's destruction.

Lieberman, in deference to his largely secular constituency, has also alienated many religious Jews, and certainly the rabbinate, by advocating civil marriage in Israel.

Whatever one thinks of him, Lieberman will most likely play an important role in Israeli politics, given the assumption that Netanyahu or Livni would be hard-pressed to form a stable coalition without him.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Tzipi Livni

[Isranet photos]

Netanyahu and Livni, therefore, have courted him assiduously, realizing that their prime ministerial hopes rest on Lieberman's goodwill and co-operation.

Lieberman has been quoted as saying that he would prefer to serve in a rightist government led by Netanyahu. Ideologically, Lieberman is much closer to Netanyahu, a self-styled pragmatist in the mould of Sharon, than to Livni, a former Likudnik who moved to the centre after being appointed to Sharon's cabinet.

Love him or hate him, Netanyahu can take credit for rebuilding the Likud after its disastrous showing in the 2006 election, when it ended up with merely 12 seats.

Netanyahu, the prime minister from 1996 to 1999, capitalized on the dissatisfaction with the outcome of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and the 2006 war in Lebanon.

He also gained ground by bringing in new members and by striking a relatively moderate tone.

In one of his most astute manoeuvres, he sidelined Likud extremist Moshe Feiglin, who has urged Israel to annex the West Bank and pay each Palestinian family $250,000 to leave.

Netanyahu appealed to his base by sticking to a few core principles.

He told his supporters he would not be bound by Olmert's promise to evacuate much of the West Bank and the majority of its Jewish settlers.

He said he would not build new settlements in the West Bank, but would allow for "natural growth" in existing ones.

He said he would not conduct negotiations with the Palestinians under the 2007 Annapolis format, deferring final status issues indefinitely, and would shift the focus to improving the Palestinian economy.

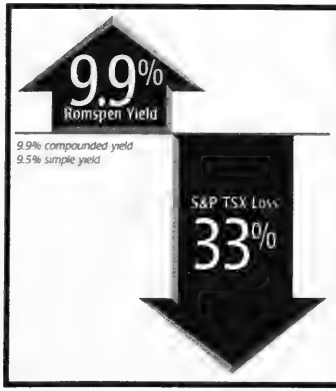
He did not rule out the possibility of a demilitarized Palestinian state, but claimed that such a state, if formed under current conditions, would effectively be "an Iranian state as we saw happen in Gaza."

Netanyahu warned that a pullout from eastern Jerusalem, annexed by Israel in 1967, would lead to "an Iranian-backed terror centre," and that a withdrawal from the Golan Heights "will turn [it] into Iran's front lines."

In this spirit, Netanyahu said that his top priority would be to stop Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. He also vowed to topple the Hamas entity in Gaza. As he put it, "There is no choice but to uproot the Iranian-backed regime."

Livni, too, has pledged to unseat the Hamas government. But unlike Netanyahu, she is committed to continuing the peace process, on a political level, with the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas.

Livni denies that she supports a plan, backed by Olmert, calling for the division of Jerusalem and the maintenance of a Jewish presence in the West Bank in only a few selected settlement clusters. Her denial is indicative of the fact that, in this election, Israel has moved further to the right, and that the left in the Jewish sector has been virtually wiped out.



2008: Another Great Year at Romspen

Many investors now regret that they took on more risk than they realized by overweighting their portfolios with stock market investments. They are now waiting for these investments to recover. But is this really the best solution?

For a risk-averse investment strategy consider the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, a leading Canadian non-bank commercial mortgage lender. Since inception and including 2008, investors in the RMIF have earned about 10% per annum. That's not just a paper gain – it's cash paid to investors each and every month. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Celebrating the birth of a daughter

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The celebration of a boy's birth is clearly prescribed in the Torah, with the brit milah, the sacred covenant of the flesh: "On the eighth day you shall circumcise..."

On this day, a baby boy endures this ritual, and at the same time, he receives his name. This is a most joyous and festive time and in fact, the Talmud correctly prophesied that this would be one event that would be observed by all Jews for all time.

On the other hand, for the birth of a baby girl, there is neither a biblical nor a rabbinic prescription, only custom.

A custom's development is as much a result of economic and environmental concerns as of its reason for being, in this case the birth of a baby girl. And so, the harsh realities of poverty and whether food was or was not available had as much to do with the development of customs related to the birth of a baby girl as the birth itself. While a brit milah is not required, a girl needs to be given a name as much as a boy does. It's the question of celebration that remains open.

In the Ashkenazi tradition, it is the norm to give one's daughter her name at the very first Torah reading after her birth – that is, on a Shabbat, Monday or Thursday. Here, the father is called to the Torah, after which a name is given to the baby. Many have a custom to host some sort of kiddush thereafter.

Sephardi custom is altogether different. First, there is no rush toward that first Torah reading. In fact, there is no connection with Torah reading at all. In the Sephardi tradition, parents of a baby girl have a whole month within which to host their event, as they are not bound to any specific day.

The celebration of a girl's birth often surpasses that of a boy: there is much more time for preparation, there is much more flexibility as to its date, and evening events are wholly acceptable (a brit milah may be undertaken only during daylight hours).

During a festive meal, the baby girl, dressed in frilly and lacy white, is placed on a similarly lacy, white pillow. She is "brought out" by her grandmothers, who proudly parade her about. Folkloric songs have been written specifically for this occasion. Of particular fame are those composed by Rabbi David Elkayim.

The baby is passed from the arms of the grandmothers to the arms of all the female members of the family, cousins, aunts and others, making her way at last to the arms of her mother.

The rabbi then chants the words: "May He Who blessed our mothers Sara, Rachel, Rebecca and Leah; Miriam and Abigail the prophetesses, and Queen Esther; may He bless this delightful child and let her name be called [name inserted here] b'mazal tov and b'siman tov. May He raise her in good health and peace and prosperity for her father and mother to experience her joys and her chupah and her own childbirth in prosperity and honour."

Choosing microscopes over masterpieces

Faced with a double set economic woes spurred by the world financial crisis and the Madoff Ponzi scheme, Brandeis University has recently found itself confronting a multi-million dollar deficit and a set of difficult decisions about the future of the institution.

In a recent emergency meeting to address the fiscal situation, the university's board of trustees voted to close and liquidate the collection of the Rose Art Museum.

Class Act
By Daniel Held

The Rose, which I have visited on a number of occasions, is a humble institution and home to nearly 6,000 works of modern American art, including formative works of Warhol, Lichtenstein and Rauschenberg. Founded nearly 50 years ago, the museum serves the university and greater Boston communities with changing exhibits, lectures and educational programs. It's a self-funding institution within the university, raising its own donations and even giving 15 per cent of these funds to the university's general coffers.

In announcing the closing of the gallery, Brandeis president Jehuda Reinharz wrote that the university's priority "in the face of hard choices, will always be the university's core teaching and research mission."

The museum, however, is so much more than a gallery. I join the hundreds of student, alumni and arts-community protesters who have tried to demonstrate that the museum is at the heart of Brandeis' educational mandate.

The Rose is a centre for research and publication. In its 50 years, the museum has produced more than 85 exhibition catalogues, with researched texts authored by Brandeis scholars and outside academics.

The Rose is also a centre for internships and student learning. Interns learn skills in curation, education, registration and development. They engage in hands-on learning, supplementing their courses with work experience. The Rose hosts regular university courses at both the undergraduate and graduate levels in areas such as art history, education, creative writing, psychology, anthropology and theatre. Classes descend on the museum from across Brandeis' faculties and from other local institutions. Finally, the Rose hosts regular symposia based around current exhibits and visiting academics and artists.

Notwithstanding these academic credentials and the Rose's central role in the university's mission, the board of trustees at Brandeis chose to value the microscope over the museum's masterpieces, sacrificing the Rose in favour of other university assets and faculties.

Arts are an easy target during difficult times. Over and over, we have seen public schools make cuts to music, drama and other arts programs, citing the added expense of these specialized courses. The Rose, too, is an easy target. The Rose is a liquid and extremely valuable investment, so closing the museum and selling the collection will allow the university to forgo or defer other difficult spending cuts that it has been considering, such as cutting its faculty by 10 per cent or increasing undergraduate enrolment by 12 per cent. I can only imagine the agonizing debate that took place around the boardroom table about how to trim an already-tight budget.

As the impact of the economic crisis continues to affect our community and as the pool of philanthropic money continues to evaporate, more communal agencies will be forced to make difficult decisions similar to that of the Brandeis board of trustees. Schools will consider what classes to run and what programs to cut, federations will have to balance the needs of funded agencies, and a new equation will have to be established regarding our community's local needs versus those abroad. These decisions will not be easy.

Shortly after I finished writing the first draft of this column, Reinharz sent a second e-mail to the Brandeis community. In it, he expressed regret about the board's quick and opaque decision, and he thanked the university community for passionately expressing its dismay. While the final fate of the Rose remains unclear, Reinharz's reflective tone and open ear toward the voices of his faculty and students is certainly a step in the direction of the type of dialogues we will need in the coming years.

Carter incites Palestinian extremism: Dershowitz

The Case Against Israel's Enemies: Exposing Jimmy Carter and Others Who Stand in the Way of Peace, by Alan Dershowitz, published by Wiley.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Jewish community is fortunate that Alan Dershowitz, renowned professor at Harvard Law School and one of America's foremost appellate lawyers, is a strong, courageous, and passionate defender of the State of Israel. He is always cogent, lucid, knowledgeable and outspoken.

In his new book, The Case Against Israel's Enemies: Exposing Jimmy Carter and Others Who Stand in the Way of Peace, he gets quickly to the heart of the matter with the following anecdote that concerns a talk he gave to a large audience at the University of California at Irvine. "I asked audience members how many of them would count themselves as generally pro-Israel. About a hundred or so students raised their hands. I then asked these pro-Israel students how many of them would favour a Palestinian state existing in peace alongside Israel. Every single one of them raised a hand.

"I next asked how many audience members counted themselves as supportive of the Palestinian side. A similar number raised their hands. I asked the pro-Palestine students how many of them would support a peaceful, non-expansionist Israel located beside a Palestinian state. Not a single person raised a hand."

He challenges open-minded individuals to dispute the following propositions.

- If Israel's military enemies – Hamas, Hezbollah, Iran and other terrorist groups and nations – were to lay down their arms, stop firing rockets, stop sending suicide bombers and stop threatening to wipe Israel off the map, there would be peace.
- If Israel were to lay down arms, there would be genocide.

This is the sad reality that Israel's enemies forget or ignore when they blame Israel for the current situation in the Middle East.

In disputing the arguments former U.S. president Jimmy Carter makes in his book Peace Not Apartheid, the author presents 20 pages of detailed refutation of Carter's ideas. Sadly, he concludes that Carter is an enemy of a compromised peace, an inciter of Palestinian extremism and an apologist for those who would continue to employ terror in an effort to destroy the Jewish state.

This book includes chapters against the anti-Israel hard left and hard right, against Israel's suicidal enemies as well as against Iran's genocidal nuclear war program.

Dershowitz warns that armed with nuclear weapons and ruled by religious fanatics, Iran will become – if it is not already – the most dangerous nation in the world. In addition to a suicidal nuclear exchange with Israel, there is a greater likelihood that it could hand over nuclear material to one of its terrorist surrogates or that some rogue elements could steal nuclear material.

Turning ironic, Dershowitz points out that Israel is the only country in the world that is accused by its enemies of practising apartheid without racism; of perpetrating a Holocaust without gas chambers, of engaging in genocide without mass murder; of committing war crimes without targeting civilians; and of being the worst human rights violator in the world while having one of the most responsive legal systems in the world.

Writes the author, "This is accusation by metaphor, prosecution by propaganda, trial by bigotry, guilt by hyperbole."

The author reminds us that the 1947-48 war, started by the Palestinians and the Arab nations, was a war of extermination conducted in part by Nazi war criminals intent on completing Hitler's Final Solution. It resulted in an exchange of populations – 700,000 Palestinians left Israel under pressures of the war, and approximately the same number of Jews were forced to leave Arab countries and areas of Israel that were captured by the Arabs.

The Jewish state quickly settled the Jewish refugees, while the Arab states refused to settle the Palestinian refugees.

Verdict: buy this book and give copies to your friends and neighbours.

Tikkun olam, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at the roots of tikkun olam, an expression often translated as "repairing the world." As the phrase has gained popularity through the centuries, it certainly has taken on extra meanings – and some would say, baggage. Today, redefining tikkun olam.

When you look around the web, there is no shortage of entries that incorporate tikkun olam as part of their mandate. You come across articles such as "Tikkun Olam and Environmental Restoration: A Jewish Eco-Theology of Redemption". [tinyurl.com/tikkun13] Elsewhere, Douglas Rosenberg argues that the work of artists – in this case dancers – play an important role in tikkun olam, particularly in a post-Holocaust world. [tinyurl.com/tikkun18]

Rabbi Jill Jacobs puts it bluntly: "There may be no other term that is simultaneously as beloved and as reviled in Jewish progressive circles as the phrase 'tikkun olam'… so overused and so little understood as to be meaningless." In lengthy essays, she traces the history and meanings of the phrase and suggests a redefinition of "tikkun olam as the process of fixing large societal problems, while maintaining a belief that our actions can have a positive effect on the greater human and divine world." [tinyurl.com/tikkun05]

Rabbi Arthur Green of Brandeis University acknowledges that associating tikkun olam with ideals such as the relief of human suffering and the protection of the planet from destruction may be a recent innovation. But he says these goals are rooted in Jewish tradition that requires a concern for the "feeding, housing and health, of all. The Torah's call that we 'pursue justice, only justice' (Deuteronomy 16:20) [tinyurl.com/tikkun 01] demands that we work toward closing the terrible gaps, especially in learning and opportunity, that exist within our society and undermine our moral right to the relative wealth and comfort most of us enjoy." [tinyurl.com/tikkun12]

British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks asks why there is no halachic law for tikkun olam similar to that for Shabbat or kashrut. He suggests that it never evolved because "for 2,000 years what chance did we have? For 2,000 years, we were dispersed, scattered, exiled, we were powerless… who in the world would think of learning from us?" But he quotes God's blessing to Abraham in Genesis 12:3, "Through you all the families of the earth shall be blessed" or, in other words, "don't think this Torah that I am giving you is for you alone, it isn't – this is your wisdom and understanding in the eyes of the nation – because when they hear and see this way of life, this Jewish way of life, they will say what a wise, understanding people is this great nation." [tinyurl.com/tikkun02]

Eytan Kobre writes on the Jewish Law website that tikkun olam "has emerged over recent decades as the catch-all description of choice for all manner of socially conscious activities, from old-fashioned charity and saving the redwoods to fighting Republican tax cuts." Kobre says that "the most important battles for the creation of a just and harmonious society are not fought primarily through sweeping campaigns for national reform. Rather, the building of a better world for humanity is best achieved through the personal campaign of each individual to engage in a process of repairing the flaws of his or her own olam kattan, that micro-cosmic world known as the human soul. The God-given tools for that task are the mitzvot, both the overtly ethical and the so-called ritual precepts, which, in fact, can be deeply ethically enriching as well." [tinyurl.com/tikkun07]

Finally, I do like this story about a teacher who tried to teach the literal message of "repairing" the world by tearing a map of the world into many pieces and challenging a student to reassemble it. "The student dropped to the floor and, in short order, completed the assignment by correctly taping together each of the pieces of the whole of the world… "When the teacher asked the student how it had been possible to reassemble the fragmented world so quickly, the response was short and to the point. 'There was a picture of a person on the back side. I repaired that one person and the whole world got fixed, too.'" [tinyurl.com/tikkun16]

MESSAGES TO ISRAEL: During Israel's recent war in Gaza, senior kindergarten students at Bialik Hebrew Day School discussed the feelings of children in southern Israel, who weren't able to go to school because of the dangers surrounding them. The Bialik students drew pictures and wrote heartfelt messages to a kindergarten class on Kibbutz Shoval in the Negev. The teacher of the class wrote back to say that it meant a great deal to the Israeli kids to receive the letters. Pictured with their drawing are Zachary Bensky and Eilat Ravid.

Islam doesn't recognize Jewish right to statehood, scholar says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Many Muslims regard Israel as an illegitimate state because Islam doesn't recognize the Jewish people's right to statehood, says Bar-Ilan University political scientist Mordechai Kedar.

Kedar, a specialist in Islam and popular culture in the Arab world, said that Islam considers Judaism a religion but not a nationality.

This being the case, most Muslims do not accept Israel's existence, observed Kedar, who spoke Feb. 6 at the law offices of Minden Gross at the invitation of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's real estate cabinet.

"For many of our enemies, Tel Aviv and Haifa are occupied areas," he said.

Kedar, one of the few Israelis to have been interviewed by the Al-Jazeera TV network, described Israel as a unique state, because its regional enemies refuse to recognize its legitimacy.

"Our mere existence is not recognized by some of our neighbours. It is a unique situation."

Israel's quest for Muslim recognition is also hampered by the Muslim belief that Islam will eventually supplant Christianity and Judaism and by the perception that historic Palestine is an Islamic endowment that cannot be partitioned, he noted.

Israel's peace agreements with Egypt and Jordan are regarded by Arabs as temporary, he said, adding that Arabs who recognize Israel embrace its existence in de facto but not in de jure terms.

Suggesting that Israel has no alternative but to be on perpetual guard, Kedar said Israel's hostile neighbours want to wipe it out, even if it takes centuries.

"The Arabs can wait," he said. "They have patience."

Mordechai Kedar

Israel's enemies compare Israel to the ill-fated Crusader states – which lasted no more than about 200 years – while the leader of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, likens Israel to an extremely vulnerable spider's web, said Kedar, who is also a research associate at the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies.

Calling Iran Israel's most dangerous foe, he pointed out that Arab Gulf states have also been targeted by the Islamic fundamentalist Iranian regime.

"The world doesn't fully appreciate the threat posed by Iran," he said, referring to its budding nuclear program and its regional ambitions.

Kedar said the Arab world at present is split into pro-and anti-Iran camps, and it's so fragmented that Israel has no need to worry about its future.

As he put it, "Arab horses are pulling Arab wagons in different directions."

The Arab world lacks a co-ordinated position on a whole range of issues, but in this respect, Iran is focused, he warned.

Chabad Markham fundraises for Moshe Holtzberg

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham's Women of the World (WOW) organization recently hosted its winter event, attended by nearly 200 women.

The event, Discover Your Inner and Outer Beauty, was inspired by the death of Rebbetzin Rivka Holtzberg and her husband, Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg, in Mumbai, during a terrorist attack at the end of November.

Rebbetzin Goldie Plotkin addressed the crowd. Her topic was the contribution of the Holtzbergs to world Jewry and their work at their centre in Mumbai.

Ferro Hair Art and Spa sponsored the event, which raised funds for Moshe Holtzberg, the Holtzbergs' two-year-old son, who survived the Mumbai massacre. Moshe is now living in Israel. Rebbetzin Plotkin will personally deliver the funds raised to Israel.

WOW's event included the creation of a "spa" at the synagogue. Hair, makeup, skin therapy and fashion stylist professionals from Ferro Hair Art & Spa counselled attendees at various workshops that were held throughout the morning. Raffle prizes included spa services and Di-Amanda denim and diamond jewelry, as well as tickets to popular sporting events in Toronto.

Reform rabbi asks: Where are the men?

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The dozen or so men who attended a Temple Har Zion program last month on "Where have all the Men Gone? Bringing Men Back into the Reform Community" did not appear to be the men referred to in the title of Rabbi Cory Weiss' talk.

Rabbi Cory Weiss

Rabbi Weiss, spiritual leader of the temple – and its only male clergy and staff member – knew all the attendees by name. However, the rabbi told The CJN that the issue under discussion on a January Sunday morning at Leo Baeck Day School, where Har Zion holds its religious school classes, seems to be more pressing in the United States.

"This has been something kicking around the Reform movement for a few years now," he said in a phone interview before his talk, which was co-sponsored by Har Zion's adult education committee and brotherhood.

Over the last three decades, as women have become empowered in Reform Judaism – the first denomination in North America to ordain a woman as rabbi in 1972 – there has been concern about disempowering men," Rabbi Weiss said.

According to a JTA article last May, the Reform movement has decreasing numbers of boys in its post-bar mitzvah religious schools, youth groups and summer camps. As well, more than half of the recently ordained Reform rabbis are women, as were all of last year's students entering cantorial school.

To address the issue, the group Men of Reform Judaism has sponsored men's worship services at recent movement biennials and published a Men's Haggadah, JTA reported.

"We at Har Zion don't have this problem of all the men sort of disappearing, but we certainly want to avoid it," said Rabbi Weiss. "How do we make sure that everybody's a part of things?"

For the rabbi, who was ordained in 1993, egalitarianism has always been the norm. When he was growing up in Connecticut, both his parents worked, his father did the cooking at home, and his congregation did not hire a male cantor until the year the future rabbi was confirmed.

One attendee noted that the phenomenon of men taking a less prominent role or opting out altogether is not unique to the Reform movement, citing a concern about the perceived roles of men in the other professional fields.

"Certainly there's a possibility that men are trying to spend more time with family, and synagogues are suffering for it," Rabbi Weiss said.

"How do we re-empower men?" the rabbi asked. "What do we [men] bring that is unique?"

He suggested that serving as a role model is one answer.

"How do we show [boys] that Judaism is as meaningful to us as to anyone, and that, for a Jewish man synagogue, study and prayer – that's what men do in addition to hockey games?"

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am wondering about how heart disease can be prevented through diet – it runs in my family?

A. Amazingly, a great deal of cardiovascular disease can be prevented through diet and lifestyle, yet it remains the No. 1 killer of Canadians, men and women. Here are some tips to help you prevent the onset of heart disease.

Eliminate trans fat from your diet. That means reading labels to ensure that there is no hydrogenated fat, shortening, palm or coconut oil in your foods, and do not trust the claims on the front of the package regarding trans fat. Read the ingredients, in order to be sure.

Limit saturated fat. This is the fat in high-fat animal products like fatty beef, cream, butter, ice cream, baked goods, cheese, etc. Choose low fat dairy products and leaner cuts of beef like flank. In addition, either have smaller portions or choose beef less often.

Increase heart healthy fat. Eat more nuts, particularly almonds and walnuts; choose olive oil; eat fish such as salmon, preferably wild (all canned salmon is wild) and sardines.

Increase the fibre in your diet. We need about 25 grams per day, which is a lofty number, but if you start your day with a high-fibre cereal, especially one with psyllium, eat some whole grains or whole grain bread through the day along with healthy servings of fruits and vegetables you can reach that number. Choose legumes, chick peas, kidney beans, black beans, etc; use them in salads, soups, dips, pita pockets, etc. Bake homemade treats using whole wheat flour and reduced fat and sugar. Fill up with fresh fruits and vegetables, salads, veggies and low fat dip, stir-fries, roasted veggies, vegetable soups, chillis.

Last word of advice: exercise as much as you can.

Q. I have a 13-month-old baby who is very constipated since he started on table food. What do I do?

A. This is very common at this age. When babies make the transition from formula or breast milk, usually around age one, and start to have cows' milk and table food, constipation is often a problem. This is partially because the formula or breast milk is less binding and easier to digest, while milk can be constipating. In addition, there is often an over-consumption of milk and a reduction in bulking foods.

At age one, is it expected that appetites slow down, as less growth occurs between one and two years of age than in the first year of life. As well, at age one, kids are becoming fascinated with the world around them and their ability to move, crawl or walk, and would rather explore than sit and eat. This is often coupled with a desire to drink a lot of milk and therefore fill up on it. At this age, kids require only about 16 ounces of milk per day to meet their calcium requirements – and that's if they aren't getting calcium from cheese, yogurt or other foods; so less may even be okay too.

If your child is constipated, watch that he isn't over-consuming dairy. Bananas and white rice can also be binding and you should limit those. Push water, fruits and vegetables, and whole grains, like high-fibre cereals, breads, pasta, brown rice, oatmeal, homemade baked goods with fibre, legumes. Also it is a good idea to ask your child's doctor if he or she feels a laxative is necessary to help your baby.

Confrontations escalate at York University

"The Jewish community really came together for the first time ever on campus and really stood up against this stuff," he said. "We sang, we danced, we sang Hatikvah, O Canada, and that was it."

But confrontations between pro-Israel and anti-Israel students at York have not gone so smoothly as of late.

A day earlier, on Feb. 11, students involved in the Drop YFS campaign – a student-run initiative to impeach executive members of the York Federation of Students due to their inactivity during the recent CUPE strike, which shut down the university for three months – were preparing to announce that they had gathered the 5,000 signatures necessary to oust the YFS executive.

Rosenberg, one of the petition's organizers, said Drop YFS decided to hold a press conference in a room in York's student centre to announce the collection of the signatures and to hand the petition to the university's chief returning officer, who oversees the recall process.

"We got there, and Students Against Israel Apartheid were there with their crew, the Tamil Tigers were there with their whole crew and Krisna Saravanamuttu, the YFS' vice-president of equity, was there as well," Rosenberg said.

He said that within 90 seconds, the mob of people that had gathered outside the room – who weren't allowed in because of capacity restrictions – began making accusations of racism.

"It was obviously not racist because there was a diverse section of the student body in the room."

He said they started to bang on the walls, scream and yell. "We were nervous that it would become violent and there would be no way out of the room… so we cancelled the meeting, left and we went straight to the Hillel."

He said what happened next was something that he and Hillel staff had never seen before.

"It was basically a siege. They were screaming and yelling and banging on the walls of the Hillel, screaming, 'Let us in.' It was a very scary situation," Rosenberg said.

"We called security, but they couldn't do anything for us. We called the police and the police weren't willing to do anything for us but escort us out of the building."

Among the slurs shouted by the mob were "Die Jew," "Get the hell off campus," "Go back to Israel," and "F---ing Jew," Hillel said in a statement.

Michael Payton, a York student who witnessed the incident, posted a note on Facebook saying that he saw the YFS' Saravanamuttu leading the mob.

"I saw him after the rally shaking people's hands and thanking them for coming," Payton wrote.

Rosenberg said that the Drop YFS campaign was not a Jewish affair, but the YFS made it so by blaming Jewish and Zionist groups on campus for the initiative.

He said YFS supporters distributed flyers against the group, which he described as "a hit list" of six Drop YFS organizers.

He said that he, along with Sammy Katz, Hasbara's campus co-ordinator; Daniel Ferman, Hillel at York's president, and Ilan Mann, who is involved with AEPi, the Jewish fraternity, were singled out as being a part of a "Zionist conspiracy" to bring down the YFS.

"It's very scary to be identified like that at York," Rosenberg said.

He said that earlier that day, Shoukri and members of York's administration met with representatives of Jewish and Muslim student groups and SAIA to talk about the rally.

"[York's administration] is useless. Let's be honest here," Rosenberg said.

University spokesperson Alex Bilyk said that York is "dedicated to the dissemination of knowledge and the freedom of expression," but "we have a responsibility to provide a safe and secure campus for all of our students, faculty and staff."

However, he did not elaborate on how the administration would work to keep students safe.

The week before, York student Jessica Abourmad was involved in a "scuffle" with a member of SAIA.

"They had up a mock 'apartheid wall,' which they did not have a permit for [from the university], and they were handing out flyers calling for the boycott of Israeli academics," Abourmad said.

"I was standing there and some guy was calling me a Zionist, fascist pig and I wasn't even talking to him."

Offended by the flyers, she decided to take them from the table SAIA had set up and dispose of them.

Abourmad said that Hammam Farrah, a member of SAIA who is not a York student, pursued her.

"He whips around me, grabs the flyers – I don't even know what happened, but I fell back. I was in shock."

Her friends called 911, but it took police 20 minutes to arrive at the scene. In the meantime, she said a group of Farrah's supporters came up with a story and planned to discredit Abourmad's account of events.

The police told her they couldn't press charges, because there were too many witnesses on the other side who said it didn't happen.

Even more disturbing was an incident involving a Jewish student who received a phone call in the middle of the night on Feb. 4. Abourmad, who knows the victim, said the caller threatened the student and his family with rape and murder, in both English and Hebrew.

York Regional Police Detective Brett Kemp, who is investigating the incident as a hate crime, didn't want to repeat the threat but confirmed that the comments were hateful and there was a threat to harm both the student and his family.

"There is an obvious hate motivation behind the comments that were made, and that is why it is being investigated as a hate crime."

The hate crime unit is following up on leads, and "it is likely that they will be able to identify who has done it," Kemp said.

B'nai Brith Canada said it has requested an "urgent" meeting with York officials to discuss security for Jewish students.

"We have already been in communication with police and demanded that the safety and security of Jewish students at York University and other campuses be dealt with as a matter of top priority," executive vice-president Frank Diamant said in a statement.

"The climate on York's campus of aggressive intimidation, violent rhetoric and physical harassment is unacceptable," Hillel's Ferman said. "The hostile environment demonstrates contempt for all students – not only to Jewish students."

In a separate incident at Ryerson University last week, Ryerson's CUPE union president Donald Elder sent an e-mail to his members – mainly part-time instructors and teaching assistants – that an anti-Israel resolution will be presented and voted on at the Ontario University Workers Co-ordinating Committee (OUWCC) meeting on Feb. 20.

The resolution seeks to "defend the right of Palestinians students [to] have access to education and educational institutions in the Palestinian territory."

It also urges members to discuss a boycott of Israeli academic institutions, to "investigate both research and investment links between Ontario universities and the state of Israel's military," and "request funding and support from CUPE Ontario to conduct an education campaign on the academic boycott.

Survivor tracing centre opened

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Montreal Holocaust survivors and their descendants who want to know what happened to relatives with whom they lost contact or who died may now find their search easier.

The Canadian Red Cross and the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (CJCS) are collaborating to open what they say is Canada's first Holocaust Survivors' Tracing Centre.

At the centre, based at the CJCS, survivors can receive information about Red Cross services and fill out the necessary forms to launch an investigation. It is co-ordinated by CJCS staff member Mara Schneiderman, who oversees six trained volunteers. The service is free and confidential.

The Red Cross has for many years helped Jews and others seeking to reunite with family they were separated from during World War II, or to determine the circumstances of their deaths. But that service has not been used extensively in Quebec by the Jewish community, and was usually a long process before the advances in technology made obtaining information easier.

In the last few years, a significant number of records have also become public, most notably the archives of Nazi persecution at Bad Arelson, Germany. In 2006, its tens of millions of pieces of documentation were made readily accessible for the first time, and they have been digitized.

Housing the tracing centre at the CJCS Snowdon location will also be more convenient and familiar for survivors; the Red Cross Montreal office is on Nun's Island.

Red Cross spokesperson Myrian Marotte said only about five Holocaust survivors make inquiries about tracing relatives each year at its Montreal office.

"Our goal with the new centre is to increase the visibility of our service. It is estimated that we will get between 50 and 100 requests annually now," she said.

The service also includes providing certification for reparations or pensions. Marotte said the local Red Cross has had some success in reuniting relatives. For example, last spring, two sisters, not Jewish, one living here and the other in Russia, were put in contact with one another for the first time since the war, she said.

The tracing centre complements existing services for survivors at the CJCS, said Myra Giberovitch, co-ordinator of those services, which include a drop-in centre and assistance in making claims for reparations or other compensations, or obtaining emergency funds for which they may be eligible.

Until now, the CJCS has always referred anyone who asked about tracing to the Red Cross.

She said this is the first time the Red Cross has set up an off-site tracing centre in Canada.

The centre is open Tuesdays and Wednesdays, but appointments are required. Call 514-343-3529, ext. 7206, and leave a message for someone to get back to you. A brochure on the service is also available in a variety of languages.

The applications for the Red Cross to conduct a search ask for detailed information and run to about three pages, Giberovitch said, but the volunteers, who were trained by Red Cross staff who came up from Baltimore, can help in filling them out.

In the past, it might have taken a year or two for the Red Cross to obtain the information sought, but it is expected to be much quicker now. Although almost 64 years have passed since the end of the war, Giberovitch said there are still survivors who want to know more.

"In recent years, there have been stories in the media about people finding lost relatives. As the survivors enter the last stage of their lives, there is a desire among some to fill in the missing parts," she said.

"The service is not for everyone," she added. "Some survivors may not want to probe into the past, and have more or less accepted what happened. They don't want to dredge up painful memories, and they certainly should not feel obligated, nor should their kids push them."

Hamiltonian recognized for a life of social action

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — After being named the City of Hamilton's 2008 Royal Bank Distinguished Citizen of the Year, Madeleine Levy reflected on a life of social action.

"I heard my mother's voice saying, "This is how we raised you,'" said the Ancaster, Ont., resident. "I was raised with the principles of tikkun olam. This was an affirmation of what these good deeds mean to the community.

"I believe you get opportunities and, if you seize them, we can all make a difference."

And seize them she does. Levy sits on the Hamilton Community Foundation board of directors, the Hamilton-Wentworth District School Board InterFaith Advisory Committee and the Bob Kemp Hospice fund development committee. She's on the United Way of Burlington and Greater Hamilton's board of directors and was vice-chair of its 2007 campaign.

Levy is also a governing council member of the Hamilton Centre for Civic Inclusion, chair of the UN International Day of Holocaust and a member of the UJA Federation of Hamilton Holocaust Education Committee. She chairs the Hamilton Asper Foundation Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program for high school students.

The Nazis killed all except for one member of Levy's family living in Romania during World War II.

She said her strong commitment to Holocaust education is justice for the six million Jews who died, as well as a way to foster tolerance and understanding.

"It's also out of reverence for the survivors living in our city. It's my obligation," she added.

Levy and her husband, Monte, helped bring books, propaganda documents, concentration camp letters and other artifacts to McMaster University, as part of the exhibit Anti-Semitism, Concentration Camps and Underground Resistance in World War II. The artifacts are on display until the end of March, and all materials will remain at the Mills Library for research purposes. The couple also plans to put their materials online to create a virtual museum.

Darrel Skidmore, CEO of the United Way of Burlington and Greater Hamilton, was delighted when Levy received the citizen of the year honour.

"Madeleine has the ability to create bridges and build coalitions of disparate groups in the community," Skidmore said. "In Hamilton, which is so diverse, to have people who can create those kinds of relationships [and] can bring people together, is a huge asset.

"Madeleine has a genuine interest in all people across the city. She brings compassion to her role, as well as passion."

Levy is credited with building a relationship between Hamilton's oldest black church and the city's oldest synagogue, and raising funds for an elevator at Stewart Memorial Church and for repairs to the Torah scrolls at Temple Anshe Sholom.

She also worked with Festitalia organizers to bring, to the festival, a film about Italian hero Giorgio Perlasca, who saved more than 3,500 Hungarian Jews during the Holocaust.

Levy grew up in New York. Her grandmother fought to give women the right to vote, and in the 1960s, her mother went door-to-door encouraging people to vote.

"We always had discussions about social justice and speaking up," Levy says. "You can sit in your house and talk about it, but if you don't go out and act, silence is agreement."

When Levy moved to Hamilton in 1979, she became active in the National Council of Jewish Women and helped bring Ronald McDonald House to the city. In 2000, she became a co-ordinator of the local Out of the Cold program, which provides shelter and food for the homeless. She has also been involved in Hadassah and the Temple Anshe Sholom sisterhood.

"It's a difficult time to be Jewish, but we can't ignore the fundamental values of what we do as Jews – that's to educate and be part of the struggle for social justice. We are here to be stewards and care for our fellow human beings," Levy said.

"There is no shortage of opportunities. I wake up each day with so much energy. There are so many good works to be done."

MPs attracted to Israel in 2008

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It seems Israel was the place to be for Canadian parliamentarians on diplomatic missions abroad last year, according to the ethics commissioner's annual list of sponsored travel.

The official report, released earlier this month, shows that 23 MPs visited Israel in 2008 – a number that will be revised to 26, as three members didn't file reports in time for inclusion on the list – on trips sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), twice the number that went on similar missions in 2007.

Lawmakers' trips to Israel outnumbered trips to other destinations nearly two to one in 2008.

In the past, all-expense-paid trips for MPs to Taiwan usually outstripped other destinations. However, only 12 MPs accepted trips there last year.

The report also shows that the CIC paid more than $160,000 to send the politicians on trips to Israel, often with their spouses. Half of those travelled to Israel in May to mark the 60th anniversary of the Jewish state.

Navdeep Bains

According to Shimon Fogel, the committee's CEO, the main reason for the upsurge was Israel's year-long anniversary celebrations, which prompted the CIC to add an extra mission last year.

Speaking to The CJN last week in the wake of ethics commissioner Mary Dawson's report, Fogel said the committee views the missions as essential to its mandate.

"Because they serve as the only way to translate images and perceptions – entirely skewed and run through multiple prisms and filters – that [MPs] get from 6,000 miles away, for them to be able to understand, assimilate and assess developments on the ground for themselves," he said.

He said the CIC tries to send an equal number of MPs from each federal party. Last year, nine Conservatives, eight Liberals, five Bloc Québécois and four NDP members were sponsored.

"This isn't a foreign-sponsored junket. Comparisons to some other trips offered to MPs are inappropriate so far as the nature of the trip goes," he said.

Fogel added that the CIC's sponsorship of MPs' trips to Israel is one of the only ways that MPs can get a comprehensive education about Israel. He noted that Canadian lawmakers have access to fewer resources to learn about foreign affairs compared to their U.S. counterparts.

"Unlike… legislators in the U.S. [who] get whacks of money to support independent travel anywhere they want to go… to understand issues that are important to constituents, to advance their work within their committees and so forth, our [MPs] get virtually no budget," he said.

Judy Wasylycia-Leis

"If it weren't for organizations like ours, [MPs] would have no capacity to benefit from direct, first-hand experiences in areas of the world that are clearly important to Canada in general and to constituents in particular."

Navdeep Bains, Liberal MP for Mississauga-Brampton South, went on one of the CIC trips last year. It was his first visit to Israel, and he said it was an "eye-opening" experience.

"We hear, read and debate about the issues that arise in the Middle East, especially with respect to Israel and its neighbours," Bains told The CJN last week. "It was a great opportunity for me… to learn and see first-hand the situation on the ground. I gained a very good perspective and… the trip was balanced. I was able to gain a new appreciation for the sensitivities, difficulties and challenges that exist in the region."

Speaking about the delicate nature of adding balance to the missions' itineraries, Fogel said his organization imposes no restrictions on participants, other than that they take part in all scheduled tours and events.

"We don't make any demands on MPs when they return, and we ensure that every different perspective benefits from exposure to the group as part of the program," he said.

He added that MPs "get the whole range of views from the Israeli political sector [and] Canadian perspectives in Israel from the two Canadian missions in Ramallah and Tel Aviv. They get multiple Palestinian perspectives, both from the formal PA- to UN-affiliated [groups] to pollsters, private citizens and journalists. They get academic input. These are exceptionally rich trips.

"Virtually every MP wants to go on the trip, and most signal in an explicit way their desire to participate in a CIC mission."

Judy Wasylycia-Leis, New Democrat MP for Winnipeg North, went on her second CIC trip to Israel last year. She said she continues to marvel at the country's ability to incorporate all political ideas and debate in a democratic fashion, despite the existential threats it faces.

"Israelis are working through these issues in a democratic way," she said, adding that her trips have allowed her and other NDP colleagues to ensure the party's federal caucus remains "balanced" on Israel.

"There's one self-evident truth [about Israel]… it has the right to exist and defend itself."

Seven years for 'jihad' firebombing too little, CJC says

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Seven years in prison is not a severe enough punishment for the man who pleaded guilty last week to the firebombing of two Montreal Jewish institutions in 2006 and 2007, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) says.

Omar Bulphred

Omar Bulphred, 23, changed his plea to guilty on Feb. 12 to three counts of arson and two of uttering death threats in connection with throwing a Molotov cocktail at the entrance of the chassidic Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school in Outremont in September 2006 and igniting a small explosive device outside the Snowdon Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre in April 2007, as well as setting fire to a car in an incident believed to be unrelated to the Jewish community.

The threat convictions pertain to two letters after the attacks claiming they were carried out to further the Islamic jihad.

Although the evidence against the Algerian-born Bulphred suggested he saw himself as acting for the cause of radical Islam, no links were established between him and any Islamist group.

"We're very disappointed," said CJC Quebec region vice-president Adam Atlas. "This sentence does not send a strong enough message to deter ardent terrorists like Bulphred. These were not ordinary crimes, but ones motivated by hate, and that is especially disturbing when children are targeted."

According to police wiretaps and surveillance, Bulphred researched bomb-making techniques and spoke of attacks on such sites as the U.S. Consulate in Montreal, a military base and a nuclear plant before targeting the Jewish school.

Quebec Court Judge Louise Bourdeau accepted the joint recommendation of the Crown and defence counsels of seven years in a federal penitentiary for Bulphred.

Four other charges that were laid against him when he was arrested in April 2007, along with accomplice Azim Ibragimov, were dropped, including conspiracy to kidnap and to commit armed robbery.

His 22 months in detention count for double, meaning Bulphred has 40 months left in his sentence. He will have to be released by law after serving two-thirds of the time.

Ibragimov, who pleaded guilty to the same counts, was sentenced in November to four years in jail.

Atlas said Bulphred should have received a stiffer sentence – 10 years in CJC's estimation – because he was the acknowledged mastermind of the attacks, which were clearly premeditated.

He also has a prior criminal record of pointing a pellet gun at someone, Atlas said, and he tried to assault a prison guard during his detention.

The maximum penalty he faced was 14 years behind bars.

Asked by the judge if he had anything to say, Bulphred, who appeared with hands and feet shackled, replied: "I offer my sincerest apology to the Jewish community. The acts were very cowardly."

Atlas is unconvinced of his sincerity. "He had a long time in jail to think about what he did… I think it's self-serving to apologize literally minutes before sentencing."

Atlas noted that Bulphred was "smirking" as the details of his misdeeds were read out. "He did not come across as genuinely remorseful."

Bulphred's lawyer's main argument for clemency was that Bulphred is ready to turn his life around and wants to go back to school.

As an indication that he has changed, the defence counsel said that his client had shaven off his beard and had re-established contact with his father in Algeria, which in Atlas's opinion points to how overwhelming the case was against Bulphred.

Unlike the judge in Ibragimov's sentencing, Bourdeau did not explicitly refer to Bulphred's crimes as acts of terrorism or rooted in a radical and violent ideology.

Entered into evidence were two letters by Ibragimov confessing to the arsons. In one he wrote after the attack on the Skver yeshiva, Ibragimov said: "In the name of Islamic jihad, we claim responsibility for the attack on the Jewish school, and other attacks are being planned against the Zionists. Free our brothers imprisoned in Toronto," an apparent reference to the arrests in the summer of 2006 of 17 suspects allegedly involved in an Islamist terror plot.

Ibragimov's lawyers argued that the letters were dictated by Bulphred.

"Judge Bourdeau's presentation was good in that she spoke of the necessity of sending a message that would prevent such future acts, and she did say that no one in a free and democratic society should have to live in fear, but she failed to use her discretion to render a sentence that expressed that," Atlas said.

He stressed that the pair's crimes have had a lasting negative impact on the Montreal Jewish community. "It has affected our daily lives. We are extra cautious now. Just sending our children to school means we have to plan for their security."

FashionEAST fundraiser brings Israeli designer wear to Canada

By CLARE HILL
Special to The CJN

When Shira Webber walks down the street, it's inevitable that someone will stop her, point to her shoes, shirt or handbag and ask, "Where did you get that?"

And her answer is always the same, "Israel."

But now, Webber is aiming to bring more Israeli fashion to Canada than just what her arms can carry.

She and Cayla Spagat are co-executive directors of FashionEAST. The two-day charity event at Toronto's Design Exchange, starting Feb. 21, will showcase signature pieces from Israel's most talented fashion designers.

The event features a cocktail gala and runway show on Saturday, hosted by Fashion Television's Jeanne Beker, and then a sale of various fashions and accessories on Sunday.

Some of the funds raised will be donated to the Leaders of Tomorrow fund, which provides extracurricular cultural programming for more than 300 Israeli youths between the ages of six and 18 who are at risk.

The rest of the money will go to the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, to be used to support Israeli performers who participate in the Canadian arts community and help fund scholarships for Israeli arts students who want exposure outside of Israel.

"It was sort of a no-brainer," Webber says of her idea for the event, which was conceived as she and Spagat were walking through Tel Aviv during one of the Birthright Israel trips each was leading last May.

"We started talking about how wonderful Israeli fashion is [and how] there has to be some way to bring what Israel has to offer to Canada," says Spagat, the cultural affairs director at the Israeli consulate in Toronto.

Israeli designers just haven't had the opportunity for exposure in the Canadian market, says Webber, the outreach co-ordinator for the Birthright Israel Alumni Community.

"They're ahead of their time," she says, adding that she has to limit herself to the number of items she brings back after each visit.

And the fashion, accessible to women of all ages, definitely has a "wow" factor, Webber says.

"It's sort of au couture without the Prada price tag," Spagat adds.

"A lot of it is very unique, that you wouldn't see someone walking by on the street wearing. It's all pretty high-quality fabrics. You won't find run-of-the-mill clothing," she says.

Anat Taiber is one of the designers who will be providing a selection of pieces for FashionEAST.

She is the only designer involved in the event currently living in Canada. The other 21 designers are shipping hundreds of signature pieces from Israel, with the event showcasing 10 clothing designers, eight jewelry designers, two shoe designers and two leather designers in total.

Taiber, a former interior designer, will be providing seven different looks from her line ANATA, including dresses and coats. She says her designs centre on bold fabrics and cuts that compliment women's figures.

"The dresses are very flattering on the body... The shape is amazing on," she says, adding that most Israeli fashion fits like a glove and is more European in terms of its lightness.

Entertainment Tonight Canada's host Cheryl Hickey and ET Canada correspondent Rosey Edeh have both worn Taiber's well-fitting designs on air, as well as Tara Spencer-Nairn, an actor in the sitcom Corner Gas.

While Taiber works with private boutiques in Toronto, such as Zola and Poa Studio, she says she isn't aware of any other Israeli designers in Canada.

"If someone wants to sell outside the country, they're selling in the U.S. They have more room in New York, for example, to expose themselves," she says.

But she hopes FashionEAST might help change that and show Canadians the talent Israeli designers have to offer.

Israeli fashion has remained a hidden gem because the issues of the Israeli conflict are at the forefront of people's minds, Webber says.

Some of the greatest design schools are located in Israel, Spagat says, including the Shenkar College of Engineering and Design, which she says is one of the best in the Middle East.

Anat Taiber, one of the designers who will be featured at FashionEAST, said her designs, shown in these images, are "very flattering on the body."

Both Webber and Spagat were inspired not only by the talent of Israeli designers, but by how much Birthright participants appreciate its fashion.

"It's very evident to see their reaction to the talent, the creativity. It's a huge part of Israeli culture, so to have it offered here in Canada is a huge cornerstone of the event," Webber says.

Part of their jobs as Birthright leaders is to keep the participants involved in Jewish and Israeli culture once they return to Canada.

"It's really easy for Birthright Israel participants to be enamoured while they're [in Israel]. But there's a disconnect when they get back, and that is why it is so important that we offer events and programs that target their interests, so that they want to get involved and in turn help build a stronger community," Webber says, adding that there are more than 60 Birthright alumni volunteers for FashionEAST.

But it wasn't just the volunteers who were behind the event.

"Every designer that we approached was more than enthralled with this opportunity," says Webber.

And to have the support of Beker, Canada's biggest fashion icon, Spagat says, is invaluable to their cause.

"The fact that she recognizes what is available in Israel signifies the importance of what we're trying to do with FashionEAST."

Election winners and losers

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

Analysis

In the chaos of the days after Israel's election, the possibilities for who will lead Israel's next government, and with what sort of coalition, seem endless.

However, if the parties are categorized by ideology, the noteworthy consequences of this election immediately become clear:

• Victory for the right wing

First and foremost, this election was a triumph for the right wing. Right-wing parties (not including the religious parties), picked up 18 seats in the 120-member Knesset. Left-wing parties lost eight seats. This analysis considers Labor, Kadima and Meretz left-wing parties, and Yisrael Beiteinu, Likud, Jewish Home and National Union right-wing parties.

Things look even worse for the left if the religious parties are counted as right wing – they are, although their major concerns are religious in nature – and if Kadima is counted as a centrist rather than a leftist party.

Kadima fits in the left-wing category because Tzipi Livni's approach to Arab-Israeli affairs is indistinguishable from that of Labor's. In a party without any clear ideology, the Kadima primary race last September essentially was a contest between a Kadima Laborite, Livni, and a Kadima Likudnik, Shaul Mofaz. The Laborite won.

Of course, the old distinctions between right and left no longer apply in Israel. All major parties, including Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu, favour a two-state solution with the Palestinians. Where they differ is how to achieve that solution, how quickly to accomplish it and in slight variations over the contours of the Palestinian state.

The primary difference between left and right in this election was that the left believes a two-state solution can be achieved now, whereas the right believes it's not possible now, given the radicalism and divisions among the Palestinians.

• Netanyahu's comeback

While Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu didn't do as well as some polls two months ago projected, his party still registered the biggest gains overall, and by a lot. Likud picked up 15 seats, rising to 27 from the 12 it won in a lacklustre showing in 2006.

• Kadima did not gain

Kadima actually lost ground last week. In the last election, in 2006, incumbent Prime Minister Ehud Olmert won 29 seats for his party. He had been prime minister for just under three months, having taken over when former prime minister Ariel Sharon suffered a massive stroke.

With Livni at the helm, Kadima captured 28 seats, one less than Olmert. To be fair, even this amount is remarkable given that her party's prime minister launched a failed war in Lebanon and, after two years of dilly-dallying, a war of indeterminate success in Gaza – to say nothing of the political corruption scandal that resulted in his resignation.

It appears that voters associated those failures with Olmert rather than Kadima or Livni herself, who served as Olmert's foreign minister throughout. It's also likely that traditional left-wing supporters of Labor, knowing that Labor had no chance of winning the election, threw their support behind Livni as the left-wing candidate of choice for prime minister.

• Arab parties grew

Israel's Arab parties picked up two seats, increasing their Knesset representation by 20 per cent. Balad, whose erstwhile leader, Azmi Bishara, fled Israel while under investigation for treason for passing on information about Israeli army positions to Hezbollah during the 2006 war, picked up one seat. Hadash, a mixed Jewish-Arab party, picked up another. The Knesset's third Arab party, Ra'am, held its own.

The gains, which came despite calls by some Arab Israeli community leaders to boycott Israel's elections, can be explained by the strong Arab opposition to Lieberman, whose positions threaten Israel's Arab citizens. Also, they can be attributed to a simple demographic fact: the Arab population of Israel is growing at a much faster rate than Israel's Jewish population.

Likud may offer top spots to Kadima, Lieberman

By MAZAL MUALEM, YAIR ETTINGER, LILY GALILI AND YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu was expected to offer the finance portfolio to Yisrael Beiteinu Avigdor Lieberman in order to pull the latter immediately into pledging to join a government under his authority.

Netanyahu was then expected to ask Kadima leader Tzipi Livni to join his coalition, and may have offered Livni the portfolio of foreign affairs and defence to Shaul Mofaz. Former prime minister Ariel Sharon offered Labor's Shimon Peres and Benjamin Ben Eliezer these portfolios in 2001, immediately after he was elected prime minister in a similar bid to forge a quick coalition.

The Likud leader told Ha'aretz last Wednesday that he planned to tell opposing parties to put aside their political differences and join his government, for the sake of national unity.

"I plan to create a wide coalition and I will tell the other parties, 'If you're worried about national interest, lay aside your political interests and join a government under my leadership,'" he said.

Despite her slim chance of being able to form a government, Livni on Feb. 11 pledged to make every effort to do so "for my voters." However, she said she would not pay "an exorbitant price" for other parties' agreement to join her.

Livni, who met Lieberman in Jerusalem on Feb. 11 in her own bid to build a coalition, said she could offer Lieberman support for two issues that are crucial to him: passing a law that would enable couples barred from religious Jewish marriage to marry in a civil union and making changes to the system of government.

At the very least, Livni is intent on convincing the Yisrael Beiteinu head not to recommend any party leader other than her to form the coalition.

Netanyahu, who commands a right-wing haredi bloc of 65 Knesset members, cannot support either issue due to opposition from the haredi parties.

"I can also put together a coalition that is united around the peace process. Netanyahu doesn't want that, and couldn't do it even if he did, with his right-wing partners," Livni said.

A day of coalition talks made it clear to Livni that Netanyahu had a considerable advantage in forming a government. However, she said she was determined to try, mainly for the sake of all the left-wing voters who abandoned Labor and Meretz and voted for her.

Livni said that if she failed to put together a coalition within a few days, she would have to decide between joining the opposition or a government headed by Netanyahu.

If Lieberman recommends Livni to President Shimon Peres as his choice for forming the government, she would immediately lose her recommendation from Labor and Meretz, political sources said.

Six months ago, with a bloc of 70 centre and left-wing Knesset members, Livni failed to form a coalition. Sources said she would not be able to do so with a 44-strong bloc consisting of Kadima, Meretz and Labor, or a hypothetical 43-strong bloc of Kadima and Yisrael Beiteinu.

Livni on Feb. 11 consulted with senior Kadima officials to decide on how they could act to torpedo a right-wing bloc led by Netanyahu.

Cabinet ministers Mofaz, Meir Sheetrit, Roni Bar-On and Haim Ramon and Knesset Speaker Dalia Itzik were among those in attendance.

Also on Feb. 11, Mofaz met with Shas leader Eli Yishai, who told him that Shas would join Netanyahu's coalition.

Despite Livni's vow to continue trying to forge a government, some Kadima officials have said Netanyahu would likely be the next prime minister. "We won the battle, but lost the war," said one minister.

According to the sources, Livni and Netanyahu are playing a complex game – she is unwilling to give up, and as long as she digs in her heels, he is forced to look to his "natural" coalition partners.

The more Netanyahu promises to the haredi Shas and far-right Habayit Hayehudi and National Union, the harder it would be for him to add Kadima to the coalition, and the harder it will be for Kadima to join him.

Kadima last week held preliminary talks with Likud to discuss the terms of a possible partnership.

Before offering any portfolios to Kadima, Netanyahu had to deal with the demands of Lieberman, Shas and United Torah Judaism in exchange for joining his coalition.

Sources close to Labor leader Ehud Barak said that he would take his party into opposition after its crushing election defeat.

The announcement came after almost all of Labor's MKs made it clear to Barak that they would not go with him to Netanyahu's government.

Lieberman loyalty proposal finds support in U.S.

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — As Yisrael Beiteinu vaulted into third place in Israel's elections, capturing 15 Knesset seats, several American Jewish organizational leaders defended the party's controversial leader, Avigdor Lieberman.

Some liberal Israeli and Jewish groups have condemned Lieberman as a fascist – the left-wing Meretz Party even compared him to the late far-right Austrian politician Joerg Haider – for his proposal to require Israeli citizens to sign an oath of allegiance to the Jewish state in a bid to curtail Israeli Arab political power.

But the Anti-Defamation League, an organization that is quick to spot instances of discrimination, says Lieberman is right to be concerned about apparent acts of disloyalty by Israeli Arabs.

Abraham Foxman, the ADL's national director, noted with concern the trips Arab Israeli Knesset members made to enemy states and expressions of solidarity with Hamas by Israeli Arabs during Israel's recent military operation in the Gaza Strip.

Avigdor Lieberman

"There were a lot of people who said, 'Hey, that's disloyal,'" Foxman told JTA. "That's what he's talking about. He's not saying expel them. He's not saying punish them."

Lieberman, 50, has proposed requiring a loyalty oath as a condition of Israeli citizenship. Those who refuse – Arab or Jewish – would have their citizenship revoked, though they'd be permitted to remain in the country as permanent residents.

"Arabs have all their rights in Israel, but they have no right to Eretz Yisrael," Lieberman said at the recent Herzliya Conference, an annual summit on Israeli state and security.

Morton Klein, president of the Zionist Organization of America, said he found Lieberman's proposal "legitimate."

Foxman promised to speak out if Lieberman advanced any legislative proposals not in keeping with the spirit of Israeli democracy, noting that the ADL had criticized his proposals in the past.

In 2006, the ADL issued a statement saying it was "disturbed" by Lieberman's call for the execution of Arab legislators who met with Hamas leaders.

Marc Stern, the acting co-executive director of the American Jewish Congress, noted that American Jews historically have been skeptical of or against loyalty oaths. He also pointed out that Lieberman's proposal would require all citizens to take loyalty oaths, not merely oaths by those seeking to become citizens.

Stern called Lieberman's proposal "not a serious solution to a very serious problem."

Ori Nir, a spokesperson for Americans for Peace Now, said that expressions of solidarity by Israeli Arabs with the enemies of Israel should be considered protected political speech, and that asking Israeli Arabs to sign a loyalty oath only would alienate them further.

"Once you put them on the spot, by the mere act of doing that you're going to alienate them in such a way that you will create security challenges to the state," Nir said. "You will put them on a spot where they will have to make some sort of a decision. That may lead some of them to a situation where they would say, 'You know what, the heck with you.'"

Israel Briefs

Mauritania closes mission

Mauritania has closed its embassy in Israel, the head of the country's military junta said. Gen. Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz said last week's move doesn't mean Mauritania, a predominantly Muslim country, is severing relations with Israel. Last month the Arab League country, one of three to have diplomatic relations with Israel, said it would suspend ties due to the military operation in Gaza. Thousands of Mauritanians protested the operation in the country's capital, Nouakchott.

Amnesty raps Hamas

Amnesty International issued a report on Hamas violence against Palestinians during Israel's military operation in Gaza. In its report, the human rights group states that at least two dozen men were killed by Hamas gunmen, and many more were kneecapped or otherwise tortured during and after Israel's military operation. It also confirms reports that some victims were executed in hospitals where they were being treated. Amnesty sent a fact-finding team to Gaza once the ceasefire was in force. Human rights groups have documented cases of execution and the torture of supporters of Fatah, the party led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Arms ship detained

Iran denied that a ship detained by Cyprus was carrying weapons to be delivered to Gaza. The ship, flying a Cypriot flag, was stopped and boarded last month by the U.S. Navy in the Red Sea. The U.S. Navy claimed to have found weapons on board, but could not confiscate them because of international agreements. Israeli media reported that officials suspected the ship of carrying weapons to Hezbollah in Lebanon or Hamas in Gaza. The boat's captain ignored a U.S. order to dock in Egypt for further inspections and instead headed for Cyprus. Cypriot officials wouldn't allow the ship to continue to Syria, its ostensible final destination, but allowed it to do so last Friday after ordering its cargo removed.

Holocaust denial 'intolerable,' Pope tells Jews

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

Pope Benedict XVI, trying to defuse a controversy over his rehabilitation of a bishop who denies the Holocaust, told Jewish leaders on Feb. 12 that "any denial or minimization of this terrible crime is intolerable."

The Pope made the comments in his first meeting with Jews since the controversy over traditionalist Bishop Richard Williamson began late last month. The Vatican decided to lift Williamson's excommunication, despite the bishop's denial of the full extent of the Holocaust and statement that there were no gas chambers.

Pope Benedict XVI

"The hatred and contempt for men, women and children that was manifested in the Shoah was a crime against humanity. This should be clear to everyone, especially to those standing in the tradition of the Holy Scriptures," the Pope told a group of about 60 Jewish leaders visiting the Vatican.

The German Pope recalled his own visit to Auschwitz in 2006 and, in some of the strongest words he has ever spoken about the Holocaust and relations with Jews, he said: "It is my fervent prayer that the memory of this appalling crime will strengthen our determination to heal the wounds that for too long have sullied relations between Christians and Jews."

He repeated the prayer that the late Pope John Paul II used when he visited Jerusalem's Western Wall in 2000 and asked forgiveness from Jews for Christians who had persecuted them in past centuries. "I now make his prayer my own," he added in his own words.

"This terrible chapter in our history [the Holocaust] must never be forgotten," the Pope told the Jewish delegation from the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, adding he hoped relations between Catholics and Jews can now grow stronger.

The Pope also confirmed that he plans to visit Israel. Vatican sources say the trip is expected for May.

Catholic-Jewish relations have been tense since Jan. 24,when Benedict readmitted four renegade ultra-conservative traditionalist bishops to the faith in an attempt to heal a schism that began in 1988 when they were ordained without Vatican permission.

The Jewish delegation to the Vatican was led by New York Rabbi Arthur Schneier, a Holocaust survivor. His synagogue is to host the pontiff during a visit to New York in April.

Before last week's meeting, Rabbi Schneier said he wanted to thank the Pope for his commitment to strong Catholic-Jewish ties, calling the controversy over Bishop Williamson a temporary setback to relations.

In an interview broadcast Jan. 21, Bishop Williamson told Swedish television: "I believe there were no gas chambers." He also said no more than 300,000 Jews died in Nazi camps.

The Vatican says Benedict didn't know about the bishop's views when he lifted the excommunications last month in a move that has drawn much criticism from the international Jewish community and world leaders.

Germany's Central Council of Jews is breaking off contact with the Catholic Church, and German Chancellor Angela Merkel urged the Pope to make a stronger statement against Holocaust denial.

Bishop Williamson has apologized to the German-born Pope for stirring controversy, but he hasn't repudiated his comments. In fact, he repeated his doubts about the Shoah in an interview this month in Der Spiegel magazine.

He told the German publication that he'd have to do research before he could consider complying with the Pope's demand. The English-born bishop, who lives in Argentina, told Der Spiegel he would only reconsider his views given convincing evidence.

In response, a French human rights group, the International League Against Racism and Anti-Semitism, said it will press charges against him for "contesting crimes against humanity" and denying the Holocaust in his comments to Der Spiegel.

Meanwhile, the bishop has been fired as head of the La Reja seminary near Buenos Aires. In a statement announcing his dismissal, Father Christian Bouchacourt, head of the Latin American chapter of the Catholic Society St. Pius X – the right-wing group that rejects reforms of the Second Vatican Council, including better relations with Jews – said that his "statements do not in any way reflect the position of our congregation."

The Pius X society has also kicked out an Italian member who publicly sided with the bishop. Floriano Abrahamowicz said he doesn't believe gas chambers at death camps were used to kill people.

Educator support group to shut down

By JACOB BERKMAN

NEW YORK — The Coalition for the Advancement of Jewish Education will close at the end of this month.

Last week's e-mail announcement came a month after CAJE, the New York-based organization that for 30 years has been the primary professional development organization for congregational and Hebrew school teachers, said it would not hold its annual conference.

CAJE said in the e-mail that it could no longer survive in this economic climate.

Its annual conference on Jewish education drew some 1,000 educators, but in January, CAJE said it would not hold this year's event because local Jewish agencies could not afford to send teachers to participate and the organization could not drum up enough funding to pay for the conference.

Seymour Epstein

In the e-mail, CAJE said it was seeking funds to pay off some $500,000 in debt incurred to hold conferences over the past several years.

"It is a major tragedy for Jewish education, and I think it will be missed," CAJE executive director Jeffrey Lasday told JTA.

"Now we have to look at how local and national organizations can be working closer together. My colleagues at other agencies say their agencies are closing down or losing staff. This is an opportunity to rethink how we work together to better education with national and local organizations," he said. "Now is the time to rethink the whole thing."

Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's senior vice-president for the Mercaz and a CAJE founder, said the imminent closing is "a serious loss."

In addition to giving educators in Jewish schools "a sense of community across the border" through its annual conferences, CAJE produced "wonderful [resource] materials," said Epstein.

The organization – which has had 136 Canadian members since 2005, including about 50 in the past year – is working closely with the Jewish Education Service of North America (JESNA) in the hope that there will be "a CAJE-type conference" in 2010, Lasday told The CJN.

Conservative rabbis want Chief Rabbinate privatized

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Conservative rabbinical association has passed a resolution calling for for the dissolution of Israel's Chief Rabbinate as a governmental organization.

Instead, the resolution calls on Israel to privatize the Chief Rabbinate and concludes by calling for financial resources to be allocated equitably to the major streams of Judaism.

"In general, there's a sense of the need to move toward a greater separation of synagogue and state," said Toronto's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, one of about 300 rabbis and one of about 10 Canadian rabbis to attend last week's annual Rabbinical Assembly convention in Jerusalem.

In a phone interview from Israel last Thursday, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that there's "a sense of alienation in Israel on the part of the vast majority of Israelis, certainly of moderately traditional and, more so, secular Israelis from the chief rabbinate, which is also connected to an alienation from much of traditional Judaism."

Liberal North American rabbis have had a number of squabbles over the years with Israeli religious authorities, who wield state power through their control of several hot-button issues, including marriage and conversion. The rabbinate, which is made up largely of haredi rabbis, has even run afoul of liberal Orthodox rabbis in the United States, who accuse it of taking unnecessarily strict and authoritarian religious positions.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin, a York University Jewish studies professor who has Orthodox smichah, told The CJN that at many points in history, the Israeli Chief Rabbinate was "a wonderful institution that was a source of great inspiration to many Jews."

He said that, from one perspective, the resolution "seems very sad," but he said he also understands "the frustration that many people are feeling with the Chief Rabbinate as it is constituted."

Rabbi Lockshin said he believes there has to be "a further separation of synagogue and state in the State of Israel."

"I'd be in favour of civil marriages and divorces," he added. "If the Chief Rabbinate is not controlling areas of personal status, it can be a force for intellectual and religious growth for the Jewish people."

Instead of marrying under the auspices of the Chief Rabbinate, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said, a significant number of Israelis are living together or going abroad to get married.

In some cases, couples have a civil marriage abroad and return to Israeli to be married under Masorti (Conservative) auspices, he said.

"People are trying in many ways. They want to be Jewish, and they may not be Jewish completely in the traditional way. We need to find a way to make them part of the large majority and find a way that they can marry within Israel, or there will be more problems down the road."

The Rabbinical Assembly took up more than a dozen resolutions at the convention.

Among them was one on marriage and another on conversion. Draft versions, respectively, called for the Israeli government to license rabbis from all branches of Judaism to officiate at weddings and to recognize Masorti conversions performed in Israel. Final versions were not available at press time.

Mass. college divests from six Israeli firms

JTA

BOSTON — Hampshire College is believed to be the first American college or university to divest from companies deemed to be supporting Israel's occupation of the West Bank.

The board of trustees of the Amherst, Mass., liberal arts college approved a proposal on Feb. 7 that would divest school funds from six companies deemed to be complicit in the Israeli occupation – Caterpillar, United Technologies, General Electric, ITT Corp., Motorola and Terex.

The university, a private school with 1,350 students, said the move was part of a largerreview that led to divestment from more than 200 companies that violated that college's standards for social responsibility.

The college emphasized that the Feb. 7 decision made no reference to any particular country, but it acknowledged the review was initiated by a student group, Students for Justice in Palestine.

Divestment efforts and academic boycotts of Israel have largely failed, both in the United States and abroad. A divestment push at Harvard University drew a rebuke from Lawrence Summers, then the university president and current Obama administration official.

את הבחירות לכנסת בליתי בהוואי, שם הייתי אחראי על קלפי של לוויתנים. חלקם קפצו ימינה, חלקם שמאלה, אבל בגלל שהוואי נמצאת בדיוק שנים עשר אזורי זמן מישראל, נפתחו הקלפיות כאן בדיוק כשהן נסגרו בארץ, וכך לברישים של הוואי היתה השפעה הרבה יותר גדולה מגודלם המספרי.

בישראל רשאי להצביע רק מי שיש לו כתובת בישראל ושמופיע בפנקס הבוחרים, אבל הוא צריך לטוס ארצה. מעטים מממשים את זכותם זו, או בשל ההוצאה הכרוכה והבלאגן, או משום שהם סבורים שזה לא עניינם, או אפילו לא זכותם, להצביע במקום שבחרו שלא לגור בו.

New adaptation of Miss Julie focuses on racial tension

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

CanStage is celebrating Black History Month with the Canadian premiere of Miss Julie: Freedom Summer.

This adaptation, which was nominated for the LA Drama Critics Circle Award, was written and directed by Stephen Sachs. It was inspired by Miss Julie, the controversial August Strindberg classic written 121 years ago.

Miss Julie pitted class, gender and sexuality against shifting moralities. Although today it is considered an extraordinary piece of work, it was banned from public performance until the early 20th century because of its scandalous nature.

In this new adaptation, Sachs throws race into the mix. It is set in 1964 in Greenwood, Miss., just two days after president Lyndon Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act, when racial tensions were really high.

"The issue of racial tension is much more relevant to me today than the original issue of class struggle, which Strindberg wrote about in his play in 1888," explains Sachs, 49, the Los Angeles-based writer/director.

"Race is so much a part of the DNA of my country and of Canada, and I think of many countries today. Racial tension is something I get and immediately feel as an American – it is so much a part of who we are, something we've grown up with and fought over and struggled with as a country. To me, adapting the play and making it about racial and sexual tension made it something I could immediately identify with."

Play is also about sexual power struggle

Miss Julie: Freedom Summer premiered in Los Angeles in February 2007 at the award-winning Fountain Theatre which Sachs co-founded in 1990 and of which he is the artistic director.

Julie (Caroline Cave), the daughter of a wealthy Superior Court judge, begins a dangerous liaison with John (Kevin Hanchard), her father's African-American chauffeur, shattering societal barriers and lives. John's fiancée, Christine (Raven Dauda), the household cook, must take a stand. Tragedy becomes unavoidable.

"The thing that makes it more pertinent, exciting and relevant than when we originally produced it in Los Angeles is that we elected a black president," Sachs says. "When we first launched this play, I don't think any of us would have imagined it possible. [This] makes the play even more relevant.

"When you think about the characters in this play in 1964, it was a time in our country when many of the citizens in the south were denied the right to vote because they were black, and now, a little more than 45 years later, we have elected a black president. The play gives us the opportunity to look back and see how far we've come, and also to be reminded, I think, how far we need to go, because there are still hidden prejudices in all of us."

Julie begins a dangerous liaison with her father's black driver in this new adaptation of Miss Julie, now playing at Bluma Appel Theatre.

He says Miss Julie: Freedom Summer is about more than just racial tension, it is also about a sexual power struggle. It is about the allure of what is considered taboo and the need to cross the barrier lines between men and women, black and white, rich and poor.

Sachs wants to shake audiences up by having them experience something compelling, riveting, disturbing and funny, and by getting them to think and to be aroused, because it a very sexy play with a lot of sensuality and violence.

"I'm always drawn to material about the feelings of the other in society. I'm drawn to stories of conflict, struggle and overcoming obstacles, which I think is very much part of Jewish tradition," he says.

Sachs' plays include Central Avenue, Open Window and Sweet Nothing in my Ear, which he adapted as a CBS television movie in 2008 starring Jeff Daniels and Marlee Matlin. He has also directed works by internationally acclaimed playwright Athol Fugard and others. Sachs will soon be directing Fugard's newest play, Coming Home, at the Fountain, followed by the Los Angeles premiere of Shining City by Conor McPherson

The former stage, movie and television actor says there are times when he most enjoys directing plays, but when he gets too involved with the business of running the theatre he enjoys going into writer mode.

"I really do enjoy the solitude of writing a play and being able to focus on that. It's immensely rewarding to be able to see the play come alive on stage. It is thrilling to see the play do well."

Miss Julie: Freedom Summer is a co-production of The Canadian Stage Company and Vancouver Playhouse Theatre. It runs until March 7 at the Bluma Appel Theatre, 27 Front St. E. For tickets call 416-368-3110 or visit www.canstage.com.

MONTREAL WRITER WINS PLAYWRITING COMPETITION

Montreal playwright and librettist Alexis Diamond has won the 2008 Canadian Jewish Playwriting contest for her play Strange Land, which focuses on a Jewish family's struggle to survive the Montreal anti-Semitic riot of 1942. The prize is a professionally directed and acted workshop in a Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre Between Stages Playwright's Reading in the fall of 2009.

The MNJCC has been producing theatrical readings in a workshop environment since 1995. Dave Carley (A View from the Roof, 1995) and Brandon Marlon (The Bleeding Season, 2008) are among numerous playwrights who have won an opportunity to hear their works read by professional actors and receive feedback from an informal audience.

Three previous winners have been published and have hit the commercial stages: Einstein's Gift by Vern Thiessen, Sara's Cave by Don Molnar, and Yahrzeit by Alex Poch Goldin.

The Dybbuk on Bathurst: Teatron Theatre presents a new production of S. Anski's The Dybbuk. The play offers a love story of a different kind, where otherworldly forces are at work in a simple village in eastern Europe. A staple of the Yiddish Theatre, the romantic drama has become a classic of the modern theatre.

The new adaptation by Teatron artistic director Ari Weisberg follows the text of the original Habima production, including the poems by Israel's national poet, Chaim Nachman Bialik. The poems were translated by Weisberg and set to music by Yehudit Shier Weisberg. "I'm excited to have the opportunity to direct this play, which I read and worked on at Queen's University so many years ago," Ari Weisberg said.

The 21-actor cast is led by Howard Jerome as Reb Azrielke and features Mark Albert as Sender, Ron Boyd as the Messenger, Jonah Hundert as Chonnon and Sarah Illiatovitch-Goldman as Leye. $18 to $44. Movie pays tribute to Chess Records, black performers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Think of American music and names like Chuck Berry, McKinley Morganfield, a.k.a. Muddy Waters, and Etta James come to mind.

But what about Lejzor Czyz?

You'll be forgiven if his name does not strike a chord of recognition.

Czyz, a Polish Jew who immigrated to the United States in 1928 to join his family in Chicago, later changed his name to Leonard Chess.

As Leonard Chess, he and his brother, Philip, founded Aristocrat Records, which was subsequently known as Chess Records.

Their company nurtured African-American singers and promoted cutting-edge rhythm and blues and rock 'n' roll recordings that influenced, among others, Elvis Presley, Eric Clapton, The Beatles, the Beach Boys and the Rolling Stones.

Darnel Martin's biopic of Leonard Chess, Cadillac Records, is scheduled to open in Toronto on Friday, Feb. 20, at the Bloor Cinema. It is presented by the Bloor Cinema and the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Set in the late 1940s and '50s, Cadillac Records stars Adrien Brody as Chess, Jeffrey Wright as Waters, Mos Def as Berry and Beyoncé Knowles as James.

The movie, nearly two hours in length, is essentially a tribute to these musical innovators rather than a portrait of Chess.

Chess is depicted as a savvy businessman who happened to be an astute connoisseur of black music. Oddly enough, Chess' brother is completely omitted from the script.

The film, which unfolds against the backdrop of a society still in the thrall of segregation, begins as Chess, then a struggling junkyard dealer, promises his girlfriend's gruff father that he will be a success one day.

The scene shifts to the Macomba Lounge, a nightclub run by the Chess brothers. The smoke-filled, disreputable club becomes a venue for new but talented entertainers.

Chess, who has an eye for up-and-coming talent, spots Waters, a hard-living womanizer from the cotton fields of Mississippi. As the Chess record label catches fire, he recruits still more clients.

Thanks to Waters and Berry, the Chess label moves beyond the strict confines of "race records" and crosses over into the profitable mainstream market.

Beyoncé Knowles plays Etta James.

As a token of appreciation for their efforts, Chess gives each of his stars a Cadillac car, the ultimate American status symbol.

Chess, himself an immigrant who makes good, drives a blue Caddy.

Cadillac Records is in top form when the legendary songs of love and loss and hope and despair fill the screen with their power and poignancy. Otherwise, it tends to be a rather pedestrian film.

Beyoncé, portraying the difficult, drug-addled daughter of a prostitute, is magnetic and electrifying. The songs she belts out leave a viewer in awe.

By comparison, Brody seems pale and ineffective. Wright and Def, however, deliver credible, even stirring performances.

In short, Cadillac Records pays homage not only to Chess but to the pantheon of black performers who revolutionized popular music in America.

Chutzpah! Festival features performers from around the world

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

Israel's Batsheva Dance Company.

VANCOUVER — The city's Chutzpah! Festival, which includes music, theatre and dance and features artists from around the world, opens today and runs through March 1.

This year's lineup includes Israel's Batsheva Dance Company; Grammy Award-winners The Klezmatics, who are teaming up with African-American gospel singer Joshua Nelson; and a jazz-blues comedy cabaret by Rain Pryor, daughter of the late comedian Richard Pryor.

The opening night gala features comedians Ross Bennett, Brad Zimmerman, Tom Cotter and Cory Kahaney in Pastrami on Rye…With Mayo, while other highlights include a performance by the Andy Statman Trio, whose CD, East Flatbush Blues, was nominated for a 2008 Grammy Award.

Excitement for the Vancouver 2010 Olympic Winter Games is mounting, and this year's Chutzpah! Festival coincides with performances that form part of the Vancouver Cultural Olympiad 2009, a few weeks of artistic celebration in the city.

The Olympiad has given financial and marketing support to Chutzpah! since 2008 and will continue to do so until 2010. "It's been a great partnership, and it's too bad it has to end next year," says Mary Louise Albert, the festival's managing director and the artistic managing director of the Norman Rothstein Theatre in Vancouver.

While most of the Chutzpah! performances will take place at the Norman Rothstein Theatre and the Wosk Cabaret at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, this year a few other venues have been added for Chutzpah! productions. Audiences will also be applauding in the auditoriums of the Chan Centre for Performing Arts at the University of British Columbia, the Vancouver Playhouse and the Firehall Arts Centre.

That means an even wider exposure to the greater community than usual, says Albert, who expects a festival turnout of approximately 8,000. "We always get a larger audience than just the Jewish community, but this year's festival will increase opportunities for the general and Jewish community to see professional art that has a link with a broad range of what it is to be Jewish."

The Chutzpah! Festival: The Lisa Nemetz International Showcase of Jewish Performing Arts was named for Lisa Nemetz, a dancer, lawyer and arts advocate. A Vancouverite, Nemetz died of breast cancer in 1997, while in her early 30s. Her husband, David Levi, is an ongoing supporter of the festival in honour of her memory.

The website address of the Chutzpah! Festival is www.chutzpahfestival.com.

Survivor's battle to retrieve her art

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The story of how Maria Altmann, an elderly Holocaust survivor, took on the Austrian government to reclaim her family's looted Gustav Klimt paintings is a fascinating David and Goliath story.

Adele's Wish, a documentary that recounts Altmann's experience, gets its Toronto premiere at the Canadian Art Reel Artists Film Festival, running from Feb. 26 to March 1.

The film, directed by Terrence Turner, is as informative as it is thrilling. The story is told as a series of interviews with many people – lawyers, professors, historians and Altmann herself – seamlessly edited together as a continuing narrative.

Altmannn is the niece of Adele Bloch-Bauer, whose husband Fritz commissioned famed Austrian painter Gustav Klimt to paint two portraits of Adele in the early 20th century.

These paintings and three other Klimts were stolen from the Bloch-Bauer estate by the Nazis in 1938 after the annexation of Austria. After the war, the paintings were housed in the Austrian National Gallery.

After a 1998 repatriation law was passed in Austria, supposedly making it easier for Holocaust Survivor families to reclaim their looted possessions, Altmann, now in the United States, attempted to get back the Klimt paintings.

However, the Austrian government was reluctant to give up these priceless paintings, arguing that Adele, who died in 1937, had bequeathed them to the National Gallery in her will.

Altmann hired lawyers to pursue her case, and the Austrian government put up hurdles at every turn. What followed was a battle, not just legal but moral and ethical, that ended up involving the U.S. government and the Supreme Court.

Adele's Wish is a highly enjoyable and well put together documentary that tells this, at times complex, legal drama in a fast-paced and easily understandable fashion.

Adele's Wish screens March 1 at 2:30 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave.

The Canadian Art Reel Artists Film Festival is a project of the Canadian Art Foundation and is in its sixth year.

Other highlights include the world premiere of a film on David Lynch's exceptional art practice, the Canadian premiere of a film on the psychological portraits of Alice Neel, and the world premiere of Georg Baselitz: Making Art after Auschwitz and Dresden, an engrossing profile of the postwar German artist who, literally, turned the art world upside down.

For tickets and other information, go to www.canadianart.ca/reelartists or call 416-368-8854, ext. 102.

A masterpiece of scholarship on Jewish names

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

When the first edition of Alexander Beider's Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Russian Empire came out in 1993, it was hailed in genealogical circles as one of the most important books ever printed about Jewish surnames. His subsequent compilations of Jewish surnames from Poland, Galicia and other regions have only solidified his reputation as a foremost authority in the field.

Alexander Beider

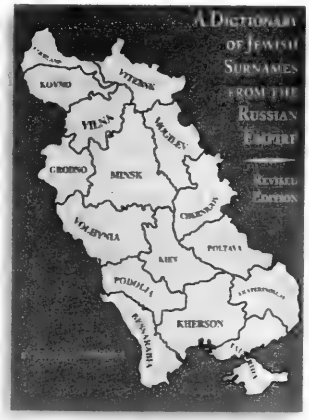
Beider recently updated the Dictionary of Jewish Surnames from the Russian Empire, a Herculean task that took four years. The revised edition has just been published by Avotaynu, the New Jersey-based Jewish genealogical publishing house. At 1,000 pages in hardcover, it's nearly 50 per cent larger than its predecessor. The original work has about 50,000 surname entries, the new and improved version about 74,000.

Beider considered the revision necessary because of the explosion of new sources and knowledge that has occurred over the last 15 years due to the collapse of the former Soviet Union, the rise of the Internet, and the publication of numerous related new works. He expanded the work's geographical range, altered hundreds of entries and added many new cross-references.

The Moscow-born statistician, linguist and onomastician, who has lived in Paris since 1990, is credited with almost single-handedly revolutionizing the field of Jewish onomastics. Before Beider, most researchers rehashed names and ideas from the published literature with little scientific method and little regard to where the names occurred geographically. One of Beider's central methodological principles was to link surnames to the geographical regions in which they originated, and he was the first to do an inductive survey of surnames based on primary sources such as old voters' lists, censuses, civil records and other archival material.

Browsing through the dictionary reminds us how often our surnames contain capsulized references to our ancestral past. In the late 18th and early 19th centuries, when Russian Jews were obliged to adopt surnames, many took names of patronymic or matronymic origin – derived from a father's or mother's name – reflecting traditional Hebrew naming customs. Such names include Meyerovitz (son of Meyer), Davidovitz (son of David) and Gitlin (from the female name Gitl), thus preserving the name of an ancestor.

The plentiful class of surnames inspired by occupations offer glimpses of an outmoded village way of life. The name Bodgas (from German), for instance, means "bathhouse"; Cherednyak (Belarusian) is "cattle shepherd"; Drach (Yiddish) is "hand mill"; Fajnshrajber (Yiddish) is "calligrapher"; Gitelmakher (Yiddish) is "cap maker"; Goren (Ukrainian) is "forging furnace"; Katsov (Hebrew) is "butcher"; Latkemakher (Yiddish) is "maker of pancakes"; Milkhiker (German) is "dairyman"; Pakhter (Yiddish) is "leaseholder"; Plytnik (Belarusian) is "raft driver"; Shkolnik (Belarusian) is "beadle, sexton in a synagogue"; and Torgovets is "tradesman" (Russian).



Surnames derived from place-names are also common. The name Bobrushkin is linked to the town of Bobrujsk; Drubicher is linked to Drubich; Gordon to Grodno; Mogilevich to Mogilev; Polyakov to Polyak; Slobodkin to Slobodka; and Usyshkin to the Usyskin River. Many surnames are unique to a particular town or region but may be difficult or impossible to find on a map. (For assistance, see the book Where Once We Walked, the award-winning shtetl locator by Gary Mokotoff and Sallyann Sack.)

When surnames became mandatory, many Jews took names based on personal characteristics (such as Langbart, meaning "long beard") or pleasant associations (Feldblum, Goldberg, Rosenstein, Silverman). A small but well-documented subcategory of "ridiculous" surnames includes such monickers as Brodavka (wart) and Dolgoshiya (long-necked). One pictures disdainful bureaucrats holding their noses as they assign laughable and even disrespectful last names to the poor Jewish applicants summoned to appear before them.

Other surname categories include rabbinical names and names of Kohen or Levite origin. For example, Beider links the famous name of Chagall to Segal, a Kohenite acronym of Hebrew origin dating back to the 11th century.

The dictionary's 200-page introductory section illuminates the dark process of how Jews acquired their family names. These opening chapters discuss the history of Jewish names in Eastern Europe, their types and morphology and linguistic aspects, the patterns of their adoption, the overlap of Jewish and Gentile surnames, and the author's scientific approach. Although densely written and highly technical, this material may fascinate those seeking to understand how, when and why Jewish surnames derived in the former Pale of Settlement.

A statistician at heart, Beider throws in statistical charts whenever possible, such as his percentage tables of the most common Jewish surnames in the various Russian provinces. Based on 1912 data, the most common names in Vitebsk region were: Kagan, Levin, Gurevich, Ginzburg, Ioffe, Rabinovich, Sverdlov, Raport, Shapiro and Livshits. The list for Grodno shows Kaplan, Levin, Lev, Epshtejn, Kagan, Goldberg, Fridman, Shapiro, Rabinovich and Vajnshtejn.

Despite the high reliance on mathematics, the science of Jewish surnames can never be exact, since overlapping layers of meaning and language inevitably lead to ambiguities. Beider's forthright discussions of such ambiguous derivations are enlightening. One must applaud his unfailing fidelity to the facts and his refusal to alter them to fit theoretical constructs.

Those who wish merely to look up the etymology of a surname should turn directly to the dictionary of Surnames, which takes up the remaining 800 pages of the book. A smaller softcover volume accompanies the dictionary and provides an invaluable Soundex listing of all the surnames within, so the correct entry may be found no matter how the name is spelled.

Before consulting the dictionary, it's best to have some basic knowledge about the surname one is curious about. It's important to know, for example, that the name Chambers was once Cherkofsky, Pearson was once Persovsky, or Yarmouth was once Yarmolinsky. Many of our old-fashioned names did not survive the Holocaust or the process of immigration to the New World and the dual cultural influences of anglicization and Americanization.

Ardent genealogists may want a dictionary of their own for home use; others will be content to consult it in a synagogue or reference library. Beider's dictionaries for Poland, Galicia and other regions are also recommended.

Jewish sports leagues to begin in spring

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Alex Voihanski has run sports leagues before. He's organized some of the city's biggest baseball and basketball leagues – one with 90 teams – and earlier this winter, he recruited and coached a group of Jewish hockey players who won the gold medal in the Canadian Multicultural Hockey League championship.

Now he's set his sights on something just as challenging, but with a payoff that might even be bigger. Voihanski, through his company Chai Life Sports, is planning to open sports leagues aimed at Jewish youngsters living in the GTA.

The leagues, which will be geared initially for kids from five to 12, will kick off in May with T-ball, softball and soccer. That will be followed by summer leagues for kids attending sports camps, and come fall and winter, hockey will be added to the sporting menu.

Chai Life will sponsor a launch party on Sunday March 29, from 2 to 4 p.m. at Pavilion Arena. It will include a free skate, music by Magen Boys Entertainment and activities for kids.

Voihanski, who cut his teeth operating B'nai Brith Canada's softball, hockey and basketball leagues, sees sports as a means to an end.

It's not just a way to have fun and get exercise, but it can also address the problem of assimilation by providing a vehicle to bring young Jews together and strengthen their Jewish identities, he said.

"I'm a very passionate person, especially in terms of Judaism and Israel," he said. "I see assimilation, and we need programs to bring these kids together."

Sport is something most youngsters enjoy and seeing successful Jewish athletes instils pride in young kids. It can be the glue to bring youngsters closer to their Jewish roots, Voihanski said.

What's more, "you never know when you bring kids together – you can find a diamond in the rough or a future community leader."

With his partner, Jeremy Blustein, and supported by an advisory board of prominent community members, Voihanski is hoping to attract hundreds of kids to the league's inaugural season, which will not play on Shabbat.

Alex Voihanski

He hopes to field eight soccer teams serving roughly 100 children playing in two divisions. Like other neighbourhood leagues, the Jewish circuit will rely on parent volunteers to coach and run scrimmages. Players will be divided by age, with five and six-year-olds playing together and older kids in the other division.

"We're big in terms of development and teaching technique, with zero tolerance for hitting and verbal stuff," he said.

The softball league, geared for nine-to- 12-year-olds, also gets underway in May. The kids will play "modified softball," the most popular variant of the game in which pitchers throw underhand, but without the power-generating windmill motion. Ninety per cent of the 90-team B'nai Brith league he organizes plays that style of game, he said.

T-ball is aimed at the younger crowd, those five to eight years of age.

Voihanski expects to field four T-ball and four softball teams. Games will be played in North York and Thornhill.

Hockey, which begins in September, will be held at the Pavilion on Sundays. He expects to ice 10 to 12 teams for children aged five to 12.

Basketball will also be played at the Pavilion for kids five to 12.

Voihanski's goal is to expand the league as participants reach their teens.

The league is primarily recreational in nature. Players in every sport will get one game and one practice a week and fees are expected to be in the $150 to $200 range for T-ball, softball and soccer. The cost of ice rental will likely push hockey fees closer to $400, he said.

All the leagues are non-profit, Voihanski said. "I do this because it's a passion for both Jeremy and I. We're both proud Jews."

A partnership with potential

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

The first column I wrote for this newspaper, dated Jan. 5, 2006, was about a new minyan that had just started up in Toronto. Kehillat Or Chadash was the city's first egalitarian halachic prayer group – meaning that women were invited (actually, encouraged) to participate and lead the minyan, albeit within restrictions based on a modern Orthodox understanding of halachah.

Or Chadash was successful, for a while. The shul was run by a group of university students, held most of its minyanim at the Wolfond Centre on the campus of the University of Toronto, and was mainly attended by university students. Ultimately, when the original organizers moved on, Kehillat Or Chadash died.

Three years later, a new egalitarian halachic minyan has emerged in Toronto. The Toronto Partnership Minyan (TPM) is run along the same lines as the earlier iteration – women can read from the Torah, receive certain aliyot and lead various parts of the prayer service. But there is one very significant difference: TPM is organized and run by a group whose average age, I would guess, hovers around 40. (Full disclosure: my father, who brings the median age up, is one of the founders of TPM.)

On a recent Shabbat morning, TPM held a minyan on the edge of Bathurst Manor, in the chapel of the Toronto Heschel School. About 50 people were there, and the mixture of "kinds" of attendees was remarkable. There were a few young couples (some even brought their infant children), people in their 30s and 40s, and some in their 50s and 60s. And while the majority of those present would have normally found themselves in an Orthodox shul on a Shabbat morning, others usually attend Conservative shuls – and some don't go to shul on a regular basis at all.

It may seem counter-intuitive, but TPM stands a better chance of flourishing than Or Chadash ever did, because its founders and leaders are older. One might have concluded otherwise a few years ago, when a bunch of university students seemed to be the only Jews in Toronto with the will to try something different. Perhaps the oldies were a little slower to get going, but now that TPM is up and running, the commitment to maintain and grow an egalitarian halachic minyan appears strong. These people are in it for the long haul.

The birth of TPM is a win-win for Toronto Jews. Whether or not you subscribe to the minyan's brand of Judaism (and regardless of whether you plan to attend one of its future Shabbat services), it's essential that there be comfortable places for Jews of all stripes to express their religiousness. True, there are so many interpretations of what it means to be Jewish out there already, but adding one more means that at least a few more people will have a shul that they can happily call home.

Of course, synagogues don't run by themselves. They need support, both of the monetary kind and the suggestion/constructive criticism kind. To that end, TPM is teaming up with Eran Marom, kosher Toronto's most innovative chef for a Pesach cooking demonstration and wine-pairing tutorial on March 19. Chef Marom has been winning fans, including me, ever since his restaurant, Marron Bistro Moderne, opened on Eglinton Avenue two years ago. Kosher eaters in this city have never had anything like Marron. It features inventive, exotic and hearty food, served in a quiet, intimate environment. I'd eat there every week if I could afford to.

I would urge everyone to learn more about the Toronto Partnership Minyan. This is a promising and dedicated group performing an invaluable service for Toronto's Jewish community. We should all do what we can to help TPM flourish.

BLUEBERRY POPPY SEED COFFEECAKE FOR PURIM

Batter:
- 2/3 c sugar
- 2 tsp lemon zest, grated
- 1-1/2 c flour
- 1/2 tsp baking soda
- 1/2 c sour cream
- 1/2 c butter
- 1 lg egg
- 2 tbsp poppy seeds
- 1/4 tsp salt

Filling:
- 1/3 c sugar
- 2 c fresh or frozen blueberries, washed and drained
- 1 tbsp flour
- 1/4 tsp nutmeg

Preheat oven at 350°F. Grease and flour a 9" springform pan. In a bowl beat sugar and butter until fluffy. Add lemon zest and egg; beat a couple minutes at medium speed. In another bowl mix flour, poppy seeds, baking soda, and salt. Add to butter mixture alternately with sour cream. Spread batter over pan, up 1" on the side.

In another bowl combine filling ingredients and spoon over batter. Bake for 45-50 min. Cool. Sprinkle icing sugar on top when cooled.

PURIM PLAY

These costumed young actors appeared in a Purim play at the old Holy Blossom Temple on Bond Street around 1920. Perhaps the play was about the Purim drama itself. Pictured, from left, are Arthur Cohen, Abe Cohen, Sam Nelson, Harry Hertzman, Louis Goodman, Norman Cowan (?), Sam Coffler and Lionel Cohen. Well-known Toronto photographer William James took the picture.

Rabbis, professors and Jews: laryngitis?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Our community is suffering from laryngitis. We have a giant frog in our collective throat and refuse to gargle with a solution that will clear our trachea, allowing our voices to be heard.

This condition is not terribly new nor is it just local. It has been widespread and highlighted throughout the generations by Jewish sages such as Maimonides, who counselled the Jewish world not to remain silent while under siege.

Today, a serious battle we are fighting from within is with fundamentalism, as haredi leaders set back progressive Orthodoxy and Jewish life, sensing it to be secular or goyish. Recently, the beit din of Israel decided an Orthodox conversion that happened three decades ago is null, as the person did not live a halachic life thereafter. This has terrifying ramifications, since it means thousands of conversions might be nullified, leaving many Jews and their children as non-Jews.

This shift is indeed a siege, however, an equal or perhaps greater one is the fact that few local rabbinical voices decried this damaging decree, as well as the continual rise of haredi influence on our community.

So where are they? What of our rabbis while fundamentalism creeps up on us? Why are they so hushed when imams, bishops and ministers attack Israel on its dealings in Gaza? We desperately need them to fight for us.

(In the case of the haredi challenge, the truth is that many of our local rabbis are quiet because they fear being ostracized by this group that is imposing their fundamentalist views on the rest of us. Those fears are justified. There are numerous examples of compassionate rabbis around the world challenging haredi leadership and subsequently fearing for their futures. Strangely, we are critical of other religious groups for stymieing the views of their moderate members, but we rarely take a moment to consider religious bullying within our own ranks. Those people we often perceive as being the guardians of Jewish practice and tradition are often the stumbling blocks of rational Jewish expression and modernity.)

And where are our Jewish professors on campus to help deal with people like Canadian Union of Public Employees president Sid Ryan, a man of inflammatory, anti-Israel rhetoric. What has clogged the voice boxes of our academics who work alongside some of their sinister colleagues who attack Israel whenever a bell rings signalling the end of a class? Your silence leaves our Jewish students with the sense they are the sole protectors of Israel and the Jewish people on campus.

The loudest quiet, however, emanates from regular folk like Moshe and Rachel Jewish community member. We are in the midst of a global crisis that weighs heavily on the Jewish people, and the vast majority of our members remain soundless.

Granted, there are few opportunities for individuals to get involved in the fight, but that aside, why do we rarely hear a voice from the street calling out to our leadership to include us in the process of fighting fundamentalism and combating anti-Semites and haters of Israel right here at home in Toronto? Few get involved, but most of us claim we just didn't hear the yelling.

I love the Jewish people and I love this community. I therefore feel compelled to be critical and question why we're being so damned muted, so comfortable, when trouble has come our way once again. Get up and fight rabbis, professors and Moshe and Rachel. Laryngitis has a cure. It is called Jewish strength and eternal vigilance..

A fantasy comes true

By KIM ADES and ALLAN FRIEDMAN
Special to The CJN

After a very rough week, I decided to try a little self-coaching to improve my frame of mind. Trade up. Think of a slightly better thought and then think of one that's better than that. Think about something that makes me feel good.

I began with a conversation with God.

"OK God. I am ready for you to bring me the man of my dreams. Tell him to just come and get me because I'm ready. Make him warm and kind and loving, and make him great with kids. Also God, make sure that we have similar values and that my family likes him. Please make him the kind of guy who knows, without a shadow of a doubt, that I am what he wants, and make him very comfortable expressing that thought regularly. I hope I am not being too demanding God, but please make sure he is attractive and not too short."

Then I launched into a full-blown fantasy.

The phone rings.

I answer, "Hello."

"Hi Kim. My name is Jake [I pulled a name out of thin air]. I got your number from such and such and they said I had to call you because you were my perfect match. They said that if I didn't call, I would be missing an opportunity of a lifetime to meet my soulmate."

The fantasy left such an impact on me that a few days later, I shared it with a friend. That very same evening, I received a message on my voice mail: "Hi Kim, my name is Allan Friedman. I got your name from a teacher at my school and they are under the impression that we should meet."

Holy smokes! My fantasy had come to life! I called him right back and immediately told him the story of my fantasy. He must have thought I was crazy, but I couldn't stop myself. He asked me to join him for dinner on Saturday night. Unfortunately, I was leaving on a business trip, returning Saturday around 5:30 p.m. Calculating the time it would take to arrive, get through customs, grab my luggage, get home and freshen up, I suggested a late dinner at 8 p.m.

He asked how I was planning on getting home. I said that I would grab a cab.

He said, "How about if I pick you up?"

An airport pickup on the first date! This was getting better by the minute!

"Sure," I said, "I would love that. How will I know it's you?"

"I have some pictures on Facebook that you can take a look at."

On the flight home, I wrote in my journal: "I am meeting Allan Friedman today, and for some reason, I am not nervous. It feels normal. After seeing his pictures, I feel like I have met him before. I am not sure where, maybe in another life."

Oddly enough, because I travel so much, I have also had a recurring fantasy about landing at the airport and having someone waiting for me with a sign.

I landed. I took a deep breath. As I walked through the glass doors to the arrival area, there he was waiting for me with a handmade sign that said, "KIM".

He did feel familiar, as though I had known him forever. He was definitely attractive but short (you always get what you focus on).

Within a week, he told me he loved me and started dropping marriage hints. He had to be nuts. But now, after six months, I am engaged and planning a wedding.

Funny things happen when you trade up your thoughts.

Fun is a perfectly good 'f' word

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

It was 1 a.m. when the last guest pulled away from the shul parking lot; the bride and groom, walking through the dark and empty social hall, realized they had nothing to lose. So, shameless with hunger and convulsed with laughter, they snuck into the shul's kitchen looking for something to eat.

Bowing to custom, the newlyweds had fasted all day but were too busy dancing and circulating among guests to do more than snack at the festive meal. Almost 33 years later, my husband and I remember the delicious plate of leftovers caterer Rose Lazar fixed for us, which we happily demolished before heading out into the soft August night. But not before that wonderful lady also boxed us up some sweet table goodies.

A long time has passed since that memorable late night snack, which can trace its lineage to an earlier August day when a CJN summer student (me) was assigned to the same story as another young reporter for a Toronto daily (Henry Mietkiewicz). The rest is history.

While that post-wedding nosh is still fondly recalled, unknown to us then, it helped set the tone and shape the character of our relationship, namely, that while marriage is serious and sacred business, it should also be fun.

Fun is a perfectly good "f" word, albeit ignored, neglected or simply dismissed in the lexicon of marriage. Like most young couples, we'd attended marriage preparation classes (honestly, learning how to stuff a turkey would have been more useful) but I cannot recall fun ever being mentioned.

Too bad, because fun is like a generous pinch of spice or a squeeze of citrus on your favourite dish: the flavours brighten, instantly.

Fun is what you make it: even an e-mail to your spouse at work just to say hi. Fun, when you think about it, really means one doing for the other. And fun can spring from the unlikeliest sources.

Case in point: our first home was an apartment requiring use of a laundromat; on one such trip, an elderly Jewish woman spied a bouquet of flowers next to the clothes my husband was folding. "Oy, if mine hosband vood buy me flowers, I'd be dead!" she lamented. To this day, pretty posies in my husband's hands cracks us up.

I find myself often reaching for such memories of fun in times of stress, notably to cut off the supply of angry oxygen that feeds a marital spat. And while I may take flak for this, I'll brave it: keep it private. Work out problems or grievances between you, not on the phone with friends. The aim is not to burn up the phone lines to make yourself feel better (or worse, find a fellow commiserator) but to resolve your differences, together.

So, brides and grooms, mazel tov and "biz hundert-unzwanzig." Have a blast at your simchah, and remember, ask the caterer to pack you up a box of treats. A little something for the way.

A bride's guide to surviving your wedding day

By JENNIFER BRINDER
Special to The CJN

Every girl wants her happily ever after. As a child, I dreamed about my wedding day – the perfect ring, the perfect dress, and of course, the perfect man. Lucky for me, I got it all. I waited 23 years to have this perfect day and now I want to tell the brides out there how they can make their day a dream come true.

I was not nervous before the wedding. Everyone told me I wouldn't sleep the night before because of nerves. But I slept like a baby. My suggestion for the night before the wedding is to go out with your sister or best friend. See a movie, go for dinner, or even just hang out. This will get your mind off the next day. However, I wouldn't make it a late night. No one likes a drowsy bride – especially the groom.

I remember waking up the morning of my wedding thinking, "Wow, I can't believe the day is finally here!"

Then my hunger spoke, so my sister and I went for breakfast. This is my next and most important piece of advice – have a good breakfast! I would not have anything too heavy, but a bowl of cereal with some fruit or eggs with toast will give your wedding day the perfect start, and will give you the strength you need. I truly believe the longest day of a girl's life is her wedding day, and fainting at any point is not an option.

When I arrived at the hairdresser, I sat back and relaxed, and next thing I knew, I was off to the Beth Emeth Synagogue. I was excited to put on my wedding dress – this time I wasn't trying it on or doing a fitting. This was it! Once I took off that dress, I would be a married woman. When the zipper went up, I looked in the mirror, and I can say that I felt like the princess I always dreamed I would be on my wedding day.

When I was ready, the photographer told me to start walking toward my soon-to-be husband, whose back was to me, and then told David to turn around. I will always treasure the look he had on his face. He didn't have to say a word. That look told me I was the most beautiful girl that day. Treasure that specific moment. The look on your groom's face when he sees you for the first time in your dress is something to always remember.

By the time the ceremony was ready to start, I was shaking. This was it. It was what I had been waiting for. My cue came for me to start walking down the aisle. The second I stepped foot in the sanctuary I started crying. Walking down the aisle, I saw my friends and my family there to celebrate the happiest day of my life.

When my husband stepped on the glass and everyone yelled, "Mazel tov," it was official! That evening, we danced and celebrated with our friends and family. At the end of the night, we couldn't believe it was all over. Everyone told me the day would go by so fast, and I tried my best to soak in every second.

Jennifer and David

I remember that day vividly, and I try to cherish those memories because I remember being so happy. Some of the guests told me that I was the happiest bride they ever saw, and I can definitely say I was.

The most important piece of advice I can give you is to cherish every single moment of that day. It was the most perfect day for me, and I married the most perfect man. Now I can say I am living my happily ever after, and I hope you do too.

Saying yes to the dress

By SHELLY GROISMAN
Special to The CJN

Today, it seems as though the pressure to find the perfect wedding dress is greater than the pressure to find the perfect man to marry, and in my case this was true.

I knew I wanted to marry my fiancé, Phil, a few months into our relationship. He possessed all the qualities I ever wanted in a partner, and lucky for me, at the age of 21, I had found him.

Phil proposed 2-1/2 years later, and it was one of the most exciting and memorable nights of my life. I woke up the next morning in a state of bliss when it suddenly hit me – last night, I had made the ultimate commitment to the perfect man.

Next, I thought, will be the perfect wedding dress!

Some women may think it's no big deal, but in my experience, no matter how many fantasies you have as a child, pictures you glance through in magazines, or episodes you watch of the TV series Say Yes to The Dress, once it becomes your reality, that's a whole other ball game.

My uneasiness stemmed from a few factors: the typical girly fear that nothing would look good on me; the reality of how many eyes would be gazing at me walking down the aisle; the gut-wrenching price points of these dresses; and last, that my desire for simplicity in a dress meant it would not be considered special enough for this important day.

Shelly and Phil

Then, a close friend of mine who recently got married sat me down and put things into perspective. She reassured me about how many options I would have, how to work within my budget, and most importantly, that it takes about eight to 12 months to have the dress delivered from the date purchased. Being only eight months away from the wedding, I now realized I'd better get on it!

My friend recommended the store Mona Richie, and from the moment I walked in there, the owner, Mona, put my fears at ease. She assured me the process would be seamless and continually repeated, "Don't worry sweetheart, Mona always takes care of you."

And that she did, because after I finished zipping up the second dress she had picked out for me, I instantly knew it was the one. Maybe it was the tears welling up in my mother's eyes, Mona gasping in excitement, or all the other brides in the store giving me their two thumbs up, but I didn't want to look any further – I had found the one.

I think back now to all the countless hours I spent stressing over the idea of trying to find my perfect dress, all those months I contemplated A-line, ball gown, strapless or scoop neck. All of these details that were once a heavy burden now seem so trivial – because when push comes to shove, all the beautiful and most expensive dresses in the world can't beat the fact that on Aug. 9, I will be marrying the love of my life.

"THEMES" in Event Planning : Downsizing, Restructuring, and Scaling back Event Planners – A Necessity not a Luxury

Downsizing, restructuring, and scaling back are the recurring "themes" in event planning during this volatile period. Yet, we still want to celebrate life cycle occasions and discover the silver lining in every cloud.

"In discussions with our clients we know everyone is conscious about not going over the top in planning social and corporate events. They don't want to appear too flashy, yet they still want to host events which are elegant, creative and have elements of fun", comments Karen Jacobs of UP & COMING EVENTS.

"As event planners we are able to share ideas and resources to create unique events that have all the elements of a good party, without blowing the budget" adds partner Karen Garscadden.

People often think that having an Event Planner is extravagant and indulgent. "I can do it myself", many say. However, doing it your self can create expensive mistakes and without access to the resources of an experienced planner, one may not always negotiate the best deal.

Garscadden claims "as repeat customers to our vendors, when we need to be budget conscious our suppliers are often approachable and respect restraints. We know how to save you money and get the best bang for your buck."

Whether it's a champagne & caviar extravaganza or a beer and pretzel party, event planners have creative ideas, resources and tricks of the trade to make your party memorable.

In a recent consultation with a bride & groom who were planning their wedding, their professional planner guided them through a series of scenarios that reduced costs over 20%, without sacrificing the overall look and feel of their special day.

It is times such as these, that we need to celebrate more than ever, to lift our spirits and escape (if even for a few hours). So let the party begin!

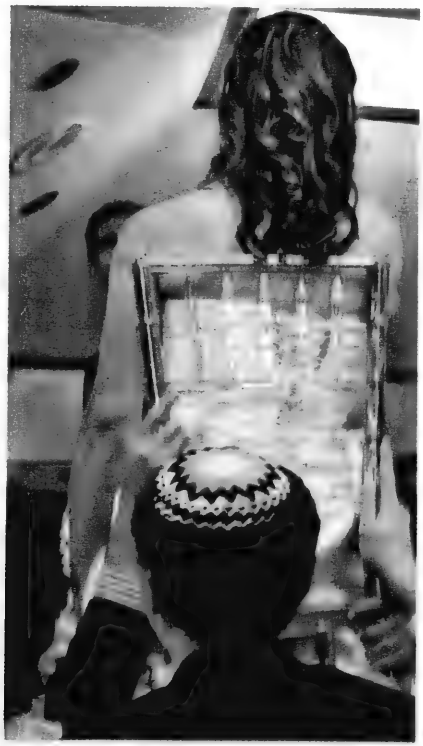
Wedding a reflection of the couple's interests



By VIVIAN RINGWALD-LEVINE
Special to The CJN

Dan and Terri got married on a beautiful fall afternoon day in September at Temple Emmanu-el in Toronto. As a planner, I always encourage couples to reveal to their guests their love for each other and their life passions. This creates a more intimate and personalized feel.

In the case of Daniel and Terri, the guests walked away with this kind of a feeling and more!

Guests were welcomed into the synagogue with Terri's passion – rhythmic percussion sounds of drumming. Daniel, an eco-farmer, harvested sunflowers, squash and other colourful veggies whose beautiful hues enhanced the ceremony and the reception.

During the reception, family and friends moved and grooved to drumming circles, while shaking the engraved maracas they had received as wedding favours.

After a scrumptious vegetarian meal of butternut squash soup served in squash bowls and vegetarian beet wellington, brown recycled bags were distributed so that everyone could take home the veggie centerpieces.

In keeping with the couple's green values, they arranged for food that was not eaten to be composted.

Guests were having so much fun that they partied into the wee hours of the morning. When the band finally retired, guests stayed to chat and rejoice – they simply were not ready to leave the warm welcoming environment that had been created!

A night for more than yuks

By NETALY STETTER
Special to The CJN

Oct. 17, 2008 was the night David blew me away!

We had been planning to go to Yuk Yuk's for some time, but we'd never gotten around to it. Finally, he suggested that we should book a date to go with another couple (our close friends). I had also invited my best friend to join us, and David then invited his other close friend, too.

David and Netaly

I was becoming suspicious throughout the week that something might be happening that evening, but David told my best friend to keep throwing me off the scent, and she did – quite well!

The evening arrived, and he came home from work with two dozen red roses, so I started to become very suspicious. I called my girlfriend, and she told me that David is not a public person and not to anticipate too much, so as not to be disappointed. Of course, she knew all along what was coming.

David said that we should take the subway to go eat downtown. Since we live right on the subway line, I agreed.

As we got downtown, I began to complain about how cold it was and how we should have taken the car.

He said, "Yeah, I know, I'm so unromantic."

We got to the restaurant to eat dinner. Throughout the meal, I wasn't sure if he was going to propose during dessert, so I kept asking him if he wanted some dessert, and when he said that he didn't, I was taken aback.

"Are you sure, because we can share something?" I asked, wondering if I should order dessert, just in case.

Well, dinner ended and he asked for the cheque.

David proposes

My best friend called me and asked if there was any news to report, and I said, "No." She said not to worry, that it would happen another night.

Next, we went to Yuk Yuk's, where David had reserved the front table for us. I had two very dear friends of mine there and he had two very close friends of his there. When the MC came on stage, he asked if anyone had any events or birthdays to announce.

That's when the spotlight turned on Dave (this all having been preplanned), and he got up to tell me how much he loved me, and then he knelt down on one knee to propose.

I, of course, began to cry, and our close friends (who all knew this was going to happen) were ready with their cameras. Of course, I could barely listen to the comedians after that!

At the end of the night, I was ready to subway back home, only to have Dave walk up to a black limo parked outside the comedy club and tell me that this would be our ride home instead.

I was shocked and breathless about the whole evening, and about how lucky I am to be marrying this amazing man.

David proposed to Michelle in Barbados

By MICHELLE WINTER FLEISHMAN
Special to The CJN

Michelle and David

David and Michelle were eating a late dinner at a restaurant in Barbados. The weather was warm and breezy, and it was about 10 p.m.

They had been there for two days, and that night was special. They had been dating for just five months.

While they were eating dinner, David, thinking out loud, said, "Wouldn't this be a great place to get engaged?"

Michelle said, "Yes, it sure would."

Now, David and Michelle had big smiles on their faces.

"David, I don't have an engagement ring, but I have your ring that you gave me for a promise."

Without hesitation, David got down on one knee and asked, "Michelle, will you marry me?"

"Yes, of course I will," she replied, and all the servers clapped.

David and Michelle had a traditional Jewish wedding. They were married in a synagogue under a chupah, and their ceremony included an aufruf and bedecken.

They had a ball planning their wedding, and especially enjoyed having their nieces and nephews in the bridal party.

David chose his own tuxedo, and Michelle selected the colours of peach, pink and lavender for the umbrella dance.

On the day of the wedding, David surprised Michelle with a pink and purple wedding balloon – this was the icing on the cake.

Their horah dance lasted for almost 10 minutes and was the most joyous thing one could see. They say they'll never forget it. People were in awe!

It was the best wedding ever. The date was May 16, 2004. The couple didn't waste a minute and left the next morning for Prince Edward Island.

Prince Edward Island is full of different attractions. They slept in a lighthouse. It was very quaint, small and special. They tried on Anne of Green Gables wigs. David, in red braids, was a hoot!

David and Michelle, now married almost 4-1/2 years, couldn't be any happier.

They love each other every day more than the one before. L'chaim.

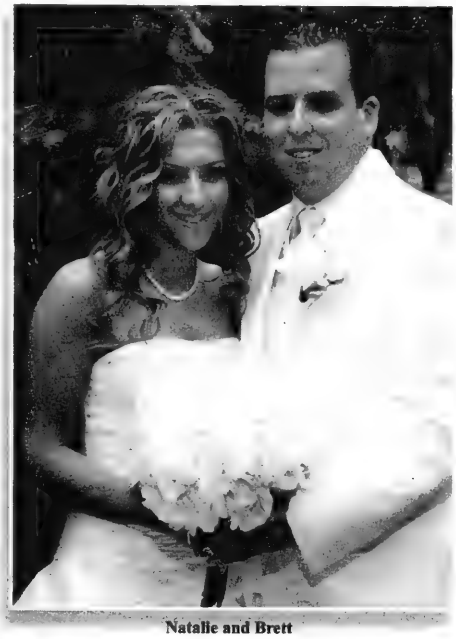
My big, kosher, traditional Jewish wedding

By NATALIE DAVIDSON
Special to The CJN



Natalie and Brett

Every girl has her own idea of a perfect wedding planned out in her mind – the wedding she has been dreaming of since she was small.

In my dream wedding, I was wearing white shorts, a white T-shirt and a veil. Brett would wear white shorts, a white T-shirt and a white tie. It would, of course, take place in Las Vegas, and "Elvis" would marry us.

Before I finished telling my mom our wedding plans, I could already see the disappointment on her face. My mom wasn't understanding our grand Las Vegas plan, she was more interested in our being married in a synagogue by a rabbi.

I tried to explain that I would find a Jewish Elvis, and before I could finish she picked up the phone. She turned around and asked, "How's June 15?"

It was perfect.

Wow, that was easy. I thought she called the travel agent to book the flight – WRONG! Turns out she was on the phone with the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, the same shul she and my dad got married in.

Before I knew it, we had started planning my big, kosher, traditional Jewish wedding – with a few of my own modern twists.

We had a year and a half before the big day, and my mom and I had already kicked into high planning mode. Dad was getting into it too, and Brett was just happy to stay out of it.

There was still so much to plan – photographer, videographer, invitations, florist, band, and of course, I still had to find my wedding dress!

One day, my Dad came walking into the kitchen with a big white box in his hands. He placed the box in front of me on the table and began explaining the importance of the contents. Apparently, when my mom found her dream wedding dress it was too expensive. Determined to get the dress of her dreams, she tried to beg my grandmother to buy it, and they came up with the perfect solution. They made a deal that my mom's daughter would wear the dress on her wedding day, too, so that it would get a double use.

I guess they never thought that 27 years later, some poor girl would have to wear this old, out-of-style wedding dress. There was no way I was going to wear that dress! I caved on Vegas, but this is where I draw the line!

After many arguments, I got my own dream wedding dress (my daughter may have to wear it on her big day). I also got my dream shoes – crystal-studded Puma runners!

After the many months of planning for my big, kosher, traditional Jewish wedding, it had finally arrived. My mom's big vision was the most picture-perfect wedding any bride could ask for. It could not even compare to my original Vegas dream!

Exceeding your Expectations

Getting engaged can be a laughing matter

By ELLEN LECHTER GREEN
Special to The CJN

In the movies when couples get engaged the emphasis is often on romance. But is that the case in real life? According to a few Canadian couples, romance can and does happen, along with some unintentional humour and a few blunders thrown in as well.

Maria and Steve Copnick have been married for 38 years. "We've learned to let go of petty annoyances like Steve's snoring and my compulsive bossiness," says Maria. "But it also helps to laugh. Even our engagement turned out to be inadvertently funny."

The couple had been dating for three years. "We talked about getting married, but I wanted to be surprised," says Maria. "I was determined to get engaged on my 21st birthday, so I started dropping hints."

Steve took her out to dinner for her birthday and then later handed her a brightly wrapped package. "You can imagine my disappointment when I discovered a scarf," she says.

Maria remembers barely thanking Steve through her tears and saying a quick good-night. The next morning at 5 a.m., she awoke to a scratching sound at her window. She looked out, and there was Steve, standing there with a long stick. Even stranger was what he was wearing.

"He always loved everything medieval, and he was dressed up in armour like some kind of a knight. When I opened the window, he got down on one knee and he was really nervous because he said, 'May I have your foot in marriage,'" she says. "At first he didn't realize what he said but the whole situation was just so crazy that I burst out laughing. And then he did, too. Of course, that was only after I said yes."

Rob MacNeil also got down on one knee to propose to future wife Suzanne, and although it was unexpected, it couldn't beat Suzanne's initial surprise of meeting Rob in the first place. "I met Rob one day while I was hobbling down the street with my dog, and he was looking for an apartment in the building where I lived," she says. "It wasn't a great time for me. I had just broken my leg and was wearing an eye patch following eye surgery. Next thing I knew he was my neighbour."

Suzanne first made it clear she was not interested in getting involved at that time, but Rob – and her dog Sparky – had different ideas. "Rob was fine with my no-dating policy, but behind my back he was becoming best friends with my dog," Suzanne says. "Sparky would walk down the hall of our building and scratch on Rob's door to say hello. Before I knew it, Rob had become a part of our lives."

Cooking shower for brides

Tammy Mahl's pre-wedding festivities before her January wedding to Corey Gold included a cooking shower with chef Caroline Davis. A sample of items prepared and eaten at the shower include:

Tammy Mahl takes part in hands-on shower

SPINACH SALAD WITH CARAMELIZED ONIONS, PEARS AND CHEVRE

1 box of pre-washed baby spinach (roughly 4 cups)
1 Vidalia onion, sliced in rings
4 Forelle or Bosc pears, sliced into 1/4 in. slices
1 pck. of chevre
3 tbsp. butter
balsamic vinegar for drizzling.

In a large frying pan, melt butter and fry onions until a dark colour, and let cool slightly. Place spinach on a large platter. Pour caramelized onions on top of spinach. Place sliced pears on top of spinach and onion. Sprinkle chevre over salad, and drizzle with balsamic.

Marcy and Mitch Massicotte, who have been married for 15 years, are seen here with their two children, Tara and Jarred.

Proposals come in all shapes and sizes

Although the couple had only been dating for a few months, Suzanne was thrilled by Rob's proposal, after dinner at a restaurant where they had had their first date. "It felt like we had known each other forever," she says.

Nine years later, they share their Toronto home with two dogs.

Marcy Fruchter was expecting a proposal during a trip to Mexico with boyfriend Mitch Massicotte. "It was the night of our three-year anniversary," remembers Marcy. "We had this great dinner and a walk on the beach and then we exchanged gifts. I gave him his gift and then he gives me a really nice leather purse. So I am looking through every pocket looking for the ring but to no avail."

Marcy tried to hide her disappointment for the remainder of the trip, but later discovered she wasn't the only one expecting a proposal. "After I got home, I started listening to my phone messages and basically every one of my friends called and left messages asking if we were engaged!"

About seven months later, Mitch finally proposed. "We had just gone out for dinner, and he asked me if I wanted to go for a walk through this nice park. We stopped at a bench, and he pulled out a stunning ring. Needless to say, I was not expecting it that night!"

They have now been married for 15 years and live in Toronto with their two children, Tara, 14, and Jarred, 11. "Over the years, what works for us is that we both respect one another," says Marcy. "We love to spend time together as a family but also still as a couple."

Kamishbrot, mandelbrot, biscotti – delicious by any name

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

I've heard it said that there are really a very limited number of recipes in the world – that is, the basic ones from which all others evolved. For instance: who was the first person in the world to have the idea of wrapping little pastries around a savoury filling? He or she could possibly claim the patent for won tons, kreplach, empanadas and pierogi.

But I wonder if the same can be said about mandelbread (or mandelbrot) and kamish bread (kamishbrot). Biscotti, too! Let me explain.

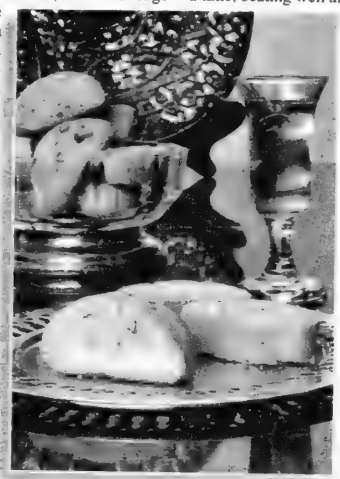
Mandelbread refers to chewy, twice-baked sliced cookies made with oil, an old-fashioned type of treat. Mandel means almond in German and in Yiddish, and these cookies were traditionally made with crushed almonds. Great for dipping into a steaming cup of tea, they kept for ages in a sealed container (if well-hidden).

But here's a culinary curiosity: my mother, of blessed memory, and many other ladies in Minnesota where I grew up called these treats "kamish bread." Every other recipe I ever met in either North America or Israel referred to something called "mandelbread," and it looked suspiciously the same. How did this dichotomy of names evolve?

I have heard from two different reliable sources that those of the "kamish" persuasion are of Ukrainian origin, while those preferring "mandel" hail from Russia and all the way west to Germany and Austria.

Well, my mother-in-law, a charming Viennese lady, does call the piles and piles of such cookies she used to make "mandelbrot." But the above theory just doesn't hold water (or oil), because my mother's forebears were from Russia! Further, I don't believe that a majority of the Jews in Minnesota are of Ukrainian origin. Perhaps it's somehow connected to the fact that the the classic Minnesota recipe we grew up with – called "kamish bread-Ione" – came from Ione Siegel of the Minnesota Iron Range.

Then there are biscotti, the latest rage at upscale coffee shops. These kamish bread-cousin Italian cookies are traditionally baked with anise, but have since incorporated all kinds of substitutes: hazelnuts, filberts, dried cranberries, chocolate chips and almonds (not all at once). The name biscotti comes from "bis," meaning "twice," and "cotto," meaning baked, since the cookies are baked twice. They tend to be much harder and almost always necessitate a dip in wine or coffee or tea. Biscotti can be found in all sorts of flavours, but the most common contain anise.



KAMISH BREAD

4 oz. almonds, slivers or coarsely chopped
1 cup sugar
1 cup vegetable oil
4 eggs
1 tsp.vanilla extract
3 cups flour
3 tsp. baking powder

Chop almonds finely. Set aside. Cream sugar and oil thoroughly. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Add vanilla. Sift flour with the baking powder and mix in. Stir in the chopped almonds. (This can be done either by mixer or by hand.)

Gather the dough up into a ball and place in a bowl. Cover and chill overnight or at least for a few hours in the refrigerator.

Preheat oven to 350. With floured hands, divide dough into 2 pieces. Form each piece into a roll as long as your cookie sheet. Place rolls on a parchment paper-lined cookie sheet. Bake for 30-35 minutes or until slightly firm to the touch.

Remove from oven and lower heat to 250. With a serrated knife, slice the rolls diagonally into 3/4-inch slices and place cut side-down on the cookie sheet. Toast for about 25 minutes until lightly brown. (Be sure to watch them!) Remove to wire racks to cool. Yields about 60 pieces.

CHOCOLATE CHIP POPPY SEED KAMISH BREAD

3/4 cup sugar
3/4 cup oil
3 eggs
2 1/2 cups flour
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 cup poppy seeds
1/2 cup chocolate chips (minis are best)

Cream sugar and oil. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Sift flour with baking powder and salt; mix in. Stir in poppy seeds and chocolate chips. Follow above directions for forming and baking rolls.

Let's salute the Italian connection with a very simple Anise Biscotti recipe. Anise seed has a distinct, sweet, licorice-like taste.

ANISE BISCOTTI

1 cup sugar
1/2 cup vegetable oil
4 eggs
2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. anise seed
1 tsp. vanilla

Cream sugar and oil. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Sift flour with baking powder; mix in. Stir in anise seeds. Follow above directions for forming and baking rolls.

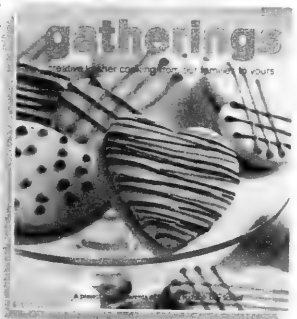
Bestselling cookbook makes an ideal gift

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

The bestselling cookbook, Gatherings: creative kosher cooking from our families to yours, has been a highly successful fundraising project since October 2003 for Netivot HaTorah Day School, a modern Orthodox Zionist day school located in Thornhill, Ont. This richly illustrated, hard-cover cookbook has been out of stock for several months, but happily, it is once again available and would make a wonderful shower or housewarming gift.

All the recipes and ideas in Gatherings were shared by the school's parents, grandparents, relatives, alumni and friends. Under the direction of two dedicated women, Shawna Magence and Carol Lesser, the team of 130 devoted volunteers worked diligently on the book for three years prior to the first edition. All the recipes were triple tested by both professional and amateur chefs, to ensure quality and reliability. Although 900 entries were submitted, just over 300 recipes were ultimately chosen to be included in the book.

Many of the recipes are traditional, but the majority are creative and innovative, helping set new standards for today's kosher cooks. The mouthwatering recipes include Dressed-Up Guacamole, Tortellini Turkey Soup, Gingered Sushi Salad, Melt In Your Mouth Salmon, Basil Pepper Steak, Terra Chip Chicken, Yerushalmi Kugel, Szechuan Noodles: Hot-Tossed Noodles with Peanut Sauce, Simply Sensational Chocolate Cake, Oh Henry Cheesecake and Chocolate Raspberry Brownies.



Gatherings has been enjoyed by cooks of all levels, from the novice to the most experienced. The cookbook is being sold in Israel, England, Australia, and North America. Since the third edition, Gatherings has been distributed worldwide through Feldheim Publishers. With 15,000 copies sold to date, this incredible fundraising project has raised more than $250,000 for Netivot HaTorah's educational special needs program.

The book is now in its fourth edition thanks to the generosity of the Ganz family, who dedicated this special edition in memory of their parents, Julie and Hershel Ganz, the original owners of Carmel Bakery, one of Toronto's first kosher bakeries. The Ganz family covered the costs of printing, shipping and warehousing an additional 10,000 copies so that Gatherings could continue to raise money for Netivot HaTorah. This fourth edition will be referred to as "The Ganz Family Edition" and there is a brief bio about this very special and unique family at the front of the book.

Gatherings is available at various Judaica shops and booksellers. For further information, contact Netivot HaTorah Day School at 905-771-1234, ext. 237.

Here is a quick, easy and yummy recipe that is like a gourmet version of chicken schnitzel. The kids will love it and so will the adults who are "gathering" around your table! Enjoy…

TERRA CHIP CHICKEN

1/2 cup all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. garlic powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
6 boneless chicken breasts
1 egg
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. lemon and herb spice
1 (170 g) bag Terra chips, crushed
1/3 cup margarine

Preheat oven to 350. In a small bowl, combine flour, garlic powder, salt and pepper. Dredge chicken breasts in mixture. Set aside.

In another small bowl, beat egg, mustard, lemon juice and lemon and herb spice together. Set aside. Place crushed chips in a large bowl. Dip chicken first in egg mixture, then in crushed Terra chips. Place chicken breasts in roasting pan.

In a small saucepan, melt margarine. Drizzle on top of chicken. Place roasting pan, uncovered, in oven. Bake for 30 to 45 minutes.

Tips: To crush chips and still maintain texture, put them into a sealable plastic bag and use a rolling pin for crushing. For a finer texture, crush chips in a food processor.

Terra chips come in a variety of flavours and colours. Other types of potato chips can be used. Serves 6. Preparation time: 15 minutes.

Celebrate with the Stars

People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Tuesday, March 24, 2009 at Meron Banquet Hall. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-669-0777.

MOLTEN CHOCOLATE CAKES WITH WARM CHOCOLATE SAUCE

Sauce

6 1/2 oz. dark chocolate, chopped
1/4 cup hot water
1/4 cup heavy cream

Cakes

5 oz. bittersweet (not unsweetened) or semisweet chocolate, chopped
10 tbsp. (1 1/4 sticks) unsalted butter
3 large eggs
3 large egg yolks
1 1/2 cups powdered sugar
1/2 cup all purpose flour

For sauce: Melt chocolate in microwave, add 1/4 cup hot water, cream: whisk until smooth. Cool slightly (Can be made two days ahead. Cover, chill. Before serving, rewarm in saucepan over low heat, stirring constantly.)

For cakes: Preheat oven to 450. Butter six 3/4-cup souffle dishes or custard cups. Stir chocolate and butter in heavy medium saucepan over low heat until melted. Cool slightly. Whisk eggs and egg yolks in large bowl to blend. Whisk in sugar, then chocolate mixture and flour. Pour batter into dishes, dividing equally. (Can be made one day ahead. Cover, chill.)

Bake cakes until sides are set but centre remains soft and runny, about 11 minutes or up to 14 minutes for batter that was refrigerated. Run small knife around cakes to loosen. Immediately turn cakes out onto plates. Spoon sauce around cakes. Serve with ice cream.

Pair reflects on 60 years of marriage

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements co-ordinator

Jews the world over will agree that 1948 was a very good year. On May 14, Jewry celebrated the declaration of a Jewish state in Eretz Yisrael.

For Notre Dame de Grace resident Beatrice (Bea) Stattner and her fiancé, Canadian World War II veteran William (Bill) Taylor, the date proved doubly significant.

On Nov.14, Rabbi Wilfred Shuchat of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, now rabbi emeritus, officiated at the couple's wedding. The simchah took place at the Mount Royal Hotel. Rabbi Shuchat and Bill were former schoolmates, so it was a mutually gratifying experience.

Bea and Bill Taylor

Stationed comfortably in their apartment, which is located near their first dwelling in the Snowdon area, the congenial couple recently reflected on the past, while commenting on the current scene.

In addition to his regular weekday duties, Bill, a talented drummer, used to head to the Laurentian Mountains every weekend during the summer of 1947 to perform with Joey Kane's band. Bill grins as he confesses it was love at first sight, when he spotted Bea. Mesmerized by her "dainty slim ankles," he insisted Bea drop her date for the evening and meet him after the show.

"In those days, Wooden Acres Hotel was a popular spot for the Jewish community and so my girlfriend and I were there as guests," Bea recalls. Hotel owner Mac Cayne offered a free weekend to couples who met at the hotel and subsequently married. A year after the wedding, the Taylors took advantage of Cayne's offer.

Couple tries to keep as productive as possible

As for their daily living quarters, Bea recalls how hard it was to find an apartment after the war. "Apartments were scarce in the late '40s, and we had to pay key money to acquire a lease. So, we lived with my parents on Hingston Avenue until we were able to find an apartment. We leased a nice one near Congregation Shaar Zion."

Bea, a graduate of West Hill High School, and Bill, who graduated from Strathcona Academy, both held jobs, until Bea stayed home to raise their children. In 1956, they bought a bungalow in Cote St. Luc, where they resided for 43 years. In 1999, they moved to an apartment.

The couple share lots of happy memories but also some very sad ones. In 1954, they welcomed the birth of their daughter, Beverley, but fate intervened 22 years later, when she died of a viral infection.

"It has been the greatest tragedy in our lives," Bill says.

Determined to remain focused for their two sons, the couple pulled through by concentrating on family, work and community life.

"Golf was my saving grace," Bea says, adding she and Bill also played tennis. As soon as their sons, Bob, now 48, and Brian, now 45, were older, Bea returned to work.

Both Bea and Bill had a penchant for selling. For the last 18 years before retirement, Bea was a travel agent. Bill, now 88, retired at age 72. For 45 years, Bill had two careers simultaneously, one as a musician and the other as a sales associate.

Since they always had many interests, Bea and Bill are never bored.

"Sure, there's health issues at our stage of life, but we try to keep as productive as possible," Bea says. They are members of the YM-YWHA, where they attend regular exercise sessions, and everybody is amazed because Bea still bowls.

Bill serves as program chairman for the Cote St. Luc Senior Men's Club. He is also involved in the Brigadier Frederick Kisch Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion. They belong to Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom. Bea is a life member of ORT. Bill is a life member of B'nai Brith. They both play bridge.

In 1998, the boys feted their parents at a 50th wedding anniversary party, which was attended by relatives and friends.

Their 60th wedding anniversary was a smaller event, as many of their friends have passed away. The couple enjoyed the presence of their five grandchildren, who range in age from 9 to 17.

As for advice to newlyweds, Bea says, "Tell them to try hard to make it work. I know it's not always easy but keep trying."

Bill adds, "It's natural to have disagreements but keep the communication lines open."

The trousseau has changed with the times

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

In the 1930s, when my mother was getting married, her mother gave her a cedar chest filled with linens and blankets and other items needed for the home she would be making with her future husband. According to the literature, this was considered her dowry, "the goods that a woman brings as a gift to her husband upon marriage."

Dowry also called a trousseau

A dowry, also sometimes called a trousseau, a French word that loosely translates as a small bundle, was a way of giving a daughter something of the family's wealth. The custom of giving a dowry, or trousseau ,was popular in the Victorian era, and middle and upper class families believed it was unsuitable to enter marriage without one. But, interestingly, what was started as a custom to provide for the bride often became a burden on poor families who might not be able to afford to outfit their daughters properly in order to obtain suitable husbands.

The trousseau consisted of "a collection of clothing, linens and lingerie and other household goods that a bride would gather together before her wedding, in preparation of becoming a homemaker." She would bring these items with her to the home she would be sharing with her husband.

Growing up, I remember my mother telling my sister and me how she was putting things away – such as knitted blankets – for our trousseaus, in the same cedar chest that was given to her. However, by the time we married, the fashion was to have bridal showers at which a bride would receive the types of gifts that replaced the need for her parents to provide a trousseau. In the 1960s, when my sister and I and most of our friends became engaged, linen, lingerie and kitchen showers for the bride were the norm. At these parties, the bride received many of the items she would require to set up her home with her husband, such as bed linens, pillows, tableware, pots and pans, kitchen appliances and gadgets.

Now in the 21st century, couples are often marrying later in life, in their 30s and beyond, and frequently already have been living in their own fully furnished apartments or homes. Because of this, the concept of the bridal shower has changed with the times, and friends and family have started hosting pre-wedding theme parties for the bride and the groom, with gifts ranging from theatre tickets, activities at gyms and spas to tools for the home, gardening equipment and wine collections.

Bridal showers now the norm

A three- by six-foot chest could never hold all the items the bride and groom collect. Today, they need a van or mini-truck. The cedar chest has become just a nice piece of furniture in which to store things, not necessarily items related to a daughter's marriage.

The literature suggests that "the change in the importance of the trousseau perhaps reflects the more modern and equal standing between genders." This could certainly be true as we find more men taking an interest in the furnishings of their homes, and the fact that both men and women enter marital relationships with financial assets.

But it should be remembered that material goods are just "things." The important items to be brought into the marital home are love, compassion, respect and friendship, and these cannot be purchased. These intangible "bundles" must be taken into the relationship by both partners to ensure a healthy, viable, long-lasting marriage.

Windsor Arms Hotel's inimitable cachet produces lasting afterglow

The vibrancy of a downtown setting so close to the city's epicentre you can feel its heart beat.

The cachet that for decades has made it the destination of celebrities worldwide, from movie stars to heads of state.

A level of sophistication found in only a handful of world-class hotels.

If one place can be said to seamlessly combine grandeur and intimacy under one roof, the Windsor Arms is that place. Voted Toronto's #1 hotel the past two years by Condé Nast Traveller Magazine, it's the embodiment of postmodern chic in an historic setting. Nestled on quiet St. Thomas street mere steps from Yorkville — in the heart of Toronto's most fashionable shopping and entertainment district — it's close to the hustle and bustle, yet a million miles away. It evokes the gentility of a bygone era and radiates the kind of old-world charm that is born, not made.

Behind its century-old portals are 28 newly-appointed luxury suites with 24-hour butler service. Discreet luxury combined with an exceptional level of service place it in a category of one among Toronto's luxury boutique hotels.

For owner George Friedmann, who in 1999 purchased the property and restored it to its former glory while adding state-of-the-art amenities like a Kosher kitchen, swimming pool, exercise room and full-service spa, the operative word is passion. "You can teach skills, but you can't teach passion," he opines. "Do you want to be served by someone who's going through the motions, or someone who really cares about your dining experience?"

The Windsor Arms' Courtyard Café: where grandeur and intimacy meet

Friedmann should know. Five-a-week breakfasts at the Windsor Arms fuelled a growing fascination with the venue that led to its acquisition. "I had to buy the place just to save money on breakfasts," he grins.

On a serious note, Friedmann allows that although he's proud of the aura of exclusivity with which the Windsor Arms is perceived, he's even prouder of the reality that a world-class facility of this ilk can still host a wedding for as little as $65 per person.

Sixty-five dollars per person?

"That's right", says Friedmann. "We're elite, but not elitist. We've hosted $500,000 weddings, but world-class cuisine and service are a given regardless of your budget. Whether you're two for tea or 200 for a gala affair, we pay attention to detail. Every detail."

They have to. Unlike banquet halls where you're one and done — unlikely to return save an invitation to someone else's simcha — the Windsor Arms expects you to come back in the days, weeks and months following your affair. No resting on laurels here; the culinary team lives by the restauranteur's adage — you're only as good as your last meal. "We're here to ensure that the most significant day of your life has a lasting afterglow," underscores Friedmann. "One that will keep you coming back to relive those magic moments again and again."

At the Windsor Arms, those moments consist of breakfast, lunch, dinner, and the afternoon and twilight tea for which it has become so popular that weekend tea times — at ease, golfers — need to be reserved three months in advance.

Before you can return to the Windsor Arms, however, you actually have to leave — a sweet sorrow the host establishment manages to delay as long as possible. "I wish this night would never end. How often have you heard that? How often haven't you heard it? Here, it doesn't have to," exudes Friedmann. "Why break the spell by stepping into a parking lot when you can stroll into the tea room, slide into the spa, or sip champagne in your room?"

Nor need you doff the glass slipper in the morning, when Sunday Brunch beckons you and your guests. "Continuity," says Friedmann. "Your event doesn't end when the next party needs the banquet hall because there is no next party. We hold one event at a time: yours."

Of such beginnings are happily-ever-afters made...

Lists can be valuable tools

Although some people decide to get married within a month or two after becoming engaged, most plan to wed six months to a year later.

Once the date is set, couples return to their regular schedules, and wedding plans are put on the back burner. Beset with work, family and social commitments, the bride and groom become so engulfed with daily chores that neither realize how quickly the weeks slip by.

However, they can save themselves last-minute frazzled nerves by setting up schedules and jotting down all the things that must be attended to before and on the big day. After completing a task, they can check it off and feel a sense of accomplishment.

The trick is to work like a project manager. Circle the project date – the wedding day – on the calendar and count back, leaving a week for "Murphy." The latter refers to Murphy's Law, which says that "what will go wrong, will," or to another well-known adage, "the best laid plans of mice and men can go astray."

In today's digital society, many people create a website for their wedding, while others make a special folder in My Documents titled "Wedding." Other ways to plan your wedding include using a recipe-style box with index cards arranged in alphabetical order; a calendar with lots of white space for text; or a loose-leaf folder arranged with section headings or an agenda.

Just as project managers file a progress report midway between the time they start and finish an assignment, brides should evaluate their progress at the midway mark. Note what plans have been carried out, what has to be done, changes in plans and future strategies. This is an opportune period to touch base with the caterer, executive director of the synagogue or hotel banquet manager, among others.

To get started, jot down the following schedule and tasks.

Six to 12 months ahead:
- Set a wedding budget
- Decide on type of wedding
- Set date of wedding
- Draw up guest list
- Decide on location for ceremony and reception
- Make arrangements with rabbi
- Formulate honeymoon plans
- Select gown
- Choose caterer and bartender
- Hire photographer/videographer
- Arrange for florist
- Hire orchestra

Four to six months ahead:
- Order invitations, kippahs
- Choose wedding rings
- Reserve accommodations for out-of-towners
- Choose bridal party attendants
- Arrange bridal gift registry
- Get passports for honeymoon
- Make appointment for makeup and hair trials
- Arrange all rentals
- Plan engagement party to introduce families and friends
- Arrange work schedules

Eight to four weeks ahead:
- Buy headpiece, shoes and personal accessories
- Arrange for wedding day transportation
- Send out invitations
- Arrange prenuptials
- Arrange gatherings for out-of-town guests
- Select men's formal wear and rentals
- Call vendors to touch base

Two weeks before the wedding:
- Pick up wedding gown
- Confirm scheduled appointments with hairdresser, makeup artist, manicurist
- Discuss final menus plans with caterer
- Make seating plan
- Check RSVP list
- Record gifts as soon as receiving them

One week before the wedding:
- Provide caterer with final count
- Finalize table cards and seating plan
- Pick up formal wear and accessories
- Schedule rehearsal
- Check on wedding speeches and toasts

Days prior to wedding:
- Pack for honeymoon
- Pack wedding-day bag

Wedding day:
- Attend to hair, makeup and grooming
- Arrive for photo shoot
- Remember to drink liquids and keep well nourished
- Take a deep breath, relax and smile
- Enjoy yourself!

The daunting task of packing for a family of five

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Packing takes organization and planning

The day I have been anticipating and dreading has arrived. I must begin the daunting task of packing for a family of five for our upcoming trip to Los Angeles to celebrate my nephew's bar mitzvah.

We have been looking forward to this simchah for a long time, sharing in my sister's pride in her wonderful son and our adored nephew and cousin. We have watched him grow from the time we first held him at his brit milah through to the first day of school and then camp and then his entry into high school. Now fully prepared to take on his role within the greater Jewish community, we are set to honour him and celebrate with him and his family.

I have come to pride myself as to my packing skills of late, working hard to co-ordinate outfits and not being afraid to wear a T-shirt or two more than once while away. It took quite a few trips to come to the realization that one pair of black capri's or dress pants can take me from day to night and that a black peep-toe shoe can do the same. I have also learned that laundromats abound all over the world with many, as on a recent family mission to Israel taught me, providing washing and folding services and delivery to my hotel room.

But travelling for pleasure is a whole different story than packing for a simchah. There are so many events and so many required outfits from more casual to conservative to evening wear and then full-out relaxed attire for the traditional Sunday brunch.

It is important to be methodical and organized – one suitcase per family member and several suit bags to house the suits and dresses of not only myself but my husband, two sons and daughter. Thursday morning minyan is first, so a skirt and casual blouse will do. Friday night services follow quickly with more suit-like attire and, of course, Saturday morning for the main event. Relaxation comes after all the festivities, when we switch to vacation mode for a further few days out of the sleet and snow.

But California can be cold and rainy in the winter months, so light jackets, sweatshirts, T-shirts, shorts and jeans can all be worn in one day. Layering is key, but packing so many layers for five people is challenging for even the most seasoned traveller.

First and foremost was to make sure none of us go overweight. Escalating fuel prices have required airline staff to become very diligent in their efforts to stop people from overstuffing their bags. I had purchased some newer, lighter luggage to hedge my bets, and I was set to begin the task at hand.

Never one to rely on lists, packing for an out-of-town simchah requires list upon list. While there are many retail stores in Los Angeles to pick up a pair of socks or underwear, buying a suit and just the right pair of boots has been my tactical mission over the last three months, so just thinking about last-minute shopping before a simchah not in my hometown is out of the question.

Each one of us is colour co-ordinated, all shoes and boots have been spit-shined and a cacophony of men's ties have been rolled alongside various coloured belts and neatly pressed, folded and boxed dressed shirts. One last-minute detail on the list are those plastic collar darts that consistently fall out of every man's dress shirts.

Fast forward to the airport where an airline employee stands in front of a lineup to weigh passengers' luggage. To my great relief, we are not one of the many families left to repack their overstuffed luggage. I spot harried travellers rushing back from the various airport vendors with new luggage to transfer their items. Hand luggage suddenly became overstuffed, and all manner of chaos abounded as initially calm travellers are now at one another's throats, scrambling to repack and rush back into line to proceed to their destinations.

We make it through with flying colours. I secretly pat myself on the back and am relieved that now I can truly sit back and relax and enjoy the long flight.

The baggage claim is quite a hike from our arrival gate, so by the time we get there the luggage has started to descend the carousel. One after another, the bags careen down the ramp until the familiar sound of the carousel grinding to a halt is heard. We count the bags and quickly realize that mine is missing. With the holiday rush, these things happen, says the overwrought baggage claims agent.

Four days later, after the simchah and accompanying festivities are over, my luggage is unceremoniously dumped on my sister's doorstep. But that's a story for another day.

The invitation in a bottle

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

There was a young man from Montreal – let's call him Jack – who met a young woman from Vancouver – let's call her Jill. The couple dated, fell in love and decided to marry, dreaming of a destination wedding on a tropical island.

In their 30s, they were determined to do everything on their own, with little advice or assistance from anyone. Of course, both sets of parents shared concerns about their children marrying in a foreign country. Would it be legal? Would it be recognized in Canada? How do you organize something like this? What are the costs? And so on.

Queries regarding the logistics of such an undertaking were heaped on the engaged couple, and over the many months of planning, Jack and Jill did share with family when and where the wedding would take place and that it would be a weeklong affair. However in response to the many other questions, it was always, "Plans are in the works, nothing is finalized yet, we'll let you know."

Invitation gave a glimpse of upcoming wedding

Eventually, family members bowed to the secretive pair's wishes and waited for further news regarding the wedding plans. And what a surprise they all received! While visiting in Montreal with Jack's family, the couple presented his parents and siblings with gold-paper-wrapped "crackers" – the kind you pull at New Year's Eve and confetti falls out. But when they pulled on the ends of these crackers, instead of confetti, bottles fell out, each filled with white sand and tiny seashells and a note attached by a ribbon with the printed inscription "Wedding Day."

Surprised and excited, and a bit confused, they carefully pulled out the corks on their bottles and gently extracted the delicate tissue-like paper on which was printed a beautiful poem, an original rhyme written by the creative couple. Jack's mom immediately read the poem aloud, part of which was, "Please come watch us wed by the setting sun. We've booked your bed, we're gonna have fun! Come celebrate with us where it's always sunny. Wallets aside, this will cost you no money. Please don't protest, don't be dismayed. Enjoy the rest, 'cause it's all been paid. And it gives us joy to share with you, so please just accept our gift, just say I do."

Amazed and in shock, Jack's family reread the poem, glancing in disbelief at one another and at the authors of this wonderfully unique wedding invitation. All were at a loss for words, not only because of the impressive, extraordinary invitation in a bottle, but stunned by the generosity of the bride and groom.

Murmurs of "are you crazy," "are you sure" and "unbelievable" echoed around the room and then silence ensued as no one knew what to say. Finally, Jack's brother joked, "I guess we have to get you a really special wedding present now."

A few days later, when the couple gathered with Jill's family, the reaction was similar. After the initial surprise and astonishment, Jill's brother repeatedly uttered, "We can't accept this, we can't accept this," until his girlfriend said, "I think the poem says that they'd just like us to accept and not protest."

Eventually calming down he admitted that he thought the whole thing was pretty cool. On the other hand, Jill's parents' reaction was opposite. They became very quiet – which Jill notes is not usually a good sign – and then there was a flurry of whispering between the two of them.

"My dad spoke finally and thanked us for the gift," said Jill, although her mother, obviously overcome with emotion, didn't say anything, but later shed tears of joy when Jill asked her how she felt.

Of course, the invitation was well received and accepted by everyone and certainly set the tone for their dream destination wedding on the beach. All the siblings expressed feelings of being exceptionally touched by such an act of largesse on the part of their brother and sister, and were totally impressed with the ingenuity and classiness of the invitation in a bottle presentation. Their parents affirmed that they felt blessed and honoured to be the ones who raised these artistic, resourceful and most generous young people.

Parliamentarians meet in U.K. to mobilize against anti-Semitism

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporters

Canada has assumed a historic leadership role in the global fight against anti-Semitism.

At last Tuesday's first-ever Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism, the 12-person Canadian delegation, led by Jason Kenney, minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism, reaffirmed Canada's firm support of Israel.

The Canadian delegation was the largest delegation at the event.

Conference organizers – who succeeded in drawing experts and public figures from 42 countries – said they faced challenges unmatched by anything they've seen for decades and could not have anticipated the urgency when they scheduled the event last year, coming as it did just a month after Israel's war in Gaza prompted a spike in anti-Semitic incidents all over the world.

Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Jason Kenny

Kenney's speech to the conference reflected Ottawa's firm pro-Israel position and its intolerance of all forms of anti-Semitism.

"One can criticize Israeli policies without being anti-Semitic. But the argument is not about criticizing the politics of the Israeli government. Lord knows there's enough of that in the Knesset. The argument is with those whose premise is that Israel itself is an abomination and that the Jews alone have no right to a homeland. And in that sense anti-Zionism is anti-Semitism," Kenney told the coalition.

Last week, Kenney was called a "professional whore" by the leader of the Canadian Arab Federation for his unabashed support of Israel.

Aside from Kenney, the other Canadian parliamentarians in attendance were Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler – one of the organizers of the conference – and Liberal MPs Anita Neville, Carolyn Bennett, Raymonde Folco, Hedy Fry, Joyce Murray and Bob Rae, as well as Conservative MPs Randy Hoback, James Lunney and Scott Reid, and Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein.

Presenters at the conference said the number and scope of anti-Semitic incidents worldwide have risen to levels not seen since the Holocaust. New technologies make the spread of hate across borders easy and quick. And last month's outbursts of anti-Semitism from London to Caracas show a well-spring of hate against Jews just waiting to be tapped.

In demonstrations in January against Israel's operation in Gaza, criticism of the Jewish state quickly turned to anti-Semitism, analysts said, with banners comparing Israelis to Nazis and Gaza to the Warsaw Ghetto.

CUPE Ontario calls for Israel boycott

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups are condemning the decision by the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) to pass a controversial motion Sunday that called for an academic boycott of Israel by Ontario universities.

The motion, voted on at a meeting in Windsor by a committee that represents CUPE Ontario's 200,000 university workers, encourages union locals to pressure Canadian universities to boycott Israeli universities – not individual Israeli academics – and to urge Ontario universities not to "conduct research that benefits the Israeli military," a CUPE Ontario news release said.

According to the union's statement, the motion calls for educational events on campus that would inform the public about Israel's "military assault on civilians in Gaza and its ongoing occupation of Palestinian land" and it encourages union locals to research military connections between Ontario and Israeli universities.

Canadian Jewish Congress released a statement that expressed its "sadness and bitter disappointment" at the union's decision.

Mark Goldberg, CJC Ontario region vice-chair, said the decision to "support the proposed discriminatory resolution represents another low point in the proud history of the Canadian labour movement's involvement in international affairs."

Dance Troupe Boycott

VANCOUVER — Israel's famed Batsheva Dance Company faced pickets at its Vancouver debut last week after local artists and activists called for a boycott of the troupe to protest Israel's war in Gaza. The group performed at the Vancouver Playhouse on Feb. 20 and 21. A local video artist, Jamie Griffiths, called for a boycott of the troupe earlier this month, and last week, a co-founder of the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel put out an open call for protesters to picket the events. The troupe has faced protests in other cities on its current North American tour, including Chicago and Pittsburgh. Canada-Israel Committee spokesperson Paul Michaels told the Georgia Straight that a boycott would be "counter-productive," since "Israeli culture, more than anything, has helped promote cross-cultural understanding."

WORLD

New Kosher Cheese

LISBON — For the first time in more than 500 years, a dairy product has been granted a hechsher in Portugal. A well-known local cheese, supervised by the chief rabbi of Porto, a city in northern Portugal, is the first dairy product to be certified kosher in Portugal since its Jews were expelled in 1497. Serra de Estrala cheese is supervised by Rabbi Daniel Litvak, an emissary for the Israel-based Shavei Israel, an outreach group for descendants of Anousim, Jews who converted against their will hundreds of years ago. The owner of the factory who asked the rabbi to supervise his cheese descends from Anousim.

Covert War On Iran

LONDON — Israel is assassinating Iranian nuclear scientists as part of a covert war against Iran's weapons program, western intelligence analysts told London's Daily Telegraph. The paper says United States intelligence sources claim that Israel is using hit men, sabotage, front companies and double agents to disrupt Iran's illicit weapons project. "The aim is to slow down or interrupt Iran's research program, without the gamble of a direct confrontation that could lead to a wider war," an intelligence analyst said.

Baha'i Men Accused

TEHRAN — Iran has accused seven Baha'i leaders of spying for Israel. The men were arrested in Iran eight months ago, the Washington Post reported. An indictment will be issued this week, Iran's state news agency said. The charges, which include "espionage for Israel, insulting religious sanctities and propaganda against the Islamic republic," could mean the death penalty if the men, members of a religion banned in Iran, are convicted. Baha'i global headquarters is in Haifa.

Death Penalty Sought

SANAA — Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty for a Yemeni Muslim who admitted to killing a Jewish countryman. The verdict on Abdul Aziz Yahya al-Abdi will be announced March 2, AFP reported. Abdi, 39, shot Masha Yaeish al-Nahari, a 30-year-old father of nine, in December. Abdi told the court he told the Yemeni Jewish community in a letter to "convert to Islam or leave Yemen, or I would kill them." Nahari was confronted near his home in the town of Raydah and told to convert. When Nahari told Abdi to leave him alone, Abdi shot him several times with a submachine-gun.

France Takes Responsibility For Shoah Role

PARIS — For the first time, France officially recognized its guilt in helping murder Jews during World War II.

On Feb. 16, the country's high court, the Council of State, took the opportunity to hold France "responsible" for sending French Jews to Nazi camps, when asked about a related case on reparations to a Shoah victim.

The council said France must "solemnly recognize the responsibility of the state and the collective prejudice suffered," because the country "permitted or facilitated the deportation from France of victims of anti-Semitic persecution," the daily le Figaro reported.

It took until 1995 for former French president Jacques Chirac to become the first French leader to publicly take responsibility for sending 76,000 French Jews to Nazi camps. Some 2,600 survived, the Paris-based Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah says. Until Chirac's statement, German occupiers under the French Vichy regime were officially blamed for killing Jews. But Chirac's comments didn't hold the legal weight of the ruling.

Chavez's 'ugly rhetoric' endangers Jews: rabbis

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two local rabbis expressed the Canadian Jewish community's deepening concern over the welfare of the approximately 25,000 Jews in Venezuela in a meeting with that country's consul general in Montreal.

Rabbis Chaim Steinmetz and Reuben Poupko spent about one hour with Adolfo Figueroa in his office, in their capacity as co-chairs of the Rabbinic Caucus of the Canada-Israel Committee. They conversed with him through a translator.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

"We told him we believe there is a direct line between the ugly rhetoric in the upper echelons of the Venezuelan government and media and the desecration of the synagogue, because that rhetoric is emboldening the anti-Semites," Rabbi Poupko said afterward, referring to the Jan. 31 vandalism and ransacking of the Tiferet Israel synagogue in Mariperez, near Caracas. They view this incident as the most blatant manifestation of a deteriorating situation for Jews in Venezuela.

The rabbis said President Hugo Chavez's anti-Israel statements, especially since the Gaza war, are putting Jews at risk. Numerous remarks of this nature have been documented by such Jewish groups as the Anti-Defamation League and the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

He has also singled out Jews, they said, citing Chavez's call for the Venezuelan Jewish community to dissociate itself from Israel's Gaza offensive, which Chavez termed a "holocaust."

Figueroa handed them a copy of a Feb. 12 press release from Elias Farache, president of the Israeli Association of Venezuela, a central Jewish organization, confirming his satisfaction with and gratitude for the criminal investigation of the synagogue desecration. It included a personal thanks to Chavez and a renunciation of attempts to implicate the government in the crime.

The Montreal rabbis regard the statement with skepticism, given the circumstances the community finds itself in.

The rabbis also voiced their opposition to Venezuela's severing of diplomatic relations with Israel in late January to protest the Gaza offensive and the suffering of the Palestinians.

Rabbi Poupko said he pointed out the irony in the fact that Venezuela maintains official ties with Iran, "a country that has vowed to destroy Israel" and that Venezuela was silent throughout the eight years Hamas fired rockets into Israel from Gaza.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko

"I suggested his government's concern for human rights should encompass Israelis as well," Rabbi Poupko said.

The meeting was "correct and polite" overall, but Figueroa vigorously defended the strength of his country's democracy and emphasized that Jews have full rights and enjoy the government's protection.

He noted that suspects in the synagogue attack were quickly arrested and that Chavez has vowed that such a thing should not happen again.

When the rabbis cited a number of reports that put Venezuelan democracy into question, Figueroa suggested that a conspiracy exists in the western media to besmirch the Chavez government.

"The key point of this meeting is that the Venezuelan consul general will make a report to his government that Jews in Canada are exceedingly concerned about what is happening and that we are watching closely," Rabbi Steinmetz said.

Figueroa handed the rabbis another press release from VTV, the public Venezuelan television network, dated Feb. 10, quoting Roy Chaderton Matos, Venezuelan ambassador to the Organization of American States. He says that the country's "state policy is based on respect towards all religious denominations" and that anti-Semitism is not "an important trend."

He denounced charges that the national government was behind the synagogue attack as an attempt to "destabiliz[e] the democratic process" in the lead-up to the referendum that was held Feb. 15 enabling the president to hold office indefinitely.

London's Jewish community speaks up for Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — In the face of mounting negative press about Israel in the local media, London, Ont.'s Jewish community has turned to activism.

Although London is the province's fourth-largest city – and the 10th-largest in Canada, with close to 500,000 residents, according to the 2006 census – its Jewish community only has about 2,800 people.

So when more than 200 of them turned up on Feb. 11 to hear Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin, talk about prospects for peace in Israel at the London Jewish Community Centre, LJCC board members took it as a good sign their nascent pro-Israel advocacy measures are making an impact in the community.

Prior to Gissin's lecture – the final one in the LJCC's annual "Israel Lecture Series" – the consul general and The CJN were invited to a private, pre-lecture dinner and conversation with members of the London Jewish Federation's new Israel Advocacy Committee.

At the meeting, committee members spoke with urgency about the need for small communities like theirs to combat the rising tide of anti-Semitism and distortions of the realities on the ground in Israel being offered up by various professors at the University of Western Ontario and being reflected in local media.

Committee member Terry Marcus said that the community's old method of relying on a few, recurring "public advocacy volunteers" to speak for them is outdated.

Now, he said, "we've had enough. The same way Israel said to Hamas. Now we have to do something."

Marcus said he hopes his community's resurgent advocacy efforts might also serve as a template for other small Jewish communities around the country.

Esther Marcus, executive director of the London Jewish Federation, told The CJN that the speaker series was initiated in 2003 to help the London community feel "more connected" to Israel, but it has since become more geared toward helping community members defend the Jewish state.

We will always fight back

From the editor's desk...

Last month, in advance of the commemoration of International Holocaust Memorial Day on Jan. 27, the Jewish Agency's Global Forum against Antisemitism issued a troubling report in Jerusalem that indicated "there was a significant and unparalleled rise in the number and severity of [anti-Semitic] incidents in January 2009."

Israel's decision to defend itself against the genocidal terrorist regime in Gaza did not sit well with the latent or overt anti-Semites, who were offended that Jews should fight back.

To be sure, the images of war in Gaza were distressing. The civilian deaths were agonizing.

Not all criticisms or demonstrations against Israel, it must be acknowledged, are the manifestations of anti-Semites.

But those individuals burning with hatred for the Jewish state are never bothered by facts, or truth, or context, or reason, or Israel's right to live as the only state in the world for Jews. They simply blame Israel. And every image they see broadcast on television is a pretext for unbridling in public the venom they hold tight in private.

Amos Hermon, chairman of the Task Force, stated that "levels of anti-Semitism climbed to a new two-decade high during Operation Cast Lead [the war in Gaza] with incidents also marked by their unprecedented levels of violence."

"Most of the recent anti-Semitic attacks," Hermon added, "were perpetrated by local Muslim groups and primarily in western Europe. There were approximately 100 incidents in France and a similar figure was given for Great Britain, including violent assault on Jews and Israelis in the Diaspora, attacks and desecration of synagogues, cemeteries and Jewish institutions; attacks on the personal property belonging to Jews; as well as virulently anti-Semitic propaganda during rallies and mass demonstrations, including drawing specific false analogies between Nazi crimes in the Holocaust and IDF activity in the Gaza Strip."

Jews are alarmed. How can it be, we ask ourselves worriedly, that the harrowing echoes of the 1930s are reverberating in the streets, in the media, in some union halls and in academia? We shake our heads, disbelieving that the year 2009 seems to indicate nothing in the advance of civilization.

And we hope that others, too, are alarmed. For as we know, the fight against anti-Semitism is not a Jewish fight alone. It is, or should be, humanity's fight.

Thankfully, there is a great deal of evidence that 2009 is not 1939 in terms of the fight against anti-Semitism. There are indeed a great many people who have joined the fight.

Last week, some 125 parliamentarians from Europe and around the world met in London for the founding conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism. (See the related stories and Perspectives essay in this issue of The CJN.) Canadian member of Parliament Irwin Cotler and British member of Parliament John Mann are the co-founders of the coalition. It was a historic occasion.

The Canadian parliamentary delegation was the largest at the conference. It included minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism, Jason Kenney, MPs Cotler, Carolyn Bennett, Raymonde Folco, Hedy Fry, Randy Hoback, James Lunney, Joyce Murray, Anita Neville, Bob Rae, Scott Reid and Senator Jerry Grafstein.

Kenney reiterated the government's resolute stance in the fight against anti-Semitism: "I hope that this forum will be the beginning of an ongoing process of educating and mobilizing parliamentarians throughout the world, and through them political formations across the spectrum, and indeed national governments to combat the scourge of anti-Semitism. I also hope that this will be the beginning, not the end, of this important work."

Despite the heartening signal it sends to us, the significance of the inaugural meeting of the inter-parliamentary coalition should not be overstated. It will not, it cannot stanch the flow of the anti-Semitic bile that unceasingly pours forth from the various headwaters of Israel's delegitimizers.

For example, Durban II, the second World Conference Against Racism, is scheduled to be held in Geneva in April during the week of Yom HaShoah v'Hagvurah. The preparatory papers that have been filed for the conference with the United Nations already single out Israel as a "racist" state.

President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela is building an alliance with his counterpart in Iran. That alliance, we know, is predicated upon abuse of Israel.

Closer to home, the Ontario University Workers' Coordinating Committee of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) voted on the weekend in Windsor to support a boycott of Israeli academic institutions. Len Rudner, regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, spoke for us all when he said: "It boggles the mind to consider that CUPE Ontario's leadership has no matter more pressing than promoting a resolution that is bigoted on its face and discriminatory in its intent. It is unfair, unbalanced and unhelpful."

The sick and sordid expressions of anti-Semitism can be overwhelming. But we must never be overwhelmed. Steeled by history and by our over-riding duties to our children and to the world, we must and we will always fight back. – MBD

ISRAEL ONCE AGAIN TO THE RESCUE

Ten immigrants were brought to Israel last week from Yemen in a secret rescue operation carried out by the Jewish Agency in co-operation with the Yemenite Jewish Federation of America. The group included nine members of the Ben-Yisrael family from Ra'ida, a community that has recently suffered harassment and persecution. Approximately 280 Jews live in Yemen – 230 in Ra'ida and some 50 in the capital of Sanaa. Many fled Sanaa about a year ago because they were being harassed by a group connected to Al Qaeda. Anti-Semitism, fomented by Muslim extremists, has increased in Yemen in recent years. The tension reached a climax last December when Moshe Yaish Nahari, a father of nine, was murdered by a Muslim extremist. A verdict against his alleged murderer is scheduled to be handed down March 2, according to reports. [Israel photo]

Jewish learning festival draws over 400

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The 440 people who attended Limmud, the Festival of Jewish Learning on Feb. 15 at the University of Toronto's Bahen Centre, are part of a phenomenon that began in England 27 years ago and has expanded to 46 countries.

More than 32,000 people have participated in Limmud worldwide, according to organizers here.

The "joy of Limmud is that [because a first-choice session is full], we often end up in a session we might not have chosen, and it's just as stimulating and exciting," said Ruth Margles, co-chair of the event's logistics team.

As a reporter, I unexpectedly ended up having the type of experience she was referring to.

The Toronto event – which first ran in 2004 when British-born Toronto accountant Peter Sevitt brought it here – was divided into five 70-minute segments, each with up to 10 sessions for participants to choose from.

A closing ceremony, featuring an "Instant Choir" that was one of the final offerings of the day, was followed later that evening by a Cool Jew Cabaret presented off-premises in conjunction with the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

The 49 daytime sessions spanned a wide range, from author Warren Bass on "The Obama Presidency," to a belly dance workshop.

For me, the session on Kaddish and the Grieving Process was personally compelling and, I felt, of wider general interest too. I am saying Kaddish for my father, and, as a baby boomer, I am part of a large cohort mourning parental loss.

At the session, CBC television producer Harry Schachter – who produced a radio documentary on Kaddish and who was joined by retired grief counsellor Thelma Feldman – spoke of the significance of the prayer and of his experiences as a "not really very religious person" saying Kaddish for 11 months after his father died in late 2006.

Novelist Sidura Ludwig

For the other session I would attend, I decided to divide my time between "Reflections on Being a Jewish Mother of Mixed Race Children," because it speaks to the diversity of today's Jewish population; and "Young Jews Talk about Judaism and the Jewish Future" – an ongoing concern in the Jewish community – where young adult panellists and their audience shared ideas on issues including intermarriage and how to reach out to non-day school graduates.

Instead, on a whim, I decided to start the day in communications consultant Lil Blume's workshop on "Writing Your Jewish Family Story," when I passed the door to her room. Blume's enthusiasm and practical advice, along with the participants' stories, almost tempted me to stay for the entire 70 minutes.

Also, in a fortuitous turn of events, one of the participants turned out to be my Scottish-born almost-cousin, Les Kelman, program co-ordinator of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto). His late aunt was married to my grandfather's cousin, a Russian immigrant to Glasgow who visited Toronto once, in the 1940s. Les and I had met in the 1970s, and corresponded by e-mail a few years ago. We agreed to meet over lunch and catch up.

Kelman and at least two other attendees were motivated to attend Limmud because of the reputation of the original event, a multi-day retreat. He and Dublin native Merriel Gordon both have sisters in England who urged them to attend the Toronto spin-off.

Although Winnipeg-born, Toronto-based novelist Sidura Ludwig, 32, never went to Limmud during the three years she lived in England – at the time she found it expensive – she also said it sounded like "a fabulous program," and that she was excited to be invited to Limmud Toronto as a presenter on a panel about "Wandering Jews."

Channa Sargon, who teaches adult Bible classes, said it was uplifting for her to learn about Jewish text at Limmud. As well, she said, she found the event "amazing" because of the mix of different segments of the Jewish community – "young, old, Orthodox and hippies."

Event chair Sharoni Sibony, 32, said she was pleased as well by the mix of "the heady, deep intellectual" sessions and the "interactive, participatory stuff."

Be realistic about peace, ex-envoy advises

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The new U.S. government headed by President Barack Obama should pursue peace in the Middle East on a realistic basis, says former American ambassador to Israel Martin Indyk.

In a teleconference with journalists last week, he suggested that previous U.S. diplomatic efforts to achieve a rapprochement between Israel and the Palestinians were simply too ambitious.

The interview was sponsored by the Israel Project, a non-profit organization devoted to educating the public about Israel.

Indyk, a two-term ambassador to Israel during the years of the Oslo peace process and the Clinton administration, described Obama's appointment of George Mitchell as special envoy to the Middle East as an unmistakable signal that he intends to try to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Martin Indyk

But in a warning, he said that the Obama administration should lower its sights by not aiming for unrealistic "transformational" objectives.

Indyk – the author of a newly published book, Innocent Abroad: An Intimate Account of American Peace Diplomacy in the Middle East – noted that the prospects for a Mideast breakthrough are presently slim.

"The landscape out there is pretty bleak," he observed, comparing the current situation to the more hopeful Oslo era. "The circumstances are different today."

The Palestinians are split into seemingly irreconcilable Fatah and Hamas camps, while Israel's recent general election virtually split the country in half, politically speaking.

As a result, Indyk said, hopes for a two-state solution are "fast evaporating," with both Israelis and Palestinians no longer believing that a peace agreement is necessarily possible.

Nonetheless, the Obama administration should not sit idly by. "We need to push on," he declared. "We have to try to generate a positive dynamic to change the landscape."

He added that Israel's future can only be guaranteed by real peace and security.

For Israel and the Palestinians to succeed in peace talks, there must be national unity on both sides, said Indyk, who is currently director of the Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institute.

A narrow right-wing government in Israel will be unstable and thus hard-pressed to move forward in negotiating peace, he said.

Still, the leader of the right-wing Likud party, Benjamin Netanyahu, will be careful not to antagonize the United States should he form Israel's next government. As a sop to Washington, Netanyahu will probably ease conditions for Palestinians in the West Bank.

More likely, he will try to resume peace talks with Syria, which were broken off nine years ago, renewed last year through Turkey's mediation and then suspended yet again.

Indyk said he's not sure whether Syria will ever accede to Israel's demand to sever ties with its allies, Iran, Hezbollah and Hamas.

But he expressed certainty that Syria will not resume talks with Israel unless there is progress on the Palestinian front.

He urged the United States to lay the groundwork for Israeli-Syrian talks by engaging Syria.

In a critique of the previous Bush administration, Indyk said that its attempts to isolate Syria were unsustainable and "did not make a lot of sense."

Indyk said that a recent Arab League peace initiative should be considered by Israel because it represents "an important shift" in Arab attitudes toward the Jewish state after the "three nos" of the 1967 Khartoum Arab summit.

Calling the Arab League initiative "a 23-state solution," he said that Israel would be making peace with all the member states of the Arab group if it accepted its proposals.

Returning to the Palestinian question, Indyk warned the United States not to deal directly with Hamas. Such contacts will undermine its moderate rival, Fatah, enable Hamas to claim a huge victory and "finish off" Palestinians who wish to make peace with Israel.

As an alternative to U.S.-Hamas talks, he said it would be far more appropriate for Arab states to engage Hamas so that it accepts Fatah's authority and its role as a negotiator with Israel.

Indyk declined to say whether Israel should negotiate with Hamas. But he pointed out that the Israeli government already has de facto relations with Hamas by virtue of Egypt's current efforts to forge another truce.

He said that Israel would be justified to keep the Gaza Strip's border crossings closed if Hamas continues to smuggle weapons through tunnels and fires rockets at Israeli communities.

Striking a gloomy note about Iran's nuclear program, Indyk said, "It's hard to believe that [Iran's] program, at a minimum, will be suspended. I'm not optimistic."

Due to these and other reasons, he said, the United States should engage Iran in direct talks.

Al-Jazeera English to apply for licence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Al-Jazeera English, the Qatar-based 24-hour international news and current events television channel, plans to apply for a broadcasting licence in Canada within the next few weeks and hopes to be on the air by the fall.

'Objective' reporting & Al-Jazeera
please see page 17

But if Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee prevail, the licence won't be granted unless the station complies with guidelines set down several years ago by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission.

Five years ago, the CRTC granted Al-Jazeera English's parent company, Al-Jazeera Arabic, permission to broadcast in Canada if it didn't violate Canadian hate laws and if Canadian cable and satellite carriers offering it kept recordings of all its broadcasts.

Canadian Jewish organizations had accused Al-Jazeera Arabic of carrying anti-Israel and anti-Semitic material.

No Canadian cable or satellite providers agreed to pick up Al-Jazeera Arabic, which was launched in 1996 and is now available in more than 100 countries, including Israel.

Six years after Al-Jazeera Arabic submitted its application in Canada, Al-Jazeera English – which launched in 2006 and claims to be watched in 140 million households – is seeking a licence.

Its bid will be presented to the CRTC by its sponsor and carrier, Ethnic Channels Group, a Canadian, Toronto-based multi-ethnic broadcaster that offers programming in a number of languages ranging from Arabic and Hebrew to German and Russian.

Tony Burman, managing director of Al Jazeera English, said last week that it has never broadcast anti-Semitic comment and has always been balanced and fair in its coverage of Israel and the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Burman, the former editor-in-chief of CBC News, said that Al-Jazeera English's "fair, thorough and restrained" reporting of Middle East affairs is intended "to inform, not inflame."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Congress, is skeptical.

"We have always opposed the request by Al-Jazeera for a broadcast licence," he said. "The only true record we have of Al-Jazeera is the parent Arabic station, which has broadcast anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial."

Farber said he might revise his views if Al-Jazeera English complies with CRTC regulations. "At the very least, these guidelines would have to be fully honoured. Anything less would be unacceptable. The key guidelines [centre] around the need for a delay in broadcasting so that any hate-mongering could be dealt with prior to coming on air, and signed guarantees of responsibility to ensure that Canada's laws pertaining to hate promotion and broadcast standards would be honoured."

Asked why Al-Jazeera English shouldn't get a Canadian licence when it's available in Israel, Farber replied, "Israel must deal with issues pertinent to its geopolitical circumstances. Canada is in a much different situation with laws that address broadcasting, all of which must be adhered to."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said that Al-Jazeera has a record of advancing "a skewed narrative of the past and present without regard for objectivity or the journalistic standards we have established in Canada."

He added: "There is a sufficient body of evidence about Al-Jazeera English to support concerns about the nature of its coverage and its tendency to generate anti-Semitic sentiments here in Canada."

Fogel said Israeli viewers have "the resources and opportunities" to balance Al-Jazeera's "manipulated information."

He added: "Here in Canada, however, the audience is considerably more naive and lacks the capacity to view the broadcast in a critical way, or to seek alternative perspectives."

As a result, Canadian viewers may draw "tainted and compromised" conclusions.

Saying there's "significant demand" for Al-Jazeera English in Canada, Burman appeared to reject Farber's demand that it comply with special CRTC guidelines.

"Anyone who takes the time to watch Al-Jazeera English would agree that these sanctions are completely unnecessary. Al-Jazeera English is available and popular in England, and it is regulated by Ofcom, the body that oversees England's media organizations and deals with issues of impartiality and fairness. In two years of broadcasting, Al-Jazeera English has never experienced a serious problem. Further, Al-Jazeera English journalists are required to follow a strict code of ethics."

Burman said that Al-Jazeera English would never carry anti-Semitic comments or Holocaust denial, which would be contrary to its code of ethics and offensive "to us and our viewers."

During the recent Gaza war, he said, Al-Jazeera English was the only international English news channel to cover it from both sides.

"Reviews of our coverage were overwhelmingly positive," he said.

"Our coverage of Israel is now and has always been balanced and fair. People are often surprised to learn that Al-Jazeera English is broadcast throughout Israel... Israeli politicians speak directly on Al-Jazeera, on both the Arabic and English channels."

Burman said that Al-Jazeera Arabic made it possible, for the first time, for Israelis to reach the Arab world unfiltered.

Bigotry's advance guard

There is a growing sense that the fate and reputation of York University in Toronto as a welcoming place of higher learning and enlightened intellectual inquiry hangs tenuously in a balance weighted increasingly at one end by a small cadre of bigots, thugs, poseurs and impostors.

As reported in The CJN, Jewish students feel ever more threatened by anti-Israel, anti-Semitic rhetoric and, of late, even menacing behaviour.

The chilling, ugly anti-Israel scene at Vari Hall, followed by the potentially dangerous mob siege of Jewish students in the Hillel lounge, were the latest, if most frightening, tugs of the university toward low and shameful standing.

In response to those events, York's president, Mamdouh Shoukri, issued a statement in which he urged students to respect one another. "It really is time for the student leaders at the organizational and club level to consider the effects of their actions on their fellow students. Every student at York has the right to go about their activities free from intimidation or disruption to their academic lives." York's vice-president for students, Rob Tiffin, added: "Students have a right to study in an atmosphere of personal safety, mutual respect and tolerance from other students – especially, student organizational and club leaders. No one should feel singled out based on their political beliefs."

These views are commendable, high statements of purpose and protection.

But they are a bare-bones minimum that comprise merely the floor on which all college and university structures in a free and democratic country must stand.

To be more than slogans, however, these floorboard statements must be propped up. They must be enforced and reinforced, constantly, diligently and unfailingly.

The floor at York University is crumbling.

Many Jewish students are not able "to go about their activities free from intimidation or disruption to their academic lives." They are indeed "singled out based on their political beliefs."

Jewish community leaders have rightly demanded of the university's administration that it ensure that student codes of conduct are strictly followed. Where codes are lacking, they should be toughened. Where legitimate complaints under the codes are hindered or blocked, they should be expedited.

The atmosphere at York will likely become even more polluted with noxious anti-Israel hatred during the singularly vile Israel Apartheid Week. Tyler Shipley, spokesperson for CUPE local 3903, which represents contract faculty and teaching assistants at York, has announced that his union will try to get the university to cut its ties with Israel.

York's administration is being tested by bigotry's advance guard, which singles out only the Jewish state and wishes to see it disappear from among the family of nations. They must not fail that test.

Three sons took Birthright Israel trips

Recently, the last of my three sons to participate in the Birthright Israel program returned from his visit to Israel. The Jewish community is second to none for its philanthropy and other contributions to society, but this one is something special.

The Israeli government, the ultra-generous philanthropists, including the Bronfman family, and so many more, as well as the project leaders, are owed a great debt and are to be thanked by myself and world Jewry. At a time when we are faced with the threats of low birth rates, indifference, ignorance and over-assimilation by many fellow Jews, their contribution is a true blessing.

My sons were raised in the community and the religion, but their Birthright Israel trips just cemented the connection. I don't know what difference this will make for the most recent arrival, but the first to go returned an ardent Zionist planning to make aliyah. The second has started eating more kosher and is training as a madrich in the community.

Even more miraculously, they have a cousin who recently participated. His father is a dear fellow, but a Jew in name only, raised secularly and atheistically, and his mother is Thai. He came back "blown away" and determined to know more about his Jewish roots.

My personal thanks to all responsible. May they be able to continue this for a long time. To those who are eligible, I say, "Go!" I wish I could.

Freedom of speech can be abused

The conviction of Omar Bulphred in Montreal for firebombing Jewish institutions is a predictable extension of the rampant anti-Semitism now taking place on many university campuses ("Seven years for 'jihad' firebombing too little, CJC says," CJN, Feb. 19). While freedom of speech is a cherished right, it can be abused by allowing the organization of groups such as Students Against Israeli Apartheid. The recent Israeli election puts the lie to the fact that Israel is anything like an apartheid state, as Arabs freely vote with Jews and their representatives take seats in the Knesset. Hatred against Jews and Israel is fomented by people who rail against the Jewish state but who remain strangely silent about atrocities being committed in Sudan, Somalia, Iraq and Afghanistan. University presidents and senates should take positive action against groups who preach hatred and racism. How can one expect intelligent and civilized debate when a so-called august body like the United Nations Human Rights Council spends 90 per cent of its time condemning Israel and ignores flagrant human rights abuses by its own member states?

Will Obama be good for the Jews?

As I watched the unrelenting media coverage of U.S. President Barack Obama's recent inauguration and black Americans repeating the phrases, "We had a dream" and "Not in our lifetime" and the word "transformational," it evoked a memory of another transformational event when we Jews had occasion to repeat the same words and euphorically rejoice in a dream fulfilled.

In his column, CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat suggests that most people of our generation will be able to recall where we were on Jan. 20, 2009 ("A historic inauguration," CJN, Jan. 29). Most Jews of my generation can recall where we were on May 14, 1948. It was one of the greatest days in Jewish history. Without the virtual reality of TV and the immediacy of the moment, we listened on our shortwave radios to David Ben-Gurion as the Declaration of Independence was read and signed, concluding with the words "The State of Israel is established. This meeting is adjourned" (it was the first live transmission from the new radio station Kol Yisrael). It was Erev Shabbat, so festivities were delayed until Sunday, May 16.

The euphoria was short-lived, as Arab armies invaded soon after. African-Americans had a 200-year-old dream. We, the Jewish people, had a 2,000-year-old dream. But 60 years after we thought our dream had come true, with the vilification of Israel, I wonder if the dream, at best, is merely an illusion or at worse a nightmare. Transformational events bother me as they often lead to unintended consequences. As I watched the inauguration ceremony, I asked the question that is always in the back of our minds: will Obama be good for the Jews?

Who's minding the store?

Hello? Anyone there? Once it could be a typo, but three times in last week's front-page story? In the quote, "They were saying, 'Who's campus? Our campus.' We were saying, "Who's campus? Everyone's campus,'" the word "who's" should have been "whose," as in "Whose campus? Our campus!" ("Students under 'siege' at York U," CJN, Feb. 19.)

Strategies to fight anti-Semitism globally

By HERSHELL EZRIN & BERNIE FARBER

In the opening of A Tale of Two Cities, Charles Dickens wrote: "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times;… it was the season of Light, it was the season of Darkness;… we had everything before us, we had nothing before us…"

As we joined with 125 parliamentarians representing 42 countries and 80 experts at the London Conference on Combating Anti-Semitism last week to devise practical ways to combat rising anti-Semitic trends, these thoughts echoed in our minds. Here, at the historic Palace of Westminster and the magisterial surroundings of Lancaster House, co-hosted by the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office and several British ministers, Jews and non-Jews were encouraged to form a common purpose and voice to eradicate anti-Semitism in all its manifestations.

Contrast those scenes to the daily sessions where horrific and disgusting examples of the rise of new forms of anti-Semitism were unveiled and analyzed. Added to classical forms and stereotyping of anti-Semitism was the linkage of anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, the pernicious rise of Islamist extremist hate, and finally, state-encouraged or assisted anti-Semitism as practised by Iran and Venezuela.

By meeting's end, the tabling of evidence was counterbalanced by the genuine, outspoken, public commitment of non-Jewish parliamentarians and their governments to act in solidarity and implement innovative ideas to fight this ancient scourge of the dislike and hatred of the unlike.

Beyond the physical threats and dangers rest the emotional turmoil and psychological damage of anti-Semitism, the sense of isolation. In one public session, representatives from across Europe, North America, and even Tunisia and Morocco, spoke about the need to act globally to eradicate anti-Semitism, and outlined concrete programs and plans. This time, Jews were not alone.

In the gilt-edged Lancaster House almost 60 years ago, 12 nations, including Canada, negotiated a permanent organization called NATO to protect Europe and North America. Today, in this same hall, a Canadian minister, Jason Kenney, accompanied by a group of 10 Canadian parliamentarians, Conservatives and Liberals, spelled out his government's ambitious plan to fight anti-Semitism and to restore civil dialogue. We had the clear impression that a new, determined strategy to defend global Jewish communities was being articulated in the London Declaration pledging to fight anti-Semitism, signed on the final day of the conference on behalf of all participating nations. Kenney's voice was joined by the foreign ministers of Italy and the Czech Republic, the vice-president of the German Bundestag, and numerous other leaders.

We face a long and hard battle, and our goal will suffer many ups and downs. But the London Declaration outlines a clear road map for action, best practices sharing and joint commitment.

Ironically, being able to capture with hard evidence different aspects of the current situation ultimately helps in harnessing broader intellectual and physical resources to act. For example, the U.K. Community Security Trust (CST), which co-hosted the London conference, has developed one of the leading evidentiary methodologies for tracking and understanding anti-Semitic incidents. Last week, it noted that a decrease in anti-Semitic incidents in 2008 (for the second year running) was totally overshadowed by an unprecedented rise during and after the Gaza operations. Other European countries present reported similar upswings. The implementation of a more sophisticated evidentiary system based on common standards is one of the goals of the London Declaration. Time and again during the conference, the need to have hard evidence and not let emotion overtake our demands for action was stressed.

The extent to which state-sponsored or encouraged anti-Semitism has grown was chillingly underscored by the current climate in Venezuela. An article that appeared in one of the most rabid Venezuelan government-sponsored media outlets has been rightly described as a call for a Venezuelan Kristallnacht. It states: "Denounce publicly with names and last names the members of the powerful Jewish groups present in Venezuela, indicting the companies they own in order to establish a boycott… in that respect, [for] capitalist agents, as these Zionist Hebrews are, the thing that hurts them most is the pocket. It is inappropriate to buy their products and go to their stores… Question the existence in Venezuela of educational institutions for Jews only, as if they were a different class from our population, since it is not possible for the existence of a state within a state… Publicly challenge every Jew that you find in the street, shopping centre or park, [and] take a stand shouting at them in favour of Palestine."

Italian parliamentarian Fiamma Nirenstein spoke of how the Italian Parliament handled the presence of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at a UN Food and Agriculture Organization conference in Rome last year. No official member of the Italian government's Chambers of Deputies or leadership met with him. This was the most direct way to send a message that his Holocaust denier's views and threats to Israel's existence are unacceptable. Other parliamentarians agree that political isolation combined with stricter adherence to international commitments on combating anti-Semitism are tools to be used more frequently.

Denis MacShane, a former minister for Europe in the U.K. Labour government and founder of the all-party enquiry into anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom, was one of a number of speakers to call on the left to be "as vocal in denouncing anti-Semitism as it is in criticizing Israel."

Jews, non-Jews unite for common purpose

In a current article in Progress, he says that "to attack what the government of Israel does is legitimate politics. But what is not legitimate is to turn criticism of Israel into a condemnation of Jews and to paint them again today, as in the past, in negative stereotypes that deny their faith, their birth, their right not to be frightened and their right to support their affiliations and their causes."

MacShane notes that "parts of the British, European and world left have now thrown in their lot with the rise of a new reactionary anti-Semitism… We only hear hate against Israel… open anti-Semitic attacks that took place by Jew-haters who used the anger over the Gaza conflict to attack Jews… for the many who revealed the depth of their hatred of Jews… the issue is not Israel but the very existence of the Jews… There will be no peace in the Middle East unless anti-Semitism is removed as a component ideology of those who oppose Israel. The left has to be as tough in denouncing the Hamas charter, with its litany of hate against Jews, as it is tough in demanding more jaw-jaw and less war-war from Israel."

Other participants focused on Islamist extremist anti-Semitism.

In the expert sessions, several trends that create a new world of anti-Semitism were identified that require different strategic responses. They included the emergence and the exponential growth of the Internet – anti-Semitism, which was once marginalized, is now readily available. As David Harris of the American Jewish Committee said, "the Internet is the greatest single incubator, repository and distribution channel of anti-Semitism."

A number of innovative strategies were identified, including legal and cyberspace definitions. There was universal agreement that legal sanctions coupled with education and cyber technology must work in tandem. One of the most unusual was the establishment of a critical reasoning and use program in education curricula when using Internet sources because so much of what is on the Internet is not verified or anything more than rumour or hearsay. Another idea gaining ground is the assignment of study programs by university professors to critique Internet entries and identify mistakes.

A second trend was dealing with the newly globalized western communities and new and emerging communities that are unfamiliar with Jews or their issues. We need to go back to basics with these communities in order to establish new relationships not only to tackle anti-Semitism, but also to protect the general fabric of a pluralistic society.

With the aging of a Holocaust generation of survivors, liberators and eyewitnesses, Jewish communities need a whole new dimension and vocabulary to present the Holocaust narrative, which is in danger of being hijacked by opposing forces.

Finally, several experts discussed the vulnerability of Israel's losing a perception of like-mindedness to liberal societies, especially with a younger generation.

Of all the strategies and tactics reviewed, one stood out for broader emulation. It was the development of all-party enquiries into the state of anti-Semitism in individual countries. Such a committee establishes a clear focus and accountabilities, a specific timeline for co-ordinated action by government ministries, agencies and law enforcement groups and a political check against any attempts at appeasement. It ensures that the fight against anti-Semitism becomes validated by all parties, and avoids anti-Semitism serving as a wedge issue among politicians. It puts the onus for leadership of the battle on non-Jews who have the most credibility in pushing this agenda within-civil society.

John Mann was the driving force behind the London conference. With his steering committee members, including Irwin Cotler, the battle against anti-Semitism has been taken to a new level. In our view, the committee's goal to adopt an effective framework to confront anti-Semitism on a global level is being achieved. Kol hakavod to the leaders for their vision.

We Jews have survived worse

You may have noticed that your brokerage accounts have been a lot smaller recently. Financial monkey business has left the world economy in the worst financial situation in 70 years, and your accounts are feeling the pain.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Meltdowns can crush your spirit. After losing everything you own, it's easy to lose our confidence, too. Even billionaires can surrender to despair.

A leading German businessman, Adolf Merckle, threw himself under a train. The financial crisis took his money. A crisis of faith took his soul.

But we can cope with this financial meltdown. I say this with some authority, because I'm Jewish. Jews are world experts on crisis. Jews have endured expulsions, inquisitions, crusades, pogroms and a genocide, and yet we've lived to see another day. Jews have found hope in the most hopeless of situations.

Jewish optimism is reflected in our holiday schedule. Some like to joke that the theme of all the Jewish holidays is, "They tried to kill us. We survived. Let's eat." Actually, the joke is true. We celebrate Passover because we survived Pharaoh, Sukkot because we survived the desert, Purim because we survived Haman, and Chanukah because we survived the Seleucid Empire. Jewish holidays are all variations on a recurring theme. Why?

Repetition has a powerful effect on character. The Sefer Hachinuch says that the multiple commandments commemorating the Exodus are necessary because "man is transformed by his actions." Constant commemoration leaves a permanent imprint on one's personality. All these holidays remind us that redemption isn't a pipe dream. By consistently reliving the memories of past triumphs, Jews remind themselves, to use the words of David Ben-Gurion, that "in order to be a realist, you must believe in miracles."

Even at the worst times, you can find hope by remembering the past. Yaffa Eliach recounts an improvised seder in Bergen Belsen. Rabbi Israel Spira, the Bluzhover Rebbe, spoke to the children and quoted Isaiah's messianic vision: "The people walking in darkness have seen a great light; on those living in the land of the shadow of death a light has dawned." He told the children that they, too, could hope for redemption, to walk out of darkness into light. The message is one every Jew has heard repeatedly: redemption is possible, and you must believe in miracles.

The recession has hurt many people. But no matter how hard the situation, we must never abandon hope. After all, in a few weeks, there will be another holiday, reminding us that if you want to be a realist, you must believe in miracles.

Student unions should stick to student issues

Earlier this month, McGill University students voted 436 to 263 to postpone indefinitely a Students' Society resolution condemning the "bombings" of "educational institutions in Gaza." The initiative paralleled similar resolutions that passed at other Canadian universities, including the University of Toronto and York. But a clear majority of McGill students proclaimed that they didn't want their student union developing a foreign policy. As pro-Palestinian forces try to import yet another round of the Middle East conflict to campus, the McGill majority endorsed the vision of a student society devoted to students' needs and enhancing campus society, not pontificating about political conflicts far away.

Gil Troy in Montreal

True, it's the academic's conceit to comment about everything. We enjoy passing judgment from our cushy ivory towers, inviting our students to join our know-it-all chorus. Few students need such encouragement, compelled as they are by their own youthful vanity to judge the world that their elders have bequeathed them.

Student political organizations convey that spirit, legitimately. Campuses should be filled with many social, political and religious organizations, reflecting diverse attitudes, ideologies and political persuasions. I'm proud of my students who campaigned for now-U.S. President Barack Obama, and my student – note the singular – who supported Senator John McCain. I love seeing young Liberals and Conservatives electioneering, and I applaud the passion of those from beyond the conventional political spectrum, too.

Nevertheless, students' partisan identities shouldn't intrude on student union politics. The inspiration that so many students drew from Obama was commendable, but it would have been appalling if a student union had circulated a motion praising Obama and condemning McCain. This would have turned the student union into partisan Democratic headquarters, making it the student disunion.

Following a similar rationale, anti-Israel resolutions are divisive and distracting, as well as disproportionate and discriminatory. They sabotage the modern university's commitment to diversity. All great universities today welcome students of different religions, nationalities, races and creeds. Pronouncing on a hot-button issue, implying that students share some consensus position, imposes thought control and presumptions of uniformity where none exist. This posture of unity will foster disunity, importing passionate divisions into where they don't belong. Such incendiary, irrelevant resolutions distract from what should be a student society's mission: improving students' experiences.

Five years ago, engineering and commerce students at Concordia University rebelled against their student union's political obsessions. Students were embarrassed that all too often, job recruiters related to Concordia as a place characterized by radical, sometimes violent, pro-Palestinian stands rather than as a centre of academic excellence. The students elected new leaders committed to helping students, not developing a foreign policy.

Finally, the resolutions themselves give a slanted view of a complex conflict. They ignore the role of Hamas, a terrorist group with an anti-Semitic, genocidal charter that advocates Israel's destruction, in triggering the recent violence, cowering behind educational institutions, mosques and hospitals, and targeting Israeli schools.

Where were these concerned students when 10,000 Palestinian rockets bombarded Israel? Where were student unions when these rockets fell on Sapir College in the Negev or on nurseries, kindergartens, elementary schools and high schools in Sderot and its environs? Where is the outrage that smuggled Grad missiles menaced Ben-Gurion University, or that Soroka Hospital in Be'er Sheva – which serves Jews, Christians, Muslims, Druze and Bedouin equally – is targeted? Does anybody care that Soroka had to place sandbags on its sleep lab and evacuate its maternity ward under fire?

More profoundly, has anyone condemned Hamas for threatening chances of a two-state solution by using the Gaza pullout to launch rockets and dig tunnels rather than building a functioning civil society? The umbrage at Israel's actions seems false and disproportionate, thus discriminatory, singling out the Jewish state for special scrutiny and particular enmity.

Campuses are fragile ecosystems, special places where many different people congregate to live together and learn together. Campus leaders have a special responsibility to avoid polluting the atmosphere with poisonous rhetoric, biased behaviour and irrelevant assaults on fellow students' sensibilities. Indulging in foreign policy postures regarding explosive issues, particularly the Middle East, fails that test – raising tensions rather than alleviating them, doing nothing to solve the conflict and importing tensions from 10,000 kilometres away too close to home.

Confronting campus anti-Semitism

Things are tough on university campuses these days, where anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism have gained a foothold. As the rhetoric, intensity and decibels rise, many students across North America report feeling shocked, assaulted and intimidated by what they encounter.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Campus anti-Semitism comes in as many forms as in the rest of society. Although prejudice against Jews and Judaism is "the oldest hatred," to use the phrase of historian Robert Wistrich, it has the dubious fortune of finding itself endlessly renewed. New Republic literary editor Leon Wieseltier recently pointed to "religious varieties and secular varieties; theological varieties; political varieties and cultural varieties; old varieties and new varieties… of the right… and of the left. And… anti-Zionism."

The so-called "Israel Apartheid Week" (IAW) is becoming increasingly and disturbingly a feature of North American campuses. Its demonstrations and exhibitions bring together what historian Jonathan Judaken has identified as five "vectors" of contemporary anti-Semitism: Holocaust denial, anti-Zionism, anti-Semitism of the far left, anti-Semitism of the Islamic world and anti-Semitism couched in anti-racism.

Very few universities have prohibited IAW outright. It's difficult for universities to ban it, because doing so would appear to be censorship and would run up against the concept of academic freedom. While academic freedom means slightly different things in different countries, the underlying principle is, in the words of the U. S. Supreme Court, that "teachers and students must always remain free to inquire, to study and to evaluate, to gain new maturity and understanding; otherwise our civilization will stagnate and die."

The American Association of University Professors elaborates: "Universities… interpret, explore, and expand that knowledge by testing the old and proposing the new. This mission… inspires vigorous debate on those social, economic and political issues that arouse the strongest passions. In the process, views will be expressed that may seem to many wrong, distasteful or offensive. Such is the nature of freedom to sift and winnow ideas. On a campus that is free and open, no idea can be banned or forbidden. No viewpoint or message may be deemed so hateful or disturbing that it may not be expressed."

Universities, however, must also ensure the safety of students and abide by the laws of the land. Canadian universities must balance the principle of free speech with laws governing hate speech, libel and defamation. All campuses must prevent physical violence. And it's difficult to reconcile the notion of rigorous debate with slogans and clenched fists.

As universities find ways to balance intersecting and sometimes opposing principles, are campus communities helpless in the face of such movements as IAW? I don't think so. After the initial shock of disturbing and distorting images and rhetoric, students are finding their voices to counter its arguments.

It's crucial to arm oneself with knowledge. In addition to knowledge about Israeli history, politics and culture, books and courses that deal with the history, strategies and manifestations of anti-Semitism help to contextualize contemporary attitudes and to explain to others why certain remarks and arguments are anti-Semitic.

While Israelis hold diverse opinions and may be critical of government policies without being anti-Semitic, criticism of Israel quickly morphs into anti-Semitism, especially when it denies Israel's right to exist. Anti-Zionism often adopts the tactics and mentality of anti-Semitism.

Three classic anti-Semitic strategies are scapegoating, demonizing and isolating Jews.

Scapegoating means blaming a person or group for things that go wrong, as Jews were blamed for Germany's problems under National Socialism, or as Israel is deemed the root cause of political unrest in the entire Middle East, or globally.

Demonizing means presenting a person or group as evil by nature – considering Jews degenerate and immoral, or Zionism inherently racist. These ways of thinking have isolated Jews in the face of oppression, just as claims that Israel is racist, apartheid or Nazi-like have cast Israel as a "pariah state," outside the family of nations.

Some scholars of anti-Semitism have begun to refer to its latest manifestation as "Judaeophobia" and "Israelophobia." These new terms tell progressive groups on campus – who actively oppose such things as homophobia and Islamophobia – that current anti-Israel discourse reflects an irrational fear that leads to hatred and discrimination.

Students attend universities to get an education. Increasingly, they're also empowering themselves to become educators.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Daytona Beach

When Harry and Bella Pepper arrived in Daytona Beach during World War I, this pleasant, sun-dappled seaside resort in northeastern Florida – probably best known for the Daytona 500 at the Daytona International Speedway – was still something of a raw frontier town.

Sheldon Kirshner in Florida

"Florida was just opening up," said their youngest daughter, Doris Katz, who was one of the first Jewish children born here. "It was the new world."

She chuckled. "My parents said that Florida was the land of alligators and mosquitoes."

The Peppers moved to Daytona Beach, in Volusia county, from Providence, R.I. "My father thought it had a lot of potential and was beautiful. And Florida seemed easier to get to from the East Coast than California."

Daytona Beach was incorporated as a town in 1876, but long before this happened, European explorers from Spain, Britain and France set down roots here, establishing sugar cane, indigo, rice and cotton plantations.

During the three Seminole wars in the 19th century, the plantations were burned down by the indigenous aboriginal inhabitants, setting off a flight of white settlers.

In the wake of the U.S. Civil War, during which Florida seceded from the United States and joined the Confederacy, the region was resettled and orange groves sprang up.

But even as the first buds of prosperity appeared in Florida's abundant sunshine, the new settlers were faced with malaria and yellow fever epidemics and a shortage of fresh water.

These problems were overcome, and once the railroad was finished in 1886, developers began building hotels to accommodate tourists converging on Florida.

By the early 1900s, Daytona Beach had made a name for itself as the cradle of speed.

Automobile enthusiasts had discovered that its hard-packed beaches were ideally suited for car races – which took place in the sedate suburb of Ormond Beach – and land speed records were set here. Shortly afterward, the Peppers arrived, becoming one of Daytona Beach's first permanent Jewish residents.

Until then, said Katz, virtually the only Jews found in Daytona Beach were tourists from the north escaping the harsh winter.

Harry Pepper, however, was not all that interested in the fine weather. He was a merchant who wanted a fresh start. "He did a little of everything, and then got into real estate and retailing," she said.

As she recalls, many of the Jewish shop owners were practically the only merchants who offered African-American customers the convenience of credit. Back then, Daytona Beach, like most or all towns in Florida, was segregated.

"It was very hard on black people," said Katz. "I never had a black classmate until I attended university."

The Jewish community went along with the flow, accepting the racial mores of the day, but Katz's brother, a lawyer, turned into a civil rights activist.

A bird's eye view of Daytona Beach

Katz was born in 1925, six years after her sister, Florence Schott, became the first Jewish girl born in Daytona Beach.

As Katz recalls, she was always the only Jewish kid in her class. "But it was never a problem. There were no signs of anti-Semitism."

Not really.

While still in high school, Katz, an outstanding student, was shocked and saddened to learn that a senior administrator had tried to shunt her aside as the school's representative. "He didn't want a Jew representing the school."

And one of Daytona Beach's most elegant hotels posted a sign that read: No dogs or Jews. "There was some institutional anti-Semitism," she noted.

Reflecting on that era of explicit racial intolerance and discrimination, Katz, a resident of Ormond Beach, mused, "Daytona Beach has changed tremendously. It has grown up."

As she tells it, the first Jewish inhabitants of Daytona Beach had to work hard to be practising Jews.

"There were no institutions or rabbis. I remember going door to door asking for $5 donations to pay for the visiting rabbi's salary."

Her father, a pillar of the community, opened his home to prayer services and had a hand in founding the local Jewish cemetery and Temple Israel, the first shul in town and in Volusia county.

A Conservative synagogue, one of several shuls in Daytona Beach today, it was founded in 1924 on the bank of the Halifax River. Its current rabbi, Amy Mayer, is the first female rabbi in its history.

Katz has personally witnessed the development of the Jewish community.

"I've seen it grow from 60 to about 1,300 families and from one synagogue to three or four. Daytona Beach has always been a good place to raise children," said Katz, whose son and daughter live elsewhere in Florida.

Her husband, Mervyn Katz, was a businessman. She married him in 1946 after dropping out of Brown University, where she studied liberal arts on a scholarship.

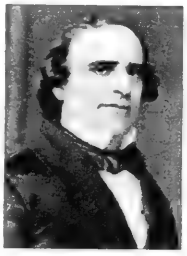
Of the estimated 4,000 to 5,000 Jews in Daytona Beach and environs, a fair proportion are from out of state.

Gloria Max, the executive director of the United Jewish Appeal Federation, came here from Toronto in 1983.

Jeff Bigman, a lawyer originally from New York City, and his wife, a physician, settled here in 1995. Bigman is one of the founders of the Jewish Heritage Festival, the first one of which was held last year.

Surprisingly, perhaps, neither he nor Max had ever heard of two of Florida's most illustrious Jewish sons, David Sholtz and David Levy Yulee, whom Katz described as "a powerful man to whom we can point to with pride."

Sholtz (1891-1953), the 26th governor of Florida, was born in New York City but started a law practice in Daytona Beach after graduating from university.



David Levy Yulee

By turns a one-term member of the state's House of Representatives, a state attorney and a city judge, he was governor from 1933 to 1937, when the Depression cast a giant shadow on the nation.

Credited with founding the Florida Parks Service and the Citrus Commission, Sholtz passed a workers' compensation law and introduced free textbooks in public schools.

In 1938, he ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Senate, losing the Democratic primary to Claude Pepper, a political powerhouse not related to Katz's parents.

Yulee (1810-1886) was Florida's first U.S. senator and the first known American Jew to sit in the Senate.

Born on the island of St. Thomas, West Indies, he was the son of Moses Elias Levy, a Sephardi Jew from Morocco whose dream was to build a colony for Jews in Florida's north central interior, near Daytona Beach. (He failed.)

Brought to Florida as a child, Yulee was raised on his father's plantation. A lawyer, Yulee was partially responsible for drafting the state's first constitution. After Florida was admitted to the union in 1845, he was elected to the U.S. Senate.

Defeated for re-election in 1850, he was re-elected in 1855. He served until 1861, when he withdrew to sit in the Congress of the Confederacy. Imprisoned in 1865 for supporting the Confederacy, he spent his final years as a railroad builder.

Both Levy county and the town of Yulee are named after him. Plaques in his honour are found at the Chamber of Commerce in Fernandina Beach and the Yulee Sugar Mill Ruins Historic State Park in Homosassa.

"He was quite a personality," said Katz.

2008: Another Great Year at Romspen

Many investors now regret that they took on more risk than they realized by overweighting their portfolios with stock market investments. They are now waiting for these investments to recover. But is this really the best solution?

For a risk-averse investment strategy consider the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, a leading Canadian non-bank commercial mortgage lender. Since inception and including 2008, investors in the RMIF have earned about 10% per annum. That's not just a paper gain – it's cash paid to investors each and every month. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

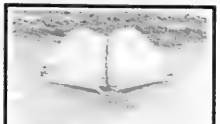
The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

We need more inclusion

By RABBI MICHAL SHEKEL

I dare say most of us have had the experience of being the last chosen for a team-or not chosen at all. For some of us, this is a daily experience. My brother is one such individual. Today he would be called developmentally disabled. In his youth, the term was "mentally retarded."



Whatever term is used, the effect is the same. People look at you in a funny way. People avoid you. People are uncomfortable around you. People treat you as less than human – not once or twice, not just when it's time to choose sides for basketball, but all the time, every day of your life.

Even people who are nice to you may do so more out of kindness or pity rather than engage you as the human being you are. We do this when we instil such individuals with saintly traits instead of accepting them as people just like us, all created in the Divine image, all possessing comparable qualities and faults. I know, because I am as guilty of this as the next person, and I should know better.

There are also instances when we as a community should know better. Imagine staring at the steps leading into shul but having no way of reaching the entrance. Imagine being unable to participate because there are no large-print siddurim, no audio enhancement devices or no sign-language interpreters. Imagine being unable to find spiritual fulfilment because you're too worried that your behaviour will be misunderstood and deemed inappropriate. Too many of us need not imagine any of this. We experience it.

This year, we're embarking on a communal effort to know better and to do better. We can't call ourselves a caring community unless we truly embrace all of our members, and allow them to embrace us. That's why last Shabbat in Toronto was designated Shabbat Itanu – itanu means "with us" in Hebrew. It's all-inclusive. We're only a community when all obstacles are eradicated – be they obstacles of age, or physical, mental and emotional differences. Shabbat Itanu was the start of Inclusion Awareness Week, the first in an annual series of events to educate ourselves and dismantle the barriers that exist in our community, be they in our shuls, our schools, our organizations or our attitudes.

This week's parshah, Trumah, provides a wonderful model for inclusion. God instructs Moses regarding gifts for the building of the mishkan (tabernacle): "You shall accept gifts for Me from every person whose heart so moves him" (Exodus 25:2).

The gifts aren't just from individuals of a certain class or of certain abilities. They're from everyone who wants to participate. They range from gold and silver to wood, yarns and goat hair. If God encouraged everyone who wanted to participate to do so, how can we deny access to those whose hearts move them?

Inclusion Action Week is a starting point for each one of us. As Ben Zoma teaches in Pirkei Avot (4:1): "Who is wise? The one who learns from everyone."

Why we must find joy in Adar

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Preparing for Purim involves reorienting ourselves well in advance. In fact, we are told to begin increasing our joy right at the onset of the month of Adar. The sages state that when the month of Adar begins, we are to start amplifying our joy.

Certainly the holiday of Purim is a festival of joy, but why should we start celebrating in advance?

Interestingly, we assume that the holiday of Purim is synonymous with happiness and joy. How could it not be? A terrible disaster was averted. An evil and powerful man, Haman, was brought down, and innocent lives were saved. All this was accomplished through a reaffirmation of Jewish identity, unity and common destiny. Without question, it was a joyous moment. And yet, there's also a downside to the events.

The predicament of exile in which the Jews of Persia find themselves at the beginning of the story hasn't really changed. The Jews begin the Purim story exiled in a foreign empire, and they end the story in exactly that same place. Although the evil decree of Haman did not come to pass, neither could it be rescinded. The only way for the Jews to protect themselves is to deliver a pre-emptive strike against anyone armed and ready to join Haman. The only solution possible is warfare.

Haman's racist and genocidal views are not disproved. They're simply rendered unfavourable to the king, but they remain ever-present within the empire. Although Mordechai is promoted to a high political position, there's no change to the Persian infrastructure. The system that appointed one Haman could well appoint another in the future.

We read the Purim story after having created a context of happiness

In other words, the dilemmas of the Persian Empire remain unchanged for the Jews of exile. They avoid a crisis but cannot solve the underlying cause.

So where's the joy?

Perhaps the sages are aware how easily we would fixate on all the things that go wrong and forget that the orientation of Judaism is to find the joy in our actions. We are told to worship God with joy, yet the worship alone is not enough. It's crucial to begin our joy at the beginning of Adar so that we can read the Purim story after having created a context of happiness. We place the crisis of Purim within our joy and solve it from that vantage point. If we contextualize our world based only on our challenges, we may, in fact, create the very environment that would challenge us the most.

Set the moment to begin changing perspective. Don't wait for happiness to find you. Rather, find those moments that form the basis of a new approach. Begin finding joy as the month of Adar begins. Increase the joy as the month progresses, and then read of a planned genocide against the Jews from within a firm foundation of Jewish joy – that's the strategy Purim gives us to face any enemy.

Thousands of years ago, the sages asked: "Who is the wealthy one?" Most often, the answer is translated as "The one who is happy with what he has." A careful translation, however, shows the answer to be "the one who finds happiness from within what he has."

Archeology in Israel, Part 1

By ALEX GROPPER

In no other country is archeology as much of a national pastime as it is in Israel.

Archeology has been part of the collective psyche since before the creation of the State of Israel in 1948. In fact, the first excavations in what is now Israel began in the latter part of the 19th century. Needless to say, Jerusalem was among the first places to be excavated.

Past Forward

By the beginning of the 20th century, a number of prominent sites, including Jericho and Megiddo, had already succumbed to the spade of the archeologist. Along with many other intellectual pursuits, World War I put a temporary halt to archeological work in what was then part of the Ottoman Empire, especially when it allied itself with Germany during that bloody conflict.

But the period after World War I saw a flurry of archeological activity in the region. It has been called by many the golden age of archeology in the area of the so-called Fertile Crescent, which stretched in an arc from the Tigris and Euphrates basin in what is now Iraq, through Syria and down along the Mediterranean coast from Lebanon, into Palestine and down into Egypt. This was the era of the League of Nations mandates, during which parts of the now-dismembered Ottoman Empire had been given to the victorious Allied powers of Britain and France. This ushered in a brief time when scholars and others could travel freely from one area to another.

Since Palestine was now a British mandate, the newly formed Department of Antiquities was run from London, although American scholars also played an important role in a number of major excavations. Probably the most influential of these was William Foxwell Albright, who would leave his mark on what came to be called Biblical archeology. Albright was instrumental in developing a number of key techniques that would define the discipline. Chief among them was the use of pottery chronology in dating archeological remains.

Anyone who has visited an archeological site knows that the surface is full of pottery shards. What Albright did was to arrange a sequence, associating various styles of pottery with archeological periods in the history of Israel. One dates the pottery by its shape, size and composition in the same way that someone can tell a 1955 Thunderbird from a Model T. This technique of pottery chronology would revolutionize archeology in Israel and elsewhere.

It was also during the inter-war years that a number of crucial sites were re-excavated. Chief among these was Jericho and Megiddo. The American excavations at Megiddo, run by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, were undertaken on a massive scale thanks to the financial support of John D. Rockefeller whose philanthropic generosity helped to fund the Oriental Institute. For this excavation, even small-gauge rail tracks were built to haul away the enormous amount of dirt that was dug up. The aim of the dig was to uncover the entire mound layer by layer.

It would be the only time such an ambitious project was undertaken. By the middle of the 1930s, the Depression would force the project to scale back its aims. Even more unfortunate was the mess that such an undertaking had created on the mound of Megiddo. Even now, after a number of more recent excavations, Megiddo remains the centre of much controversy, since most scholars consider it the archeological key to unlocking the chronology of ancient Israel.

The era in between the two world wars would also see the start of what would become the foundations of Israeli archeology. Scholars such as Benjamin Mazar (formerly Maisler) of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which had been formed in 1925, would undertake the excavation of a number of crucial Jewish sites. Mazar himself would go on to become one of the founders of the renowned Institute of Archaeology at the Hebrew University and one of its presidents.

Purim shpiels: ancient and new

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

If you crave the smell of greasepaint and the roar of the crowd but don't expect to be appearing on Broadway or the West End anytime soon, boy do I have a Jewish custom for you: the Purim shpiel. This annual event is a chance for budding Jewish thespians of all ages to don costumes, act out an ancient story with modern twists and turns – and thoroughly enjoy themselves.

Shpiel is a Yiddish word meaning "play" or "skit." As Rabbi Daniel Kohn explains, "a Purim shpiel is actually a dramatic presentation of the events outlined in the book of Esther… providing an opportunity for crowds to cheer the heroes (Mordecai and Esther) and boo the villain (Haman)." Over time, shpiels have evolved into the presentation of humorous skits not just about the story of Purim, but also about leaders and well-known people in the community. [tinyurl.com/shpiel04]

Rabbi Kohn quotes Jeffrey Rubenstein, a professor of religion at New York University, who writes that Purim is a holiday characterized by "liminality," a day "in which traditional social boundaries and rules of etiquette are deliberately blurred. Purim is a day to 'blow off steam' for a community by celebrating this ancient escape from destruction." [tinyurl.com/shpiel06] Some of that steam blowing is apparent in the early 17th-century Achashverosh Shpiel. You can read some vivid quotes at the Hebrew-language Wikipedia entry on Purim shpiels. [tinyurl.com/shpiel07]

Virtual Jerusalem traces the tradition to Talmudic times. It quotes this description: "The boys make a figure of Haman and hang it from the roof four or five days before Purim. On Purim itself, they make a bonfire and throw the figure into the fire. They throw a lot of salt on it [obviously saltpeter-something explosive] so that it will make noise and the boys stand around and sing joyous songs." [tinyurl.com/shpiel09]

By the 1500s, "it became customary for Purim shpiels to take place during the festive Purim meal in private homes. Yeshiva students were often recruited as actors, and they would wear masks and costumes." Later on, amateur and professional entertainers were recruited, including groups of touring players known as "shpielers." Nowadays, these plays are performed in countless synagogues and schools. [tinyurl.com/shpiel03]

The best Purim shpiel is, of course, the one you write yourself. But if you do need some assistance, there are numerous budding playwrights who have shared their oeuvres online. There's a "participatory, inter-generational" version [tinyurl.com/shpiel11], a Doctor Seuss Purim Shpiel [tinyurl.com/ shpiel12], a rhyming edition from Torah Tots, [tinyurl.com/shpiel13] a Rocky Horror Purim Shpiel, [tinyurl.com/shpiel14] and some others at MyJewishLearning.com, including "West Side Tsorys." [tinyurl.com/shpiel15] Please note that you may not share the same sense of humour as the people who penned these plays.

I did stumble across one other fascinating Purim shpiel, titled "Esther, Queen of Persia: a scriptural play in five acts by Janie Jacobson." Published in 1921, it has been professionally scanned and can be downloaded in its entirety. [tinyurl.com/shpiel15]

And if you'd like to take in a performance or 300, it seems there is no shortage of people who have taped their shpiels and uploaded them to YouTube so that the whole world can benefit from their work. [tinyurl.com/shpiel05]

The words "poignant" and "Purim shpiel" don't usually appear in the same sentence, but that is the only way to describe one special play that took place more than six decades ago. In March 1945, Solly Ganor was a prisoner in Dachau when an inmate known as Chaim the Rabbi stood in the snow, donned a paper crown made out of a cement sack and shouted, "Haman, to the gallows! Haman, to the gallows! And when I say 'Haman, to the gallows,' we all know which Haman we are talking about!" [tinyurl.com/shpiel05]

Ganor continues his story, "We were sure that he has lost his wits, as so many did in these impossible times. By now, there was about 50 of us standing gaping at the 'rabbi,' when he said: 'Yidden wos iz mit ajch! Fellow Jews, what is the matter with you! Today is Purim! Let us make a Purim shpiel!'"

Yaldeinu raises funds to send Bolivians to Canadian camps

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Yaldeinu is planning to raise funds to bring Bolivian children to Canada for three weeks at a Jewish summer camp.

An organization that raises funds to preserve Judaic values through formal and informal education for Diaspora communities, Yaldeinu is teaming up with Jewish students and educators to try to stimulate a dwindling Jewish community in the poorest country in Latin America, Bolivia.

Michael Ettedgui, the founder of the non-profit charitable organization, said his recent trip to Latin America opened his eyes to the need of the Bolivian Jewish community.

"I was there [in Bolivia] in October when I went on a tour of various cities in Latin America to find communities that aren't being helped by Diaspora organizations. The country that hit me the most, that affected me the most, is Bolivia," Ettedgui said, adding that the once vibrant Jewish community of 10,000 has been reduced to about 200.

He said that the recent economic and political turmoil in the country has led to a mass exodus of the Jewish community who live in Bolivia's capital, La Paz.

"My contacts there tell me that because there are so [few] people and because there is basically no funding available to them for formal or even informal Jewish education... young people are assimilating and not showing up to the Jewish community centre for programming."

Ettedgui said that when he met with the board members of the Circulo Israelita, the Bolivian Jewish organization, they were initially seeking funding for Jewish education.

Yaldeinu founder Michael Ettedgui, second from the left, met with board members of the Jewish community organization in La Paz, Bolivia in October.

"They had an after-school program called Shorashim. It was a parochial school for the children of the community and... the program was taught by volunteer teachers. But because of a lack of interest, the kids aren't showing up to the program anymore and the parents aren't pushing them to go," Ettedgui said.

"We shifted course and I told them about the camping initiative and that was something they were really excited about, because it is fun and the kids will get much more out of it in terms of the experiential learning."

The camping initiative is a program that raises funds to bring a group of youths from a Diaspora Jewish community – in this case, Bolivia – to spend three weeks at a Canadian Jewish summer camp.

"To bring these children to summer camp here in Canada, I believe, will lead to a Jewish revival within that community. Rather than have them show up to the community centre, and sit down for a lesson being led by volunteer parents in the community, if I can bring them here for three weeks and put them in a Zionist summer camp atmosphere, they'll go back revitalized and more excited about being Jewish," Ettedgui said.

He said he wants to bring six campers between the ages of 13 and 15 and one counsellor from the community to Camp Gesher, which is three hours from Toronto, near Cloyne, Ont.

He is also working on bringing two counsellors in their early 20s from the Jewish community in Cuba, as well as children from the Israeli city of Sderot.

To raise money for this initiative, Ettedgui called on Hillel of Greater Toronto and Birthright Israel alumni to put together a Purim party on March 9 at Tattoo Rock Parlor in Toronto, with the proceeds from the event going toward this campaign.

In addition to the party, Ettedgui is also working with Hillel to help launch Morrow's Voice, a student journal that will be distributed on university campuses across the country.

The journal, which will bring in funds by selling ad space, will consist of essays and poetry that tackle three issues: Holocaust education after survivors pass on, Israel advocacy on campus and the impact of social trends on Judaism.

Submissions, due by April 15, will be vetted by an advisory council that includes the University of Toronto's Jewish Studies director Hindy Najman, U of T Professor Andrea Most and York University Professor Martin Lockshin.

Students with the best submissions will be awarded prizes, including a full-year academic scholarship at the Rothberg International School of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and a trip to Israel donated by El Al Canada.

Ettedgui said he is also working with Hillel to organize a summer program that would bring a group of four students to La Paz to do volunteer work. Students would be housed in the homes of Jewish families in La Paz for three weeks in the summer, during which they would volunteer in orphanages, hospitals and schools.

For more information about the camping initiative, visit www.yaldeinu.org/bolivia.

Russian shopkeeper hit by vandalism

A swastika, the number 88 – a play on numbers in which 8 substitutes for its related letter in the alphabet, so "88" means "HH" or "Heil Hitler" – and the letters "WP," for "White Power," were spray-painted on Alexander Shapurko's store windows this month. [Alexander Shapurko photo]

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Police are investigating after Alexander Shapurko, a Russian immigrant and shopkeeper, had his store vandalized multiple times over the past month and targeted with anti-Semitic graffiti.

His shop, which specializes in selling Soviet-era collectibles and doubles as his home in back, is located on Oakwood Avenue at Vaughan Road.

In multiple incidents in February, vandals burned a Russian flag on the side of his store, broke his windows and spray-painted swastikas and other neo-Nazi insignias on his building.

Shapurko, who is not Jewish, told The CJN last week he was increasingly afraid for his safety, and that he took pains to scrub off the offending markings in order not to upset his Jewish customers.

After police were called in to investigate, they advised him to install a security system.

Shapurko said that he has since installed two video cameras and a sound recording device in his store, both for his own protection and to help police gather "proof" if there are more attacks.

He described the vandals as caucasian men in their late teens or early twenties, all of whom, when confronted by Shapurko during one attack, shouted, "Heil Hitler" and, "We hate Russians, we hate Jews."

Shapurko said the last act of vandalism, which occurred in the early morning of Feb. 16, involved one of the vandals urinating on his shop door. He said neighbours called police, who questioned the men and obtained their names, but did not arrest them on site.

As of last Friday, detectives from Toronto Police Services 13 Division were still investigating the matter, he said.

Calls by The CJN to 13 Division were not returned by deadline.

"I hope this story helps shed light on these people," he said. "Because this is not the way we should be in society."

'Objective' reporting and Al-Jazeera

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

During the violent years of what became known as the second intifadah, CBC coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, especially its television news, was mainly one-sided. The CBC often depicted Israel as a callous oppressor and the Palestinians as helpless victims. This coverage, which lasted from the fall of 2000 until the spring of 2004, was directed by Tony Burman, then head of CBC News.

To every complaint about anti-Israel bias, Burman's answer was always the same: "I can assure you that our reporters and editors make every effort to be objective and even-handed in their reporting, and I believe they are."

Listening to Burman's comments on CBC Radio's The Current (Feb. 17) about his new role as managing director of Al-Jazeera English, based in Qatar, one might think he was again describing the CBC's coverage.

Burman insisted that, during the recent war in Gaza, Al-Jazeera had shown both sides of the story. Reporters filed stories about Israelis facing rocket fire in Sderot, and they accurately and dispassionately depicted events in Gaza, thus achieving fair, balanced coverage – all in keeping with western journalistic standards, he said.

However, just as Burman's claims about CBC's treatment of Israel under his watch were disingenuous, so, too, are his claims about Al-Jazeera's coverage.

When Anna Maria Tremonti, host of The Current, raised concerns that Arabic Al-Jazeera has been a conduit for anti-Semitic views, Burman denied that anything similar would happen on the English service. He played down any concerns about the Arabic service by claiming that, after all, anti-Arab views are heard in the Israeli media.

Tremonti played a clip of Bernie Farber, chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, cautioning that the CRTC must insist, as it had with the 2004 Al-Jazeera Arabic application (which was accepted with stringent conditions that cable and satellite companies felt were too onerous), that the English service would not engage in "hateful, vile rhetoric."

Farber's concern is underscored by a Feb. 7 Times of London report that British MPs criticized Al-Jazeera for broadcasting the sermons of a Muslim cleric, Yusuf al-Qaradawi, in which he celebrated the Holocaust and prayed for the killing of all Jews. However, the Times noted, "the network, which is gaining popularity in Britain through its English channel, refused to apologize for Sheikh al-Qaradawi's statements, which were broadcast on Al-Jazeera's Arabic station, saying that it could not control the words and opinions expressed during 'live' broadcasts."

On the issue of censorship, Burman conceded that, while this is a problem in the Arab world – although not with "fearless" Al-Jazeera – it's also a problem in Israel, where the government "restricts movement to keep journalists from covering all the story."

On the issue of Al-Jazeera's independence, Burman was categorical: There is a "rock-solid firewall" between the government of Qatar and Al-Jazeera English.

This came as news to Ofir Gendelman, acting director of Arab press and public affairs for Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Gendelman, who is fluent in Arabic, has been interviewed several times by both Al-Jazeera outlets.

In conversation, Gendelman pointed out: "Al-Jazeera International [the English service], like its Arabic language twin channel, is owned by the Qatari foreign minister, who also acts as prime minister, Sheikh Hamad Ben Jassem. Al-Jazeera International has the same top management as Al-Jazeera, which consists of two radical Palestinians, who are close to the Muslim Brotherhood movement and influence Al-Jazeera's coverage. Although Al-Jazeera usually says that it is independent, it is not the case, as there is no single free news organization in the Arab world, Qatar included."

Gendelman continued: "Mr. Burman's claim that there's a firewall between the channel and the Qatari government is at best misleading. Everything in Al-Jazeera's broadcasting, in English and in Arabic alike, aims to serve the Qatari foreign policy and the tiny emirate's quest to play a pivotal regional and international role.

"It's true that rarely, during the Gaza operation, the channel would air a balanced report about the Israeli side, but compared to the anti-Israel slurs and pro-Palestinian propaganda it aired on a 24-7 basis, this 'balance' was pathetic and meant to serve as a fig leaf.

"While Al-Jazeera International is a mild version of the Islamic and radical Arabic Al-Jazeera, it is still the most anti-Israel, pro-Arab/Palestinian 'resistance' channel that airs in English."

Teacher uses theatre to give kids life skills

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Gary Jury was a natural choice when Toronto's Secular Jewish Community School (formerly the Morris Winchevsky School) was modifying its curriculum and looking for someone to introduce drama into the classroom four years ago.

The 48-year-old father of four children, ranging in age from five to 19, has a background in theatre and is an experienced drama and improv teacher. A marketing consultant and writer, Jury was born and raised in Winnipeg, where he attended Jewish day school until Grade 6.

His wife, who is not Jewish, found the Winchevsky Centre – the secular Jewish community with which the school is affiliated – when they were "looking for a place for our children."

Jury was struck by the inclusivity of the community, which welcomes same-sex, interracial, interfaith and cross-cultural families,and by the spirituality he found there.

"I was looking for that spiritual sense I grew up with," he said, recalling the Orthodox synagogue built by his grandfather, which he attended as a child.

The school – affectionately referred to in Yiddish as the Shule, pronounced shuh-leh – offers a secular humanist outlook and teaches Jewish history, traditions and culture while integrating "a flavour of Yiddish, Hebrew and Jewishness," according to its website. The Sunday curriculum is divided into five-week modules on various subjects, and students can choose ones that interest them.

Most recently, Jury led a module on shtetl life. The theme provided his students, who ranged in age from five to 10, with the opportunity to ask their parents and grandparents about their own family backgrounds, he said. As well, it lent itself to a drama component, and students were assigned roles from Fiddler on the Roof to play during class.

By using theatre in the classroom, Jury also teaches life skills, he said. "It's important on stage and in life that you're listening and reacting. It's team building."

As well, he said – referring to teaching at the school in general – it's important to give students the context of Judaism and lessons about Jewish values such as tzedakah and social justice.

He encourages kids to ask questions, and he believes in imparting life skills as well as letting the students have fun.

"And if they learn something," he added, "it's not so bad."

Next year, Jury will teach another drama module and one about Jews and comic books.

Students and parents who saw his bio in the school's promotional material had a hint of what they might expect if they chose his module. Along with more conventional information – Jury studied theatre at York University and has performed professionally as an actor, singer and dancer since he was 17 – the last line of the bio notes that his favourite colour is plaid.

"When people read it, I want them to see the course is going to be fun... It lets them know there's going to be a quirky component."

A lesson from the teacher: "If you can't be seen, you can't be heard. That's a big life lesson. In the most literal sense, we learn different ways to communicate more effectively [but] it has to do with everything... Have your voice heard."

Gary Jury teaches his students to "extend their energy beyond their bodies" as part of an exercise at Toronto's Secular Jewish Community School.

Community channels support to students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As confrontations between anti-Israel and pro-Israel students at York University continue and with Israeli Apartheid Week set to take place next month, the Canadian Jewish community is uniting to deal with the intimidation and hostility that pro-Israel students feel on campuses across the country.

Howard English, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's spokesperson, said federation and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) along with their partner organizations – including Hillel, Canadian Jewish Congress, Hasbara Fellowships, Canadian Centre for Israel Activism and Canada Israel Committee – are supporting Jewish students in every conceivable way.

"We're supporting them financially… we're supporting them when it comes to advice on student security, we're supporting them when it comes to strategy and communications, on community mobilization, on government relations and through ongoing contact with York University administration," English said regarding a number of anti-Israel incidents at York this month.

"This year, there is an unprecedented sense of unity among student groups and Jewish organizations."

But English said that the onus is on York's administration to enforce its student code of conduct and "to rid itself of damaging destructive elements in its midst."

He said community members can e-mail York's administration to pressure it to enforce the code.

English said a donor boycott is also being considered, but "there is no point recommending a donor boycott unless you are assured of its success, because to recommend something like that and for it to fail would really harm the cause."

Meanwhile, Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel at York, said that in recent meetings with York's senior administration and security, Hillel and the school have been working on ways to make all students feel safer and comfortable on campus.

In a statement last week, York President Mamdouh Shoukri called on student leaders to act in the best interest of the school's 50,000 students. "Every student at York has the right to go about their activities free from intimidation or disruption to their academic lives. It is impossible to claim to both lead and impede students at the same time," he said.

Vice-president of students Rob Tiffin added that York will consider "the actions of individuals and clubs in the recent days and will be following the processes laid out in the Student Code of Conduct."

In reference to noisy anti-Israel demonstrations that have been held in the school's central Vari Hall rotunda – most recently on Feb. 12 – Tiffin added that last year, York "relaxed regulations on the usage of Vari Hall by student groups on an experimental basis. However, the university is once again reviewing all of its options with regard to the use of Vari Hall."

Jewish student groups are also working on advocacy initiatives for the period before, during and after Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), when IAW organizers are slated to hold events on more than 25 campuses worldwide.

"Students are working on Israel advocacy on campus – they're bringing speakers, they're working on a strong ad campaign and they're working on developing an online strategy to target students on campus," Ferman said.

English said students will be communicating positive messages about Israel's contributions to the world, and they'll have information that deals with the messages being disseminated by IAW supporters.

For example, Hillel Ottawa is currently holding its first annual Israel: A Partner Week, which began Feb. 23 and runs until Feb. 27, at Algonquin College, Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

Les Viner, chair of CIJA's university outreach committee (UOC), said he's pleased with the collaboration of Jewish groups. "The community should know that their dollars… [are] being passed through. The students are amazing and the community is in fact coming together and getting stronger."

He said the UOC has assembled a task force, chaired by York history professor Irving Abella, to make recommendations on the best ways to counter IAW.

"Part of the plan is to empower students, to make sure that students on campus are there when things happen. They are smart and motivated, and they need to have a voice," Viner said.

He added that students will get more money and staff to help them effectively work with each other and university administrations.

"The goal is to make sure students are safe and not bullied and have an ability and opportunity to speak for Israel and allow pro-Israel speakers to speak on campus without disruption and to engage in intellectual debate, not politicized drama."

Meanwhile, more reports of incidents at York are surfacing. In one, a business student was told Feb.11 by a teaching assistant never to wear an Israel Defence Forces T-shirt to class again. Hillel has forwarded the case to York's dispute resolution centre.

In another incident last week, Jewish students reported that Jewish student groups were not invited to a rally against a petition to oust York's student council for inactivity during the recent CUPE strike at York, because the rally's organizers blamed pro-Zionist campus groups and leaders for the campaign against the student union.

Maksim Chmerkovskiy or How I left the Soviet Union and learned to love dance

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It's a typical immigration story really.

A young boy grows up in oppressive Soviet-era Ukraine, unaware that he's Jewish but encouraged by his family to nurture a burgeoning ability to dance.

Eventually, the boy's family manages to take him and his brother to America to start a new, freer life, allowing them all to discover and express their Judaism without the threat of governmental reprisal.

Oh yes; and in the process the family unleashes upon North America one of the finest ballroom dancers the world has seen.

OK, maybe not that typical a story.

The dancer's name: Maksim (Maks) Chmerkovskiy.

Fans of the hit ABC TV show Dancing with the Stars know him by his work on the show – he first appeared in season two – as much as for his dashing looks and fancy footwork.

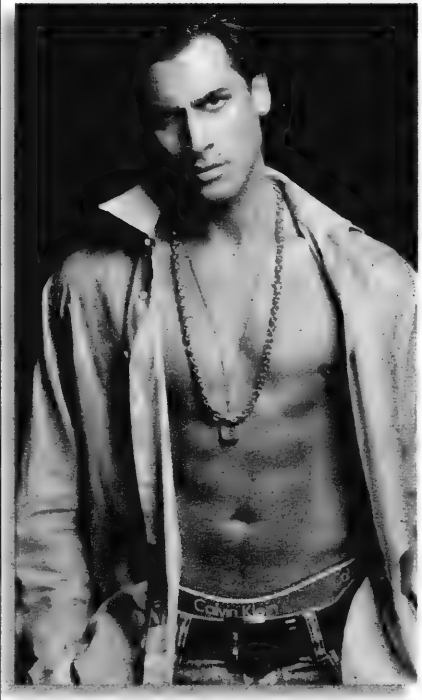
Heebonics caught up with Maks in North Carolina last month in the middle of his North American tour with the Stars, shortly after the troupe hit Toronto for their show at the Air Canada Centre.

"Toronto was fun and I used to coach up there," he said.

Maksim Chmerkovskiy

Now on his fourth tour choreographing and dancing with the company, Chmerkovskiy, 29, jokingly lamented his hectic daily schedule. "We work from 8:30 p.m. to 10:30 p.m., then it's straight to the bus for an average six-hour ride to the next city, then it's rehearsals all day before starting the show again in the next town," he said, adding that he loves his job.

Maksim Chmerkovskiy and Laila Ali



Chmerkovskiy began dance lessons at the age of four but admitted he didn't exactly like it for a long time.

"I despised dancing lessons until I was about 13," he said. "I played other amateur sports...but when we came to America I was shy and [dancing] allowed me to socialize and make friends in the studio."

The change of scenery didn't just help him acclimatize to a new North American lifestyle, it also helped him and his brother Valentin – himself a champion ballroom dancer – discover a love for dance and the vision about how it could lead to a lifetime of fulfilment.

Chmerkovskiy told Heebonics that he's been approached numerous times to try his hand at acting as well, but so far he's been loathe to jump into the thespian's role.

"I'm good at dancing and that's what I want to do," he said, but didn't totally rule out a jump to the big or small screen as an actor saying, "If the right script comes along," he might consider it.

For now, he doesn't want to spread himself thin and insists he's managing his career and time "carefully" in the hopes of one day owning and operating his personal tour and company.

That day may not be that far off, as Chmerkovskiy the entrepreneur already owns a family-run chain of dance studios across New York and New Jersey and is a co-founder of the non-profit Dance Team USA, a charity dedicated to recruiting, supporting and training future ballroom dancers.

In reflecting on his Jewish roots, Maks recalled growing up in Ukraine in the early 1980s as a time where his family had to hide its Judaism.

"Looking back at the way I was raised, we were not raised anti-Semitic like everybody else was at that time," he said. "Every now and again, we celebrated [a holiday] that I didn't know what it was. My family now celebrates our Jewishness openly."

Once in America – the Chmerkovskiys settled in Brooklyn, N.Y. – Maks attended Brooklyn's Sinai Academy Yeshiva for a time and was interested in learning Yiddish, but said he eventually left because he wasn't getting the education he wanted to fulfil his more secular goals and aspirations in dance and sport.

Now that he's tasted success on many levels – Maks has won numerous ballroom dancing titles worldwide, including the prestigious La Classique du Québec contest in 2003 – he said there are only a couple of things he really hasn't done yet that he feels he needs to; one of these is to dance for his fans in Israel.

"I've been asked to come visit Israel and I'd love to go," he said. "To be honest, my mom is afraid of the [security] situation there, so she worries. But definitely, one day it's one of the stops for sure."

In the meantime, Chmerkovskiy will be back for his sixth go-around on season eight of Dancing with the Stars, which premières on March 9.

This season he's partnered with Hollywood actress Denise Richards and will face off against his fiancée, Karina Smirnoff – the two got engaged on New Year's Eve – and her dancing partner, Silicon Valley computer guru and philanthropist Steve Wozniak.

Asked what advice he has for children considering entering the world of competitive dance, Chmerkovskiy answered, "It's a tough road and it requires a lot of mental strength. I tell kids... it's not about doing steps, you just have to have passion. And to remember this motto, which I remind myself every day, 'If you fail to prepare, you prepare to fail.'"

Budget cuts force aliyah centre to close

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The global economy, drastic cuts to the Jewish Agency for Israel's (JAFI) budget and the online age converged last month to force the closure of the Montreal Aliyah Centre, one of several in North America slated to shut down by the summer as part of a "major restructuring" within JAFI.

But although the move – effective at the end of January – was to some extent anticipated, it came as a sad blow to those associated with the centre, which was almost as old as the State of Israel itself. They now fear that the absence of people "on the ground" could hurt the level of aliyah from Montreal.

"For 60 years, there was an aliyah presence here," said Arlazar Eliashiv, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation's eastern region. "The decision was based on the size of the community. I'm very disappointed."

Even Israel's consul general in Montreal, Yoram Elron, called the closure "unfortunate," necessitated as it was by cost-cutting demands within JAFI.

In contrast, while in general regretting the closure of the Montreal centre, JAFI people outside Montreal, as well as officials from Nefesh B'Nefesh, the seven-year-old U.S.-based organization that provides aliyah services and financial support for virtually all North American olim, saw the move as a positive development overall.

The Jewish Agency will, both online and through its emissaries, continue to accept applications, maintain the sole right to determine eligibility for aliyah under Israel's Law of Return and work with Nefesh B'Nefesh on immigrant processing. The idea, both JAFI and Nefesh B'Nefesh officials said, is to eliminate overlapping functions while consolidating existing ones and bringing the aliyah process more into the modern age, in which initial applications are only computer keystrokes away.

Jewish groups condemn CUPE motion

In response to CUPE's distinction between boycotting Israeli universities but not the academics who work at those universities, Goldberg asked, "How do you boycott institutions without boycotting individuals in the process?"

Len Rudner, CJC Ontario regional director, said he doesn't believe the vote represents the will of the majority of university workers in Ontario any more than Resolution 50 – which pushes for a boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign "to end Israel's apartheid practices" – represented the will of CUPE Ontario workers generally when it was passed about two years ago.

B'nai Brith Canada also released a statement that labelled the union's latest resolution as "discriminatory and racist."

B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president Frank Dimant said the motion "marginalizes its supporters here at home and disenfranchises CUPE members who are supportive of democratic Israel and its right to defend its citizens against terrorist groups like Hamas and Hezbollah."

Dimant added that those who voted in favour of the motion "are promoting hatred and advancing a discriminatory agenda that is at odds with Canadian values of tolerance, respect and human rights for all.

"We urge the wider CUPE membership to come forward to denounce this resolution and call on the Canadian public to do the same."

Tyler Shipley, spokesperson for CUPE local 3903 at York University, which represents contract faculty and teaching assistants, told the Toronto Star that his local will be pushing York to sever its financial ties to Israel.

His local will also back Israeli Apartheid Week, which is scheduled to begin next week.

Bialik founder also recalled for love of art

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Victor Topper was a renaissance man who combined his expertise in business and art when he and his wife, Renee, opened Topper Gallery, specializing in Asian and ethnic art, some 15 years ago after he closed the fur business his father had established a generation earlier.

Obituary

An amateur photographer, family man, Yiddishist, nature and music lover – with eclectic taste ranging from classical to liturgical, jazz, folk and pop – Topper was a founder of Bialik Hebrew Day School and served as chair of United Jewish Appeal's fur trade division. A former president of the Fur Council of Canada, he was a State of Israel Bonds honoree in 1983, and served on the boards of the Jewish Public Library and Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Topper died Jan. 21 at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, following a year-long illness. He was 77.

Earlier this month, Beth Tzedec dedicated its Shabbat Shirah weekend in his memory.

Topper's interest in art was sparked on his honeymoon in 1954, when an older couple – an Asian art expert and his wife – befriended Topper and his bride, and bought them an ivory carving as a gift.

A native of Toronto who attended Forest Hill Collegiate, Topper received his BA from Carleton College (now Carleton University) in Ottawa, where he also played pro football for the Ottawa Rough Riders.

He spent much of his childhood first in a Catholic children's centre, then in a series of Jewish foster homes and living with relatives – sometimes sleeping three-in-a-bed, head-to-foot, with his cousins – because his mother had contracted tuberculosis when he was about four years old, and was unable to care for him for a period of time that lasted more than six years, Renee told The CJN.

Topper, whose first language was Yiddish – his parents having immigrated from Russia – "felt there was a need for a school in Toronto that would teach Yiddish," Renee said. Their oldest daughter, Lori Chadwick, was in Bialik's first kindergarten class.

During his years at Reliable Fur Dressers and Dyers, Topper travelled extensively for business, seeking out galleries wherever he went.

The couple ran two art shows at Beth Tzedec, and Victor often lectured about art at museums, galleries and service groups while he was still working in the fur business.

In a eulogy at Topper's funeral, Beth Tzedec's Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl referred to him as "a kind and generous man, a man of integrity, a mensch."

He and Renee brought diverse interests to the synagogue and sponsored many programs there, the rabbi told The CJN. He will be "deeply missed" by the congregational community, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl added.

Topper leaves Renee, his wife of 54 years; children Lori Chadwick, David, Randi Saks of St. Catharines and Sari Romberg of Phoenix; and 12 grandchildren.

Guelph shul warms to new spiritual leader

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The 100-year-old Guelph Jewish community has welcomed Cantor Avraham Fisher as its new spiritual leader of the Beth Isaiah Synagogue.

Barbara Brown, a member of the synagogue's board of directors, said that she is very excited to have Fisher and his wife, Techiya, become a part of the shul, which has been at the centre of a vibrant Jewish community in Guelph, Ont., for 60 years.

She said that while the Guelph Hebrew Congregation came into being around 1907, the first building for the congregation was erected in 1925 at the corner of Dublin and Surrey streets. The current synagogue, named Beth Isaiah, was built in 1949 at the same location.

"The synagogue was named after the son of one of the founding families, Sydney Isaiah Acker, who died while serving in the [Royal Canadian Air Force] during World War II," Brown said.

Cantor Avraham Fisher

Currently, Beth Isaiah, which has a membership of nearly 50 families, is home for Fisher, who has ambitions to have the synagogue live up to the three Hebrew descriptions attributed to it.

"One is of course, beit tfillah, a house of prayer. It's important to pray together so we feel that we are a community and not just an individual," Fisher said.

"The second one is a beit midrash, a place of study. It is a place where we read the Torah and we discuss things, a place where we can study together.

"And the third is beit knesset, where we gather for social activities and sometimes where we give support to people who are dealing with loss, a funeral, a memorial, and so forth."

Born in Hungary and educated in Israeli yeshivas, Fisher also obtained degrees in psychology from Bar Ilan University and in Tanach and Jewish history from Hebrew University.

He used his degrees to teach at various schools in Israel. In 1974, he was sent to Montreal as a shaliach and taught at Herzliah High School.

While in Montreal, Fisher obtained a master's degree in Jewish studies from Concordia University.

In 1982, Fisher moved to Toronto, where he taught at what is now called the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Fisher said that during his second and third year teaching at Tanenbaum CHAT, he worked on fulfilling his dream of become a cantor and began studying with cantors and rabbis to hone his skills.

During that time, he also became spiritual leader of Beth Israel Synagogue in Peterborough, Ont. – commuting back and forth from the shul to Toronto – and by 1985, he landed a job as cantor and principal of the religious school at Beth Jacob Synagogue in Kitchener, Ont.

He stayed there until 1994, when he moved back to Israel, but he continued to serve Beth Jacob as cantor during the High Holidays and Sukkot.

He said that he and his wife decided to move back to Toronto after his wife was offered a job here. Soon after, Fisher learned of an opening for a spiritual leader at Beth Isaiah, and he has been working with the Jewish community in Guelph since last September.

He said that although his wife is in Toronto, he chose to live in Guelph to be near the shul, because he doesn't believe in serving a community by commuting back and forth.

"It can be done, but not properly," he said, adding that he makes frequent trips to Toronto, and his wife travels to Guelph.

Fisher said he always keeps his home open to the general community, as well as to university students and visitors seeking a family Shabbat experience. He also offers regular kiddush services, organizes social events and reaches out to youths in the community through Torah education.

He said he also plans to start an adult education program, and he currently offers a class on the role of women in prayer.

"Women can be more involved in prayer... I want to empower people who want to know if halachically it can be done, and they will be surprised that there is a lot that can be," Fisher said.

Brown said she's excited to have the Fishers join the Guelph Jewish community.

"They're enthusiastic and have plans for interesting education and social programs, and plan to make some changes to our services to make them more participatory," Brown said.

Fisher said the diversity of the Guelph Jewish community is what makes him excited to work at the synagogue.

"I have people that call themselves cultural Jews, and on the other end, you have people who are very committed in terms of observance, keeping kashrut and Shabbat. That's the exciting thing about it, that we try to cater to everyone so they feel like they're being enriched by the community and that their needs are being met," Fisher said.

"אני לא הייתי שואל." טוען מאיר. "אבל למה? היא מנויה, הוא פנוי, מה רע בקצת שידך?" מאיר מושך בכתפיו. "לא כולם משוגעים על בליינד-דייטס כמוך..." אני מתבוננת בו בריכוז. "להזכירך, גם אתה השתתפת בבליינד- דייט פעם אחת, ואפילו התחתנת איתה." (בעתיד אני גם אספר לכם על הפגישה הכאילו עיוורת שלנו). בנגד הטיעון הזה אין לו תגובה, וכך יצא שאני מתקשרת לגלית, ידידתי הנרושה ומציעה לה לבוא לדיבר. אגב כך, אני מוסיפה בהיסוס שגם ידיד של מאיר, צחי שמו, מגיע לאדווחה. גלית שותקת לרגע, ואז: "תגידי, את מארגנת לי איזה בליינד-דייט, או משהו?" היא שואלת. "לא!" אני קוראת בתמימות.

"כי אני אוהבת בליינד-דייטס!" מוסיפה גלית, ואנחנו סוגרות על שעה של חקירות בחיק.

"הייתי חייב להגיד לצחי שאנחנו מסדרים לו מישהי." מתלונן מאיר. "מה הוא שאל עליה?" אני מסתקרנת. "את יודעת, אם היא חתיכה, אם יש לה חזה גדול, אם היא בלונדינית." לפני שאני מקיאה מהקלישאות, אני מסיימת את השיחה בטון צדקני: "חס וחלילה שישאל אם היא אינטליגנטית, או במה היא עוסקת." (אני כמובן לא מגלה לו שגלית שאלה אם צחי גבוה, עשיר, או שלא נדע, קירח).

"לא מצאתי חן בעיניו." קובעת גלית בטלפון למחרת, ולי קשה להכחיש. "גם הוא סתם נפוח, מלא בעצמו ולא שווה הרבה." היא ממשיכה.

אנו נפרדים לאחר הקפה השלישי, בעוד מספרה של גלית טמון לבטח בסלולארי של סטיבן.

"ניראה לי שמאוד מצאתי חן בעיניו." קובעת גלית בטלפון למחרת, ולי קל מאוד שלא להכחיש. "כזה ג'נטלמן, וחמוד נורא. אבירי ועדין. מן הסתם, הוא יתקשר אלי היום-מחר."

אגב, לא כל כך מדויק. אחרי כשבועיים, צחי פתאום התקשר אליה. הם נפגשו מאז כבר פעמיים...

Quebec carnival says no offence intended by stereotype

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The manager of the Quebec City winter carnival has told Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) that no offence was intended by the inclusion of a snow sculpture depicting a stereotypical Jew, and the organization has accepted the explanation.

In a Feb. 16 letter to CJC, Quebec region president Victor Goldbloom, Jean Pelletier said that carnival organizers had no intention of causing offence and they will be more vigilant in the future.

The sculpture was created by Ukrainian Pitro Romaniuk as part of a series of works said to represent different figures in his country's traditional celebration of Christmas.

Visitor Jake Burack, a McGill University professor, had complained on Feb. 11 that the figure of a hook-nosed, bearded man in a kippah clutching a bag of money was reminiscent of the negative depictions of Jews in Europe before World War II.

The sculpture was on view for a week until the end of the carnival on Feb. 15. Organizers said the carnival drew about 400,000 visitors.

The text beside the sculpture explained that it represented "a theatrical piece that takes place in our country on Christmas night. The story's characters – the astrologer, the czar, the warrior, the Jew, Death and the goat – are divided into positive and negative heroes. They represent, in an ironic and satirical form, people's lives."

All the characters were aboard a boat "symbolizing the birth of Goodness."

Pelletier wrote to Goldbloom that the description that was received with Romaniuk's application to create the sculpture "did not permit the selection committee to conclude this was an anti-Semitic representation. If that had been the case, the committee would never have accepted such a work."

Pelletier said organizers will try to ensure that something like this does not happen again at the carnival, which is in its 55th year.

"We are satisfied with the response," said CJC, Quebec region executive director Daniel Amar.

He spoke to Pelletier by phone for about half an hour and said that he found him to be "very open to the Jewish community," having hosted members of the Toronto Jewish community at his home while they were in Quebec learning French.

"The sculpture was a mistake. He recognizes that," Amar said. "But [the carnival organizers] were acting in good faith."

Pelletier said Burack's was the only complaint the carnival received about the sculpture. Amar said CJC received two e-mails from members of the Montreal Jewish community who were concerned about the sculpture.

However, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, a CJC national officer whose family roots are in Ukraine, takes a less benign view of this "bizarre" incident.

He found the sculpture "flagrantly offensive" and feels the carnival organizers should have removed it as soon as it was brought to their attention.

He thinks that the appearance of the word "Jew" in the sculptor's application should have raised a red flag in the first place, and if it did not, the completed sculpture should have been plainly unacceptable in 2009.

"Also, I find it incredible that 400,000 people visited the carnival and no one said anything [besides Burack]."

CIC's help sought to get info on Israel

Jacob Peretz, the man who first brought the lecture series idea to the committee, said he felt it was vital to start with a speaking program that addressed Israeli facts and arguments so that "we could do better [and] represent Israel [in a] more balanced" way in the local media.

Drawing on support from friends in the Christian and Muslim communities, the advocacy committee has made a point of writing letters to the editor, calling radio talk shows and speaking with newsroom staff of local TV stations to help ensure a more fair approach to coverage of Israel and the conflict in Gaza.

"During the recent Gaza conflict, there was a feeling in the community that we weren't doing enough," Esther Marcus said. "So we called a meeting to tell people what could be done."

Allan Perlmutter, another committee member, said the general London community was ill-informed about Israel.

"Slowly, over the years, we've been able to support Israel by writing articles and bringing the correct image of the country" to the public, he said.

He added that most of the committee was surprised by how fast the pro-Palestinian reaction to the latest Gaza conflict manifested itself and how it succeeded by "demanding" coverage in the media.

Gissin advised the group that the best way to level the playing field in the media is for any and all community members to "make themselves available" to newscasters so that they can report both sides of the story.

Amir Gissin

Committee members also spoke candidly about a lack of resources and knowledgeable spokespeople during the recent war in Gaza.

To help with this, the Londoners have sought the help of the Canada-Israel Committee on occasion to help craft letters to the editor or get information about Israel that could be shared with the community and to help the committee "work more independently," Terry Marcus said.

"Other [small Jewish] communities should not be shy and ask for help" as the London community has, Perlmutter said, adding that his advice to other communities is not to wait for a new crisis before forming similar advocacy initiatives.

"Do it now," he said. "There will be another war, another conflict… so there's no time to wait."

At the local level, "it's up to each community to get advocacy done," Peretz said, to nods from the rest of the committee.

The London Jewish community is also an aging one, which has had some ramifications for committee members, many of whom have adult children.

"We're experiencing… that our kids are becoming less active. So we must set an example, because if we don't speak out, they certainly won't," Terry Marcus said.

The committee also recently decided to come up with a list of media-ready "simple sound bites" so that their messages wouldn't be lost or get taken out of context in future interviews.

What will a Netanyahu government look like?

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

When Israeli President Shimon Peres named Benjamin Netanyahu to form Israel's next government last week, one key question about the government was answered. Many others, however, were left unresolved.

Analysis

Unlike Kadima party leader Tzipi Livni, who had the opportunity to become prime minister last fall but could not form a coalition, the Likud's Netanyahu undoubtedly will succeed in assembling a coalition government and assuming the post of prime minister.

What will governing partners look like?

Netanyahu has said he wants the broadest possible coalition, and has publicly called on Labor (13 seats) and Kadima (28 seats) to join him in a national unity government. But Livni appears to be leaning against joining a Netanyahu-led government, and Labor's Ehud Barak has indicated that the party wants to rebuild itself in the opposition.

If all else fails, Netanyahu can bank on having right-wing partners to form the necessary 61-seat majority for his coalition in the 120-seat Knesset: Yisrael Beiteinu (15 seats), Shas (11), and smaller parties including National Union (4), the Jewish Home (3) and United Torah Judaism (5), which would would line up behind Likud (27 seats) – as long as Netanyahu promises the religious parties goodies like welfare and education funding.

But such a government (65 seats) would hamstring Netanyahu in peacemaking efforts. Yisrael Beiteinu's leader, Avigdor Lieberman, said a year ago when he pulled out of the coalition with Kadima that his goal was to stop the Annapolis peace process with the Palestinians. His stance has not changed, leaving Netanyahu with little wiggle room to advance that process. Shas would bolt the coalition if Netanyahu discussed Jerusalem with the Palestinians. And any number of those parties might block Israel-Syria peacemaking, which Netanyahu pursued clandestinely during his tenure as prime minister from 1996 to 1999.

While Netanyahu is no dove, he's not as hawkish as these potential coalition partners, a fact that partly explains why he would prefer to have a broader coalition, one that includes his major rival, Livni, and Kadima's 28 seats.For Livni, now that Netanyahu has bested her in the contest to form the next government, the question is whether she should join them or fight them.

The argument can go both ways.

On the one hand, Livni wants no part of a government that is not committed to peacemaking with the Palestinians, which has been her primary focus for the past year and a half. She fears that any coalition with the likes of Shas and Yisrael Beiteinu would make the pursuit of peace impossible, and Kadima's presence in the government would serve as little more than a fig leaf for hawkish policy.

Moreover, staying in the opposition would give Livni a chance to build Kadima from the outside as a party devoted to peace and an alternative to a government that could be on a collision course with Washington, not to mention the Arab world. Such a government, she must figure, would be unlikely to last a full term.

However, if Livni refuses to partner with Netanyahu in a coalition government, she pretty much guarantees Israel's next government will be unabashedly right wing. Instead, she could join Likud and possibly mitigate the government's hawkishness and give Netanyahu more room to manoeuvre when it comes to Arab-Israel peacemaking. That would be the case especially if Labor joined the government, too.

Furthermore, given the unique threats facing Israel, especially from Iran, the country could use a national unity government.

So for Livni, the choice may be between party and country.

Coalition aside, the other major unanswered question now is where does Netanyahu intend to lead Israel? With the old distinctions between right and left no longer in force, the question on the Palestinian front is how fast Israel will push for a two-state solution. Livni believes the window of opportunity is closing, whereas Netanyahu believes the Palestinians are not yet ready for their own state. During the campaign, Netanyahu was purposely vague about his vision for a two-state solution – if, indeed, he has one.

Israeli President Shimon Peres officially asked Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu last week to try to form a coalition government. [Israel Sun]

With Israel facing the prospect of a nuclear Iran, serious threats on its southern border (Hamas in Gaza) and northern border (Hezbollah in Lebanon), and the prospect of a crippling economic crisis, this is no doubt a pivotal moment in Israeli history.

The question is where Israel goes from here.

In related developments, Netanyahu met with Barak Monday morning in Jerusalem in an effort to recruit the dovish Labor party for his future coalition, but to no avail.

Barak rejected the invitation, saying: "The voters' verdict has sent the Labor party into the opposition, and I told Netanyahu that we will serve as a responsible, serious and constructive opposition."

Livni said she and Netanyahu made no progress in their late-night meeting Sunday.

She said Kadima is still headed for opposition. On Sunday, Netanyahu and Livni agreed to meet again for talks in the next few days, but stressed that no coalition negotiations are underway.

"I will be taking Kadima into the opposition," Livni told reporters Sunday night after their first meeting since the Feb. 10 election. "Netanyahu has asked for another meeting, and I agreed. As far as I am concerned, this meeting has changed nothing."

She said there are still "profound differences" between the two parties' positions on the peace process and talks with the Palestinians.

Netanyahu said he will press on with his efforts to establish a broad coalition, and that he will meet with Livni and Barak again later this week.

Briefing reporters, Netanyahu said he told Livni, "I will continue to try to form a national unity government to counter the threats facing Israel. This is the will of the people."

Netanyahu listed the threats facing the country, adding that "it is incumbent upon us that we unite all of our forces for this common goal."

He also hinted at the gaps between Kadima and Likud, but added, "I believe we can overcome these differences with a little goodwill. However, if Kadima tries to scupper a unity government, it will find a way to do so. We can and must find a common path... In the end, unity will prevail and we will find a common path."

Earlier Sunday, Livni declared that she intended to remain in opposition, and her parliamentary faction voted to back her in "upholding the principles with which Kadima went to the voters and ensuring their realization as a condition for any entry into the government."

Before the meeting, Netanyahu's associates said he planned to make Kadima a generous offer, including two of the top three cabinet portfolios – defence, finance and foreign affairs – and full partnership in drafting the government guidelines.

They also said he would promise to continue final-status negotiations with the Palestinians. That is a key issue for Livni, who was in charge of these talks as foreign minister in the outgoing government.

Israel Briefs

Syrian site likely nuclear

Traces of uranium and graphite were found in samples taken from the site of a suspected nuclear reactor in Syria, the United Nations nuclear watchdog said. The International Atomic Energy Agency made the disclosure Feb. 19. The discovery of additional uranium as well as graphite, which is used to build a nuclear reactor core, is a "significant" find, Reuters quoted a senior UN official as saying. The samples were taken last June from the site, which Israel bombed in 2007. Israel and the United States have claimed the site was a nascent nuclear reactor; Syria says it was a conventional military facility.

Peres questions pullout

Israel "should have done things differently" in its 2005 pullout from Gaza, Israel's president told U.S. Jewish leaders. "Whatever will happen in the future, we shall not repeat the mistakes we made in leaving Gaza," Shimon Peres told members of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations during a question-and-answer session. Peres, a supporter of territorial withdrawal, clarified after the talk that he objected to the way the Gaza withdrawal was handled. He also told Presidents Conference members that the direction of Israel's future policies, not who heads the next government, is the critical issue.

UN: Hamas stole arms

The United Nations confirmed that Hamas stole seven tons of unexploded Israeli weapons stored in UN warehouses in Gaza. The explosives, fired by Israel during its military operation in Gaza, were set to be destroyed by controlled detonation. The mostly unexploded tank shells were under Hamas guard when they were stolen, Ha'aretz reported. The theft was discovered earlier last week, but confirmed Feb. 17 by the United Nations and the Israel Defence Forces. A UN Mines Action Team has worked to collect and dispose of the unexploded weapons since the operation ended in mid-January, the BBC reported. The team has been waiting for Israeli approval to bring equipment into Gaza to neutralize the weapons. The arms, which could easily be set off accidentally, are being stored near major population areas, Ha'aretz reported.

Pope's Israel visit dates set

Pope Benedict XVI's trip to Israel will take place the second week in May. Rev. Rifat Bader, a spokesperson for the Church in Jordan, announced last week that Benedict will visit Israel May 8-11, the Catholic news agency Zenit reported. Before going to Israel, the Pope will visit Jordan, where he will make a stop at Mount Nebo, from where tradition says Moses saw the Promised Land, and at a site on the Jordan River believed to be the place where Jesus was baptized. Zenit said the Pope also is expected to meet in Jordan with Islamic leaders in the mosque of Prince Hussein. The pope is scheduled to visit Jerusalem, Nazareth and Bethlehem.

Critics aside, Israeli officials see successes in Gaza operation

By LESLIE SUSSER

Analysis

A month after the Gaza war, with Qassam rockets continuing to fall in southern Israel, many skeptical Israelis are questioning whether the war achieved anything.

Since the ceasefire on Jan. 18, militia have fired nearly 50 rockets and mortars at civilian targets in the Gaza periphery. Israel has retaliated with targeted assassinations and air strikes against smuggling tunnels along the Gaza-Egyptian border.

The skeptics say the current state of affairs is identical to the situation that existed before the war: Hamas firing rockets and Israel reacting with extreme restraint. So, they say, everything is back to square one.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak says nothing could be further from the truth.

Barak argues that Hamas took a heavy beating in the war and that the Gaza-Israel border is on the verge of a long period of quiet. He sees the daily dribble of rocket fire as nothing more than a pathetic attempt by Hamas to show it's still around. And, he says, the fact that Hamas keeps saying how close the sides are to a new 18-month lull, or tahadiya, shows just how much they need it.

Indeed, it is Israel that is holding out and insisting that there will be no deal on a new lull until the captured Israel soldier Gilad Schalit is freed.

The view in the cabinet and among the top brass of the Israel Defence Forces is that the war achieved a number of highly significant goals. It transformed Israeli deterrence vis-a-vis Hamas and in the region as a whole, and it is only a matter of time before this becomes apparent on the Gaza front; it created conditions for the release of Schalit; and it paved the way for an inter-Palestinian Hamas-Fatah accommodation that could revive prospects for a two-state solution.

Indeed, Barak speaks of a watershed event in Israeli-Palestinian relations, the full consequences of which have yet to be fully understood.

Right-wing politicians such as Likud's leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who is likely to form the next government, argue that Barak and company did not finish the job, since they left Hamas in power, and that sooner or later Israel will have to go into Gaza again to topple the radical Islamists.

Even Kadima leader Tzipi Livni says the IDF may have to strike again if Hamas renews weapons smuggling on a grand scale.

Nevertheless, all the signs on the ground suggest a relatively long period of quiet in the offing. This is partly because of Hamas' inability to find any effective counters to Israel's military moves. In the war, Hamas' elaborate defence strategy against an Israeli incursion collapsed. The web of tunnels and booby-trapped buildings proved ineffectual, and in the fighting many Hamas fighters and field commanders were killed with minimal Israeli losses.

The IDF estimate is that the Islamist organization does not have the stomach to go through all that again – at least not soon. In other words, the main strategic goal of Operation Cast Lead, the establishment of a deterrent balance, was achieved. Hamas needs a long period of quiet to rebuild devastated military and civilian infrastructures.

The war also transformed the relationship between Egypt and Hamas. Now in its mediation between Israel and Hamas, it is Egypt calling the shots with Hamas, not vice versa. And although Hamas has been conducting a terror spree in Gaza against Fatah loyalists, killing several and kneecapping others, there is renewed talk of a possible reconciliation between Hamas and Fatah that might allow Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas to negotiate for all Palestinians, making a two-state solution more realistic than it was before the war.

Indeed, Fatah will likely get a toehold in Gaza for the first time since the Hamas seizure of power there in June 2007. When Israel as part of the lull opens border crossing points, they will be partly supervised by Palestinian Authority, mainly Fatah, personnel.

The new lull could take a few more days to go into effect because Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has made it dependent on Schalit's release, and he is using the opening of the border crossings as a lever to pressure Hamas to free Schalit. Olmert refuses to open the crossings until a deal on Schalit's release is struck.

In return for Schalit, Hamas is demanding the release of 1,400 Palestinian terrorists in Israeli jails, including 450 of its choosing. Israel names 550 others, with the rest mainly women and minors. Among the 450 are the planners of many of the worst terrorist outrages of the second intifadah, including the rash of lethal suicide bombings in buses, restaurants, discos and other public places.

Until now, the Israeli government had been against releasing most of the 450, now the differences are only over a few dozen names. One of those slated to be freed is Fatah's Marwan Barghouti, who is seen as a future Palestinian leader and as one who might have the moral authority to make peace with Israel.

Although the Gaza war inflamed popular opinion against Israel throughout the region, and harmed Israel's close ties with Muslim Turkey, it helped restore Israel's deterrent capacity by restoring perceptions of Israel as a regional superpower that was dented by the IDF's relatively poor performance in the 2006 Lebanon war. It also showed that the 2006 war may have been more successful than first thought: bottom line, the Iranian-backed Hezbollah stayed out of the fighting in Gaza despite the fact that a fellow Iranian proxy was taking a beating there. This suggests that the same kind of deterrent model could hold for Hamas, too.

Soldiers of the IDF celebrate as they leave Gaza.

The war in Gaza had other regional ramifications. It was a first major setback for Iran after a string of perceived regional successes, especially the American war in Iraq that enabled the Iranian regime to create an arc of influence from Tehran through southern Iraq and Damascus to Lebanon and Gaza. Thus the war in Gaza not only was a victory for Israel, but also for regional anti-Iranian moderates such as Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Jordan.

The Achilles' heel in the post-Gaza war situation is the continued smuggling from Egypt into Gaza. Internal Security Minister Avi Dichters has warned that despite its goodwill, Egypt is not moving quickly enough to block the arms smuggling routes, which could undermine hopes for quiet. Indeed, a new Hamas arms buildup and a new right-wing government in Israel could mean that the lull might not last as long as Barak and the other military planners of Operation Cast Lead had hoped.

Canada assumes leadership role at summit on anti-Semitism

"Anti-Zionism is the new anti-Semitism," said Michael Gove, a British Conservative MP.

Gove said Islamist groups are uniting with the far left to try to delegitimize Israel and question its right to exist.

"The extreme left is dressing it as anti-colonialism," he said.

Recalling trips he took to the Babi Yar Holocaust memorial site in Ukraine and to Mumbai, India, last year, Kenney said that although "68 years and thousands of miles separate the ravine of Babi Yar from the debris of Chabad's Nariman House [site of the murders of Rabbi Gavriel Holzberg and his wife Rivkah last year by Pakistani Islamist terrorists in Mumbai], these places are connected by the same uniquely durable and pernicious evil of anti-Semitism. Even peaceful and pluralistic Canada sees signs that this evil is newly resurgent."

Kenney highlighted some Canadian initiatives intended to combat anti-Semitism at home, including Ottawa's application to become a full member of the international task force on commemoration, education and research of the Holocaust, withdrawing from the upcoming "Durban II" UN anti-racism conference and apologizing to the Jewish community for Canada's "own history of officially sanctioned anti-Semitism, the most notorious manifestation of which was Canada's refusal to accept the hundreds of Jewish European refugees aboard the St. Louis as it arrived in Halifax harbour in 1938."

Kenney said he received "commendations" from many foreign parliamentarians and Jewish lay leaders at the conference about the work Canada has done on anti-Semitism, some of whom were "keen" to have him speak directly to their own governments about it in the future.

Cotler, one of the driving forces behind the summit, said the new anti-Semitism attacks the "Jewish collective" by attacking Israel's right to exist.

Whereas old anti-Semitism "wished to eliminate individual Jewish people," Cotler said, "the new anti-Semitism aims at getting rid of the Jewish state."

British Labour MP Denis MacShane said that "many of those responsible for this new anti-Semitism are Islamist groups."

Like MacShane, the vast majority of legislators who attended the conference were not Jewish.

U.S. Congressman Chris Smith, a Republican, said that the way to fight anti-Semitism is by imposing serious penalties for its perpetrators.

Smith said U.S. President Barack Obama should not take part in the so-called Durban II conference, a follow-up to the notorious 2001 United Nations anti-racism conference that turned into an Israel-baiting forum. Smith also slammed the United Nations.

"They pay lip service to the issue of anti-Semitism, but don't really act," he said.

But Ottawa has pledged to act and Kenney invited members of the London conference to Canada next year in the expectation that the country would play host to the summit's followup next year. He told The CJN that he would be working on this with his colleagues across party lines to sort out the "modalities" over the coming months for this "tremendous and hugely valuable" event.

There are, Kenney told the attendees, "a good number of Canadians here who would be delighted to see this important work cross the Atlantic."

Cotler echoed Kenney's sentiment, telling The CJN that this event was not merely a "founding conference," it was the founding of an organization.

"It's not a one-off. It's now been institutionalized… with a declaration which we will seek to implement," Cotler said, adding that the conference exceeded all his expectations and that he was gratified at the attendance by Muslim parliamentarians from Tunisia, Morocco and Azerbaijan.

(The full text of the London Declaration on Combating anti-Semitism can be found on The CJN's website, www.cjnews.com.)

Despite the bleak picture presented at the conference, experts said they were encouraged by the positive response of legislators who signed the declaration committing themselves to continue to work together, along with their respective governments, to halt the rise in anti-Semitism.

Cotler praised the conference and its issuance of the London Declaration on Combating anti-Semitism as a major breakthrough.

"Here you had 125 parliamentarians from over 40 countries adopt a very significant declaration, which is not only a landmark in the struggle against anti-Semitism, but a landmark in the use of effective 'soft powers' as it's called, in international law," he said. "This is a declaration which will have impact."

He added: "It's a recognition of the responsibility of the international community to prevent incitement to genocide. Now we have a parliamentary declaration that affirms that and on which we can rely for purposes of our work. Here you have… an acknowledgment of the delegitimization of Israel in the international arena, and a clarion call saying, 'This shall not take place.'"

Arab group calls Kenney 'professional whore'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney was recently given an additional title, albeit a crude and uncomplimentary one.

Last week, Kenney was termed a "professional whore" by Khaled Mouammar, president of the Toronto-based, non-profit Canadian Arab Federation (CAF), both for Kenney's personal support of Israel and his denunciations of radical pro-Palestinian supporters carrying signs supporting Hamas and Hezbollah – considered terrorist groups by Canada – at rallies across the country last month against Israel's recent military operation in Gaza.

The CAF received nearly $450,000 from Kenney's ministry to operate a two-year settlement program in Toronto to help provide new immigrants with language and job search skills. The CAF program is scheduled for renewal in 2010.

Kenney said his department is now evaluating whether certain groups – including the CAF – should continue to receive public funding, because of their alleged promotion of terror groups and anti-Semitism.

Mouammar has said that Kenney's threat to cut funding to his organization will have a negative impact on immigrants.

In an interview last week, Kenney told The CJN he "couldn't care less" about the disparaging comments made by Mouammar.

"They can say whatever they like about the government and ministers. It's a free country. I've had much worse things said about me by much better people," he said. "But my point [in weighing whether to continue funding the CAF], is whether an organization … that distributes videos produced by Hamas and Islamic Jihad that glorifies terrorism [and] indoctrinates children into the cult of anti-Semitic hatred… is not an organization, in my opinion, that should be receiving taxpayer subsidies."

Pointing to his speech at the Inter-parliamentary Coalition on Anti-Semitism last week in London, Kenney said he raised the CAF issue, among others, by telling the world that Canada "takes a zero-tolerance approach to expressions of anti-Semitism in the public square."

He said that certain organizations, such as the CAF and the Canadian Islamic Congress, "receive their share of media attention and public notoriety" and express "extreme and hateful propaganda [and] expect to be treated as respectable interlocutors in the public discourse."

Kenney said he is unapologetic about his decision to review the CAF's funding.

"The more Mr. Mouammar… speaks, the more clear it is that he doesn't speak for the vast majority of Canadians of Arab origin, who are honest, decent, thoughtful, democratic, moderate people; most of whom came to this country seeking life in a stable, liberal democracy, not this kind of shrill, cartoonish voice of extremism that he too often represents," Kenney said.

Asked whether he thinks removing funding from the CAF will disadvantage new immigrants, Kenney responded that those assertions are "complete baloney."

"Our government has actually increased settlement funding five-fold over what it was under the previous government," he said, adding that he's not considering "for one minute" reducing language-training programs or settlement programs.

"I'm simply saying, when we make funding decisions we should take into account the character of the organization and its leadership. And if they're promoting extremism, or [in the case of the CAF], implicitly promoting anti-Semitism, I think that should be a consideration. There are no shortage of worthy organizations out there that can help us deliver solid settlement [programming] without us having to help finance the distribution of Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad videos."

Music and the world it makes

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Biographies present readers and their writers with peculiar challenges. The expectation that a subject's life should be covered from start to finish often leads the historical record to be treated like a wallpapering project – cover every nook and cranny, and the subject may come fully to life.

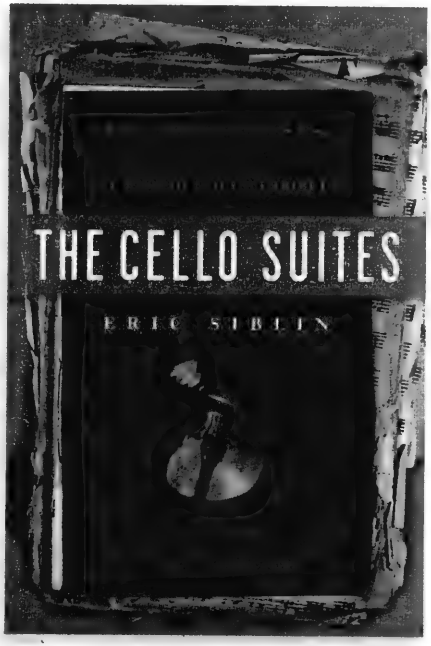
Norman Ravvin

In The Cello Suites: J.S. Bach, Pablo Casals, and the Search for a Baroque Masterpiece (House of Anansi Press), Eric Siblin avoids this outcome by giving his pursuit of a pair of musical lives a thoroughly personal spin, and by making the music that links Bach and Casals as important a character as its composer and its most famous interpreter.

The many lives of the six Cello Suites propel Siblin's book. Composed by Bach in the early 1720s, the Suites receded into relative obscurity after Bach's death. Their reappearance on the contemporary musical scene was almost entirely influenced by Pablo Casals, the Catalan-born cellist who became one of the most celebrated musicians of the postwar era. Siblin approaches the story of Casals' adolescent discovery of the Suites with great sympathy. One senses, not only in Casals' outing with his father that led to the discovery, but also in his mother's devotion to his career, a great family romance supporting the development of musical genius.

Casals' championing of the Suites challenged musical assumptions: the Suites were dismissed as études, appropriate as technical exercises; the instrument they were played on was not thought to be an "important solo instrument"; and as some 19th-century experts would have it, Bach was a "mere old-fashioned wig stuffed with learning."

Siblin reveals how changing attitudes toward the Suites and their composer reflect broad cultural shifts in the18th, 19th and 20th centuries. Bach's musical career was a success, but he was by no means a leading musical figure in his lifetime. His music, Siblin tells us, "continued to have no popular resonance well into the 19th century." For a composer who was a part of the Nazi pantheon, it is ironic that his revival was largely motivated by a converted Jew, Felix Mendelssohn, the grandson of Enlightenment philosopher Moses Mendelssohn.



Siblin does not duck the subject of how Bach's work traffics in what might be characterized as everyday 18th-century German prejudice toward Jews. In this, it is the author's willingness to insert himself into his narrative that enlivens the material and removes it from a more conventional biographical approach.

He describes a 2006 performance of Bach's St. John Passion by the Montreal Symphony Orchestra as "reaching sublime heights," but then confronts the uncomfortable facts: "Seated in the acoustically ideal second-tier balcony, I was well placed to enjoy the music… I can't say the words killed the experience for me, but they did add a measure of discomfort.

"From the first reference to Jesus being taken away by 'Jewish police,' the drama bluntly hits the listener over the head with the fact that [Pontius] Pilate resists crucifying him. It is the Jewish crowd that clamours for crucifixion… Perhaps the anti-Semitic component of the story was a commonplace touchstone of faith."

In impressive detail, Siblin evokes the Suites' creation, their staying power and their contemporary relevance. When set alongside the passages he quotes from authoritative Bach biographies, his approach seems remarkably fresh, direct and unencumbered by the tone of reverence and scholarly distance that renders many biographical portraits inert.

> 'Reaching sublime heights'

An element of the story to which Siblin is particularly attracted is the loss, at some point over the course of centuries, of Bach's original manuscript for the Cello Suites. Its absence lends a degree of mystery to the music. We cannot be sure how Bach intended the Suites to sound. There is even some question concerning the instrument he intended them for. And most strangely, not too long ago, an Australian academic argued that their composer was in fact Bach's wife, herself a trained musician.

This mysterious chapter in the life of the Cello Suites is reminiscent of other great cultural losses that personalize our relationship to the art under discussion, since we can all see ourselves as part of the dreamed-of recovery. Siblin expertly includes in his narrative "the thrill of the chase, the detective story behind it, the possibility that a manuscript with secrets to tell has been lodged in a salt mine or is biding its time in a dilapidated German castle."

Eric Siblin's The Cello Suites will be in bookstores on March 21.

The Dybbuk stays as true to the original as possible

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The classic mystical and poetic Jewish love story, The Dybbuk, is coming to the stage in Toronto.

Presented by Teatron Theatre, the popular play runs from Feb. 25 to March 8 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

"The way this story plays out is so charming," says director Ari Weisberg, who is also the founder of Teatron, now in its sixth season.

"It's colourful and interesting, sometimes happy while sometimes gripping, and always exciting."

Set in the chassidic society of 18th-century eastern Europe, The Dybbuk tells the story of a young lady, Leye, who falls in love with a poor man, Chonnon, whom her father disapproves of.

The poor fellow eventually passes on, but his spirit enters his maiden's body and, in essence, takes over her.

The challenges this exorcism engenders, along with issues of faith, tradition and material status, are all themes explored in this classic, originally penned by the revered playwright S. Anski.

The village's rebbe also plays a central role in the play, as he grapples with questions about his own belief system.

Weisberg notes that although the main story line is rather simple, the subplots and issues the play delves into are all quite complex and have resonated with audiences for decades.

"It's a straightforward story, but when you get to the underlying meaning behind the people, it's far more complex," he offers.

"It is probably one of the most challenging plays I have ever directed and produced."

Notable actors in the superb cast of 21 include seasoned thespian Howard Jerome playing the part of Reb Azrielke, the young and talented Sarah Illiatovitch-Goldman as Leye, with Mark Albert as Sender, Ron Boyd as The Messenger and Jonah Hundert taking on the role of Chonnon.

Although minor adaptations were made to the script, Weisberg made it a point to stay as true to the original as possible, including the incorporation of beautiful poems by the late Israeli poet laureate Chaim Nachman Bialik.

"I really like the original and I would say we kept 99 per cent of it intact," says Weisberg.

Teatron Theatre focuses exclusively on Jewish-themed plays and is self-described as "unveiling the treasures of Jewish tradition, enriching and inspiring the Jewish experience of all theatregoers, leading to better understanding and harmony, while maintaining Jewish values."

Following The Dybbuk, the company will be moving from Leah Posluns to a smaller venue at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, providing a forum for more intimate productions.

An upcoming performance in the works will be the Neil Simon classic Brighton Beach Memoirs.

For tickets, phone 417-781-5527 or visit www.teatrontheatre.com.

Howard Jerome as Reb Azrielke confronts the dybbuk-possessed Leye (Sarah Illiatovitch-Goldman) in Teatron Theatre's latest production, The Dybbuk, at the Leah Posluns Theatre until March 8.

DANS LA VIE

An elderly Jewish woman needs assistance in her daily routine when her son's work requires him to leave town for a while. The son arranges for an Arab woman to be caregiver to his cantankerous mother. At first glance it appears to be a collision of cultures, and a recipe for disaster! However, as the two women exchange stories, it becomes evident that they have more in common than they thought. This lovely French comedy is a sensitive and hopeful portrayal of cross-cultural camaraderie.

Indie artist's 100th gig, a hard-earned milestone

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Last January at the legendary Hugh's Room in Toronto, Dave Borins played his 100th gig, a milestone that means a lot to the young musician.

"That gig marked a year's worth of me doing it all on my own, from the grassroots level up," Borins, 26, said.

"It was a year of me putting the pedal to the metal, keeping it honest."

Borins spent 2008 working hard, recording, performing and promoting himself, after the release of his debut CD Songs of Sense and Colour, a collection of 11, mostly original acoustic-flavoured rock songs.

"It's an indie record from start to finish," Borins said. "I found my own producer and paid for it all."

These days, it's important for an indie artist to put out their own CDs in order to get noticed. "It was important for me to throw my hat into the ring. Today, you need a CD to get into festivals. Having this CD got me more gigs and more credibility."

Dave Borins does it all on his own...

Recording your own music, gigging frequently and marketing yourself are all part of the trade for the indie artist.

"Record companies won't even look at you anymore unless you have a CD," the self-taught guitarist says. It also helps to have press and a management team behind you.

"The ironic thing is that when you reach the part when you are attractive to a record company, you don't need them anymore."

Although doing it alone is part in parcel of being an indie artist, Borins is well aware of the need for a community of like-minded people.

"There is strength in numbers. I am doing this alone, with a little help from my friends."

His friends are part of a "revolving door" of a song-writing collective of various local musicians called Four Corners that he's a part of.

"It's a group of us doing it all ourselves together," he says. They offer one another support and call upon one another to play with them on stage when necessary. "We love to see gigs, help each other out and give advice to each other."

Someone else he occasionally gets good advice from is his old Forest Hill high school choirmate Sophie Milman, the Juno Award-winning jazz singer.

"Even then we could tell she was great," he says about her. "She had this unbelievable vibrato. She sang in a very old-fashioned way, it was very beautiful."

Borins says that maintaining contacts in the industry is key to survival in the cutthroat music industry.

"You need people in this business – you need to be part of a community, you can't be alone on top of a mountain singing to birds."

Borins would know all about that. His father, Mel, a holistic healer and travel writer, would take him on his off-the-beaten-path world trips when he was young.

"By the time I was 13, I had seen five continents," he said. "This helped me get exposed to different music and cultures."

Borins spent several years at Camp Walden (where he is known as BoBo Borins) leading canoe trips for summer campers, as well as playing there.

"I've spent much time in the wilderness. I went alone on 20-day trips through the Himalayas and doing the Inca Trail. It's very inspiring."

When describing himself musically, Borins purposely avoids the overused term "singer-songwriter."

"I play acoustic rock 'n' roll. When you say singer-songwriter, I get an image of a guy quietly weeping on stage, pouring out his heart. I sort of do that, but with a lot of energy.

"I sweat on stage," he says. "I'm like Bruce Springsteen in a way. It's not quite folk or country, but has elements of both."

Borins says his influences are very eclectic, ranging from Bob Dylan, Neil Young and Joni Mitchell to newer artists like Jeff Tweedy and Townes Van Zandt. "I consume music like crazy," he says.

Borins plays frequently, mostly in the Greater Toronto Area, but he's also played in Montreal and New York. He would like to tour more, but "it's very expensive and I can't afford to take it on the road in a meaningful way yet."

Borins had some interest from a management/ production company after the release of his CD, but the deal went sour. "They didn't quite understand who I was," he said. After they set up interviews for him with small-town U.S. newspapers he would never ever visit, he decided to part ways. "It was an inefficient way to spend time and money."

Borins says he learned a lot from that experience and came out of it more mature. He went to workshops, returned to Camp Walden and started to write and record more songs, the result of which can be heard on his next project, a new CD he is currently putting the finishing touches on. "I'm looking forward to seeing the fruits of my labour," he says.

Meanwhile you can hear some of his songs on www.myspace.com/daveborins. His first CD is also available on iTunes.

He's playing at Cadillac Lounge on Feb. 26 and on March 14 he plays with an orchestra at the Hart House Chamber Strings Pop Concert.

...but celebrated his 100th gig with a little help from his friends.

Essays focus on Jewish Canadian women authors

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

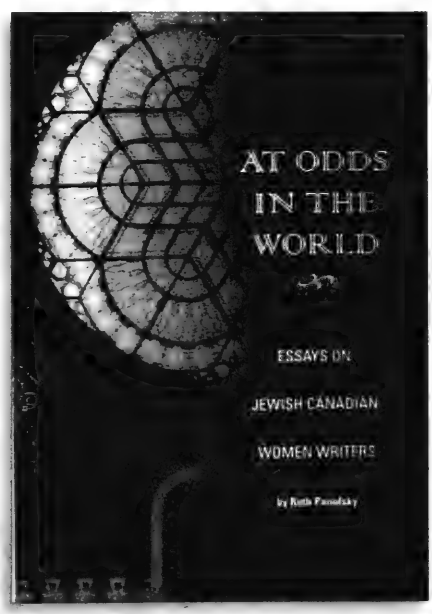
English professor Ruth Panofsky hopes that her new book will make readers aware that the experience of Jewish Canadian women is unique, varied, rich and important.

For her book At Odds in the World: Essays on Jewish Canadian Women Writers, Panofsky wrote a series of critical essays on the works of seven authors – Miriam Waddington, Adele Wiseman, Lilian Nattel, Helen Weinzweig, Fredelle Bruser Maynard, Joyce Maynard and Nora Gold – that tackle the themes of sexuality, patriarchy, marriage and motherhood.

"Throughout my career I've always been interested in the experience of Jewish Canadian women and I've looked for that experience in literature... Those experiences in the early days were hard to find," said Panofsky, a Ryerson University professor.

"There was a progression of locating other work by Jewish female writers, particularly Canadian, because there were a fair number of American Jewish writers, but the Canadian story wasn't told very much."

Panofsky, who won the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Award for Poetry last year for Laike and Nahum: A Poem in Two Voices, said she acted on a "personal impulse" to "find the voices of those who have not really been represented and... I wanted my own world experience reflected in literature."



She said that American Jewish female writers tend to write about being outside the tradition and being denied access to certain religious practices.

"They do feel to be on the margins of their own society and at the margins of the larger society as well," Panofsky added.

"I want readers to be cognizant that the experience of being a Jewish female in Canada is something unique and rich and varied and important."

English professor and author Ruth Panofsky

She said that although many Canadian Jewish female writers describe being marginalized and undervalued, they also value their community and they don't want to separate from it.

> 'The experience of being a Jewish female is unique and varied'

"They seek desperately to find ways to include themselves in it, and it is that tension, that feeling that they are both in the world and out of it at the same time, that I wanted readers to see and to recognize."

She said the last essay in the collection, titled The Freedom to Write, which examines works by Fredelle Bruser Maynard and her daughter, Joyce Maynard, was important to her because it was about a relationship between a Jewish mother who mentored her daughter in the art of living and writing.

"That mother and daughter describe a troubled, often painful relationship is not surprising, given the gargantuan task Fredelle undertook in spite of patriarchal resistance to worldly education for girls and a religious tradition that prescribes restrictive roles for women," she wrote.

Panofsky referred to another essay in her book based on the fiction of Wiseman and Nattel about Jewish prostitutes and motherhood.

"The figure of the Jewish prostitute I always found very compelling because of her special vulnerability and also a remarkable strength," she said.

In her essay This Was Her Punishment, Panofsky wrote: "The prostitute may reclaim her Jewish identity through marriage, but the right to legitimate motherhood will elude the Jewish prostitute who remains thrice outcast, thrice isolate from the community of Jews, women and mothers that will neither forget nor forgive her improprieties."

Panofsky said that the issues examined in her book are important for the female Jewish community and hopes that writers will find it easier to explore what it means to be Jewish and female in today's society.

"There are many poets... and a growing number of contemporary writers who probe what it means to be Jewish from a very different perspective than earlier generations, so there is a real growing developing or growing interest in what it means to be Jewish and female," she said.

"Women, traditionally, have hesitated to be very open about their cultural identity and... despite the rise in anti-Semitism worldwide, in Canada there is a sense of openness and tolerance and interest in cultural diversity. I think that it is definitely encouraging our writers to explore their own identity through a range of perspectives."

Passages: Toronto artist Tutzi Seguin was a dynamic and highly admired multimedia artist, art teacher and writer who threw herself into making art after the oldest of her three children died of a congenital heart condition in 1955.

Born in Romania about 1911, she immigrated to Canada in 1938 with her husband, George, and their year-old son. She became an expert producer of prints, collages, watercolours, oil paintings, hand-painted silk scarves, stained-glass, jewelry, ceramics and objets d'art. A linguist who could speak six languages, she taught numerous art workshops, volunteered as a tour guide at the Art Gallery of Ontario and entertained audiences with travelogues of places she had visited. She died Feb. 6 and was predeceased by her husband and children.

Cantorial concert to aid children with medical problems

Compiled by CJN Staff

Some of the world's leading cantors will unite to benefit seriously ill children served by Chai Lifeline Canada, its director Rabbi Mordechai Rothman, announced recently.

Conducted by Mordechai Sobol, the concert will be held March 16 at Roy Thomson Hall at 7:30 p.m.

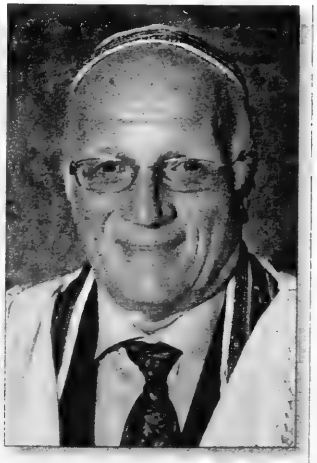
It features renowned Cantor Yizchak Meir Helfgot, who has performed in opera houses throughout the United States, Europe and Israel. He recently sold out a solo performance at the Metropolitan Opera House at the Lincoln Center. Helfgot was a close friend of the late legend, Luciano Pavarotti, and will be performing a special number in his memory.

Local cantors Ya'akov Motzen, Jodi Sufrin and Benjamin Maissner will be accompanied by Toronto's Jewish Choral Ensemble and a 65-piece symphony orchestra. The Philharmonic Experience, conducted by Yisroel Lamm, rounds out the evening's star-studded lineup.

Chai Lifeline provides a variety of programs and support services for children with serious illnesses and their families.

"Sing for the Children will bring together thousands of Chai Lifeline supporters for an evening of beautiful music combined with charity," Rabbi Rothman said. "The concert will bring vital support to Chai Lifeline Canada's families, thanks to the vision and dedication of Israel and Michelle Schachter, event chairs, who have worked tirelessly to co-ordinate an amazing array of musicians and singers."

Ya'akov Motzen



Benjamin Maissner

The concert has attracted fans and celebrities from New York, Los Angeles, Montreal and Mexico.

"Music has the unique ability to unite people from many different walks of life, which is exactly what Chai Lifeline does," Israel Schachter said. "During my time as a Chai Lifeline volunteer, I saw that people of all backgrounds and religious beliefs were helped by the organization and joined together for events and programs. Each child and their family deserves the same support, the very best."

International Chai Lifeline executive vice-president Stephen Scholar said the Canadian organization "has grown exponentially this year, expanding its client base from 20 families to over 100 Toronto families in a few short months. Proceeds from the concert will enable Chai Lifeline Canada to respond to increasing demands for assistance while maintaining its excellent quality of care."

Tickets for Sing for the Children can be purchased at www.chaiconcert.com or by calling 1-888-416-CHAI.

Jewish leaders urge tennis body to boycott Dubai event

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

U.S. Jewish leaders called last week for the Women's Tennis Association to boycott the Dubai Championships and to cancel the event in 2010 after Shahar Pe'er, Israel's top woman player, was barred from competing at this year's tournament in the United Arab Emirates.

"To discriminate as the UAE did against one player in this way smacks of bigotry and racism," the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations said in a statement.

Pe'er had to forfeit her place in last week's event after the UAE, which has no diplomatic ties with Israel, denied her an entry visa into the country. Israel's limited ties in the Arab world were severely strained by last month's three-week military offensive in Gaza.

The $2-million event features nine of the world's top 10 women tennis players. Dubai is hosting the men's tournament this week. The political row is expected to continue, because Israeli doubles specialist Andy Ram was slated to take part.

Last week, a U.S. congressman said he had received assurances Ram would be granted a visa, and as a result he would not ask the Association of Tennis Professionals (ATP) to cancel the event.

Shahar Pe'er

Representative Anthony Weiner of New York had scheduled a news conference yesterday to press the ATP to withdraw its backing for the tournament, a spokesperson for the Brooklyn congressman said.

Weiner said Yousef Al Otaiba, the United Arab Emirates ambassador to Washington, assured him Ram would be allowed to play in the event in this week's men's tournament.

"This must be declared unacceptable by the WTA and all international sporting associations. As we learned in the past, failure to condemn such actions and take corrective measures, proves destructive to international sporting competition," the conference presidents said.

"Jewish leaders call on [the] Women's Tennis Association to sanction Dubai and cancel [the] tournament in 2010."

Tournament officials defended their stance, saying local fans would have boycotted the event if an Israeli were allowed to compete, and that Pe'er's safety could have been compromised.

"The UAE's action is reminiscent of the Arab boycott, which we had all hoped was a thing of the past, especially in regard to sports events… The excuse that the UAE was concerned about Ms. Pe'er's security is spurious. Any country that cannot assure the security of all players should not be allowed to host it," they said.

"The Conference of Presidents also calls upon Sony Ericsson, sponsors of the tour, and Barclays, the sponsor of the Dubai championship tournament, to disassociate themselves from the UAE's actions and to drop their future sponsorship unless and until appropriate corrective measures are taken."

The Tennis Channel, which had rights to broadcast the Dubai WTA event in the United States, also boycotted the tournament, and last week the Wall Street Journal European edition also withdrew its sponsorship.

Meanwhile, the Swedish news agency TT reported last week that Sweden's first-round Davis Cup tie against Israel next month would be played in an empty arena.

The agency said the decision had been made by vote by a Malmo city committee. As of last week, authorities had offered no further explanation for the decision.

Junior rosters announced for Israeli hockey tourney

Young Jewish hockey players from Toronto, Winnipeg, Montreal, Ottawa, Victoria and Vancouver will represent Canada at the first Under-18 World Jewish Hockey Tournament in Metulla, Israel, this summer.

In all, four Canadian provinces are represented, as the rosters for two Canadian teams in the five-team tournament have been announced. Joining Canada in the junior tournament will be the United States, Israel and France. A senior tournament will take place as well, involving Canada, the United States, Israel, France and eastern Europe (Russia and other countries combined).

Former NHL star Steve Thomas will coach Canada White, while TSN hockey analyst Pierre McGuire will coach Canada Red in the junior event, which runs from July 5 to 15.

"We think we're sending two teams capable of winning the gold medal," said Sherry Bassin, general manager of Team Canada. "There is so much Jewish hockey talent in this country, we decided we needed to send two teams instead of one."

TEAM CANADA WHITE

Coach: Steve Thomas, Toronto

Goalies Max Dizgun and Jake Karls, Montreal; defencemen Ori Abramson, Joshua Herrington, Matt Solomon and Zack Rota, Toronto; Spencer Neudorf, Montreal; Michael Vered, Ottawa; forwards Judah Batist, Jack Benaim, Robbie Frank, Jake Koplowitz, Daniel Leavens, Jesse Schwartz, Noah Schwartz, Matt Silcoff and Dylan Smoskowitz, Toronto; Elie Vered, Ottawa.

TEAM CANADA RED

Coach: Pierre McGuire, Montreal

Goalies Max Benitah, Toronto, and Shea Garber, Winnipeg; defencemen Ian Kapron-King, Victoria, Ryan Kruss, Toronto, Ben Micflikier and Jesse Pollock, Winnipeg, and Jordan Prizant, Montreal; forwards Beau Blanaru, Vancouver, Rory Bokser, Montreal, Daniel Fainman, Winnipeg, David Friedmann, David Freiman, Corey Kalk, Adam Levine and Dana Tenenbaum, Toronto; Adam Hennick and Corey Markus, Montreal.

Golden ticket?

ALMOST FAMOUS

By Jacob Medjuck

I don't play the lottery. I believe that if you invest in yourself, you'll win every time. On the battlefield, however, I'll take any angle I can get.

Hollywood Boulevard is bedazzled with crazy people – mimes, musicians and mascots. The street people in Los Angeles strut about with the flair and confidence of seasoned stage stars. The whole town is a symbiotic organism that feeds low-carb locals into network television, box office blockbuster and YouTube-sensation factories that all but excrete American Idol biomass.

Aspiring filmmakers flock from afar to play the "right place at the right time" lottery. And the "right" place is simply Holy Hollywood. I add "holy" now because even the Subway sandwich shop on Pico Boulevard has a mezuzah. Remarkable.

I've made the mini-migration myself and am making rounds to production companies that just pre-screened my festival film, Summerhood.

I met the producers of the mega-hit franchise Transformers – ironically, two mid-west gentiles who've transformed themselves into kosher-style studio suits by peppering their speech with Yiddish slang.

I also met the producer of the upcoming He Man – a man so busy he had to outsource his bathroom breaks.

How can I win friends and influence these people, Mr. Dale Carnegie? How can I navigate an industry in which social techniques are as sharp and specialized as martial arts, and where politics and protocols are both as intricate and delicate as filo-dough pastry origami.

I've done the bar mitzvah circuit, shaken hands and toasted weddings. I've read dozens of industry books. I started at the bottom and finished at the bottom. Paid dues. Won festivals. Scrounged some credibility. And still it often feels like a lottery system. That's when the itch of hard work feels more like a rash.

"It's who you know," I hear. And it's true. But the part they leave out is that it's never who you think it's going to be. I've had tremendous support, but often from the most surprising places, never from the Hollywood hook-ups that I came here to chase.

One festival fan wrote a friend at Miramax, and they invited us in. Another public screening got us a meeting at Warner Brothers – something my own relentless e-mails and calls never yielded. Hmmm.

I work very hard, and all the time, but the breakthroughs always seem to come from areas of relaxed effort. I think for fitness' sake that I should continue to press on as usual. I feel hard work and luck will intersect very soon and preparation will only be an asset.

Until that time, I scratch and win. I bingo my brains out and rub antique lamps. And what's my reward? Parking tickets. I've got more L.A. parking tickets now than T-shirts.

So what part of the journey is this? Hopefully, the best part.

I'll explain. As I took my own turn walking down Hollywood Boulevard, ambitions broadly fashioned, I got into my car and noticed another parking ticket goading me from the windshield.

Great.

Getting out to grab it, I found a package just lying in the street – it was an envelope from a major talent agency that had been lost in transit, right there on on the pavement.

It was addressed to Gary Sanchez Productions.

This actually happened.

I knew this was Will Ferrell's company.

I went to the address, buzzed them and took it in.

The receptionist was peeved at the courier service, but thrilled that I'd found it. I mentioned that I'd just come from a meeting nearby and would love for someone in-house to see Summerhood. She was happy to take a screener. I wrote Will Ferrell on a Post-it note, and gave it to her.

Will anyone watch it? Can't say. It's rather unlikely.

It was, however, the best parking ticket I ever got.

I've now paid my dues to the film industry, and to the city.

Next stop: Golden Globes. Right?

CHOCOLATE RICE KRISPIES

5 tblsp unsalted butter
3 tblsp butter
1/3 c unsweetened cocoa powder
2 x 10 oz. bags mini marshmallows
10 c crisp rice cereal
1/2 c semisweet mini chocolate chips
Vegetable oil cooking spray

Combine butters and cocoa in large saucepan over medium-high heat. Melt butter, whisking until mixture is well combined. Stir in marshmallows, melting them completely. Remove pan from heat and stir in cereal, working quickly before marshmallow mixture sets. Stir in chocolate chips. Coat hands with cooking spray and shape mixture into walnut-sized balls. Place balls on a baking sheet and let harden for about 1 hour. Store in airtight container in a cool, dry place up to 3 days. Do not refrigerate.

Getting fit, cheaply and easily

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Spring is around the corner, and I know that 2009 has turned out to be a stressful year for many of us, but that doesn't mean you have to give up on fitness or on your weight-loss goals.

I've said this before, and I'll probably say it again: getting fit doesn't cost very much, except in time, and it gives you wonderful rewards.

There are many ways you can stay on track inexpensively throughout the year. Just getting up and walking 30 to 40 minutes a day is a great way to start on the road to fitness. It doesn't cost a dime, but man does it make you feel amazing, even in the winter.

If you need something more challenging, try going up and down a flight of stairs non-stop for 20 minutes every day and watch the pounds fly off.

Our community centres run a wide variety of exercise classes. They're another great way to socialize and get fit, and they cost only pennies a class. I have clients who have taken classes at community centres and love them. Hip hop, salsa dance, zumba and yoga classes are only some examples.

If that's not your thing, exercise DVDs are an easy way to get yourself moving for the right amount of time and usually with good intensity. Exercise DVDs are easy to get and range in price from as cheap as $10 to as expensive as $100 for a large box set. You can find just about any style of workout that you're looking for, and you can exercise in your living room or basement.

Some of my clients have turned their private sessions into group sessions of two or more people. It's a great way to get the instruction and attention of a personal trainer, but keep the cost down. It's not only affordable, but fun, too.

However you do it, make exercise and healthy eating a regular part of your life. It will help you lose weight, reduce stress and feel great.

Help out in hard times!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

These are tough economic times and we need to pull together as a community to lessen the suffering of so many. I know we will.

A short time ago, The CJN reported that more and more Jewish social service organizations are preparing themselves to help out more of our Jewish neighbours – and believe me, regardless of how big their house is, the people suffering might just be the family living next to you.

Recently a Jewish professional told me a heart-rending story of a person who awakens every morning, gets dressed and heads off to work. She said the truth is that this person is out of work, but the person walks the streets pretending to have gainful employment and that all is good.

How terribly sad. This happens more times than we know.

The question, then, is what can we do to help – those of us who are able – in order to alleviate some of the stress being felt by many of our fellow community members, be they retired, near retirement, young families or individuals on their own?

The affluent bear a heavy responsibility in an economy such as the one we're in now. The fact is that the wealthy need to share their personal resources even more now than they do during good times. They know this, and so many of them respond to the call when asked.

As much as we think that it's easy to be rich, it's not always so, and we should never take the well-off for granted. The truth is that the financial burden of getting our community through these tough times is mostly on their shoulders.

Those who are less affluent but still able to give must consider the community as another one of their children. Just as they invest in their progeny's future and ensure that money is put aside for their schooling, so, too, must consideration be made for our community and its needs. Choose an issue – hunger or unemployment, for example – and crunch your numbers so that your tzedakah allotment grows. Although this isn't the reason you should help, your goodness will come back to you.

If you haven't created an endowment fund yet, think about doing so at this time. You can designate your donation and be very specific about how your money is spent. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has an endowment department that can work with you to create this charitable entity to benefit one of its agencies, or unaffiliated ones. It's the right time to do so. Endow funds for our community's homeless, hungry and families that are suffering.

For those of you who don't have disposable income left at the end of the month, consider how you can give of yourself to those in need. More and more food banks and clothing banks are cropping up everywhere, and with your help, families can have shoes, socks, sweaters and more food to eat. And time spent with those struggling is also a form of giving.

If you think all Jews in Toronto are getting three square meals a day, they're not. These are tough times and we all need to play our part – in a big way – to strengthen our community.

Times when you have no choice mobilize the spirit of courage. – Jewish saying

Pro-Israel unionists slam CUPE Ontario

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporters

Union members sympathetic to Israel are banding together to counter recent moves by the Ontario arm of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) and its president, Sid Ryan, to single out the Jewish state via an academic boycott.

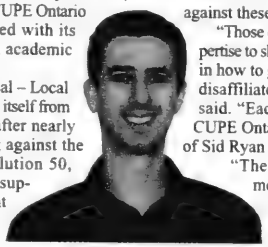
Geoffrey Singer, one of the founders of the new Union Members for Israel (UMI), wants the Jewish community to know that CUPE Ontario's February decision to pass a motion calling for a boycott of Israeli universities does not speak for him or for many others.

Singer, a CUPE member who works for the city of Toronto as an urban planner, said he is one of many Canadian union members who reject the anti-Israel campaigns engaged in by representatives of some Canadian unions.

Last month, the Ontario university workers' co-ordinating committee of CUPE Ontario adopted a motion to proceed with its proposed boycott of Israeli academic institutions.

Singer said his CUPE local – Local 79 – managed to "disaffiliate" itself from CUPE Ontario a year ago after nearly two years of hard lobbying against the provincial chapter's Resolution 50, which passed in 2006 and supported boycotts, divestment and sanctions "to end Israel's apartheid practices."

He said that as a result, members of Local 79 no longer contribute to CUPE Ontario "in any way," and he is encouraging other disaffected union brothers and sisters to follow suit and become proactive in the fight against these union resolutions.



Geoffrey Singer

"Those of us in CUPE Local 79 have expertise to share with members of other locals in how to go about lobbying your local to disaffiliate from CUPE Ontario," Singer said. "Each local that disaffiliates from CUPE Ontario further weakens the ability of Sid Ryan to implement Resolution 50.

Our unshakeable hold on life

Editorial

It would have been quite understandable, given the circumstances of the harrowing escape from total slaughter and annihilation, if Mordechai and the sages who followed him had established a sombre, reflective holiday to celebrate our rescue.

After all, the profound sense of relief in avoiding the murderers' malevolent scheme lent itself quite naturally, emotionally and psychologically to quiet reflection and thankful recitations of Hallelujah.

But in their wisdom, our sages decreed that we should commemorate Haman's demise with loud, effusive merriment. Hallel would be recited on other holidays, but not Purim.

As U.K. Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks has succinctly observed, "The Megillah turns tragedy into comedy. The banging and clapping at Haman's name teaches us, even as children, to recognize evil but not to fear it. Purim's festivities are the most eloquent testimony I know to the unbreakable spirit of a people who, more than most, have walked through the valley of the shadow of death but kept an unshakeable hold on life."

This year, it seems the holiday comes just in time to help us affirm and reaffirm even more urgently the unshakeability of our Jewish hold on life.

Jews around the world are reeling once again from the putrid smell of anti-Semitism that ominously rises from the dark bogs and soggy marshes of ignorance and bigotry. Israel's fight against Hamas was the latest pretext for the release of noxious anti-Israel and anti-Jew hatred. From the Middle East and Europe to South America and Eurasia, mobs were let loose on the streets, often with the complicity of governments, to shout their hateful slogans, threaten the Jews in their midst, and deface and disfigure Jewish property, places of worship and cemeteries.

The News in Brief

Canada

HAMILTON — UJA Federation of Hamilton withdrew from a local Muslim-Jewish dialogue group after a Muslim member published an article about Israel's Gaza operation that many considered "inflammatory and demonizing" of Israel, the federation said. Dialogue member Ali Cheaib, president of the Hamilton chapter of the Canadian Council of Arabs, wrote an opinion piece in the Hamilton Spectator on Jan. 14. Dialogue founder Lorne Finkelstein, who resigned in protest of the article, said Cheaib "violated...fundamental precepts" by "publicly writing about his personal views regarding the Middle East, and especially by the nature of the language used in that article." Cheaib called Hamas "the rape child of a brutal occupier" and Israel "the assassin, the thief, the terrorist." The last dialogue meeting was Jan. 28.

Chabad Pioneer Dies

TORONTO — Rabbi Shlomo Hochler, a founder of Chabad in Ontario and a longtime teacher at Toronto's Eitz Chaim Schools died Feb. 14 at age 88. A graduate of the Lubavitch Yeshiva in Otvosk, Poland, and a Holocaust survivor, Rabbi Hochler was predeceased by his wife Edith in 2006.

TORONTO — The Jewish lead singer and co-founder of the Toronto rock band the Barenaked Ladies has left the group "by mutual agreement" to pursue solo projects, the group said last week. Steven Page was charged last July in New York State with drug possession. In October, a court ordered the charges dropped if he stays clean for six months. The band will record a new album next month.

Propaganda Found

TORONTO — Bookmarks advertising Israeli Apartheid Week, a series of anti-Israel lectures and events on campuses worldwide, were found on empty seats of a Toronto Transit Commission subway car last week. The bookmark includes a quote by Ronnie Kasrils, an ex-member of the African National Congress, that "Israeli measures, the brutality, make apartheid look like a picnic." A TTC spokesperson said the bookmarks were placed without permission or knowledge of the TTC. He said such actions should be reported to transit staff.

Ahenakew Acquitted In Hate Case

SASKATOON — A Saskatchewan judge has acquitted former aboriginal leader David Ahenakew of wilfully promoting hatred against Jews.

It was the second trial for Ahenakew, who was found guilty in 2005 of promoting hatred against Jews and fined $1,000. The conviction was overturned on appeal and a new trial was ordered.

Ahenakew, the former head of the Assembly of First Nations, was charged after a controversial speech and subsequent interview with a reporter in 2002 in which he called Jews a "disease.... that's going to take over."

He went on to say: "The Jews damn near owned all of Germany prior to the war. That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure that the Jews didn't take over Germany or Europe. That's why he fried six million of those guys, you know. Jews would have owned the God-damned world."

On Feb. 23, Judge Wilfred Tucker said the comments were "disgusting," but he acquitted Ahenakew, saying he didn't believe the accused intended to promote hatred.

Ahenakew, 75, testified at his second trial that he doesn't hate Jews, but "I hate what they do to people." He said he still believes Jews caused World War II.

Canadian Jewish Congress and Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center both said they respect the verdict, but B'nai Brith "expressed disappointment" and said it may urge the federal government to review hate laws.

Free Tuition At Pardes

JERUSALEM — In response to the global recession, the Pardes Institute in Jerusalem, along with the MASA student grant program in Israel, is offering students tuition-free study at Pardes for the 2009-10 academic year. The offer is open to students from North America who qualify for a MASA grant, offered by the Israeli government and the Jewish Agency for Israel. Pardes, a non-denominational, co-ed yeshiva, was established in 1972.

Student leaders demand action on anti-Semitism

Noah Kochman, left, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' Israel affairs chair, and Daniel Ferman, Hillel at York's president, held a press conference last Thursday to call attention to the hostility that Jewish students face on Canadian campuses.

Jewish student groups are calling on university administrations to respond to the rise of anti-Semitic incidents on Canadian campuses by what they describe as "racist thugs who seek to intimidate other students into silence."

Last week, Noah Kochman, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' (CFJS) Israel affairs chair, and Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel at York University, held a press conference at the Delta Chelsea Hotel in Toronto to call attention to the hostility and anti-Semitism that Jewish students regularly face on campus.

Although they referred to a number of incidents that have taken place at universities across the country, they singled out York for failing to protect students.

A joint statement by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Hillel at York and Hasbara Fellowships said the Jewish community has been deeply concerned about York's inaction since a mob of anti-Israel protesters barricaded Jewish students in the Hillel lounge while shouting anti-Israel and anti-Semitic slurs on Feb. 11.

"It appears that York is waiting for students to go through the bureaucratic process of filing formal complaints, even though York security was on hand to witness the incident and they have video footage of the incident. The university's non-response is completely unacceptable," said Rafi Yablonsky, president of Hasbara Fellowships.

But Rob Tiffin, York's vice-president of equity, said that the university is actively investigating and wants to "have a resolution of this fairly soon, but it does have to go through a process whereby... there is a fairness applied and a perception of justice."

He said that an adjudicator has footage of the confrontation and has been using it to identify the individuals involved.

"There are also individuals we have identified who are not members of the York community, and we will be taking further legal action on that front," Tiffin said. "Part of the process is for the adjudicator to meet with

Jerusalem think-tank's worries

Last month in Jerusalem, the non-profit think-tank, the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute, presented its fifth annual assessment of the worldwide condition of the Jewish people.

Over the years, The CJN has made a point of calling our readers' attention to the institute, its important work and its yearly assessment. Indeed our Rosh Hashanah supplement this year contained a number of essays written by the institute's scholars and its director-general Avinoam Bar-Yosef.

From the editor's desk...

It is hard to imagine a time, ever – except perhaps when Miriam, joyfully playing her timbrel, led the grateful singing after the crossing of the Red Sea, or when chroniclers and visitors marvelled at the monarch's wisdom during the height of King Solomon's reign – when the Jewish future did not seem fraught with worry and concern. Nor is it otherwise today.

"A host of new dangers burden Israel and the Jewish people," stated Arik Puder, the institute's spokesperson when the report was released last month.

Ambassador Dennis Ross, chairman of the board and professional council of the institute, draws some of the parameters of those dangers in the foreword of the assessment: "[The report] addresses the growth of Iranian leverage in the Middle East, the divisions among Palestinians, the prospective American drawdown in Iraq, the uncertainties among Arab regimes — and larger questions related to growing Russian assertiveness, the increased global reach of China and India, and the perception of a relative decline in American power."

The international financial crisis is also discussed in a preliminary manner by the institute.

While the report does not flinch from pointing out and elaborating upon the dangers it sees ahead (in the section on Significant Recent and Current Challenges), it also suggests possibilities and opportunities we face in dealing with those dangers (Policy Directions for World Jewry). In addition, as it does each year, the institute comprehensively explores a specific subject of abiding relevance to world Jewry. This year, that subject is women in Jewish society.

Ross makes it clear that the purpose of the report is to "highlight issues that may become significant for the Jewish world and to trigger planning for how to deal with those emerging factors that could have far-reaching consequences."

The annual assessment does this superbly. It does not purport to be a repository of final wisdom. It is to communal leadership and priority-setting what the shofar is theologically at Rosh Hashanah: a wake-up call.

Thus the writers of the report suggest policy directions that flow from what they define as the Jewish people's strategic agenda. Those policy recommendations are presented according to five broad categories: security and geopolitics; economics and society; education and culture; demographics; and women.

One of the report's more quite timely discussions, especially as Jews on campuses around the world fend off the vile, sinister encroachments of "Israel Apartheid Week," relates to education.

"The quality of Jewish education – in Israel and abroad – is of growing concern to those who worry that ignorance about basic history, culture and tradition has a corrosive effect on Jewish identity and, ultimately, threatens the survival of the Jewish people. Conflicts between religious and secular Jews, with respect to education as well as other societal functions, continue to pose daunting challenges primarily but not exclusively in Israel. A serious problem is the image of Israel and Zionism on college and university campuses, mostly in Europe, but also notably in elite institutions of the U.S., many of which have become hotbeds of a virulent new strain of anti-Semitism that poisons the academic atmosphere, infects teaching and learning, threatens the legitimacy of the Jewish state and discourages capable individuals who are committed to their Jewish identity from pursuing academic careers. Our basic policy recommendation in response to these trends in education and culture is for Jewish leadership worldwide to devote resources toward educational research, evaluation, international exchange and institutional innovation." (Their emphasis)

One of the more intriguing and potentially far-reaching suggestions the writers make as part of their policy directions in the field of education is that the government of Israel explore ways of lowering the cost of Jewish education in the Diaspora.

The assessment is a treasure-trove of important, relevant and highly informative material. It should be read with the seriousness and the urgency that its authors intend.

As we have done in previous years, we have reproduced (below) the thumbnail demographic sketch of the Jewish people that appears in the executive summary of the report titled Selected Indicators of World Jewry – 2008. Due to limitations of space, we have omitted the references that explain the footnotes in the chart. The information, however, is quite straightforward.

Among the noteworthy nuggets of information on the page are:

• The Jews of Israel, the U.S., and Canada comprise 84 per cent of the 13,232,000 Jews in the world.

• Canadian Jews comprise 2.8 per cent of the totality of world Jewry.

The executive summary of the report, along with other publications of the institute, is available at the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute website, www.jpppi.org.il.

Federation funding won't change this year, CEO says

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The results of a series of high-level closed-door meetings in Florida early last month in which leaders of the Jewish federation system discussed streamlining operations, among other issues, will have no impact locally, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto president and CEO Ted Sokolsky told The CJN last week.

Ted Sokolsky

Canadian federations are part of the North American federation umbrella United Jewish Communities (UJC), but they're not involved in its overseas allocations program, Sokolsky explained.

Sokolsky – a former head of UJC's large city executive directors and a member of a number of its strategic planning committees – attended the Florida meetings, where one issue that came to the fore was allocation of overseas funding.

Most Jewish federations that are part of UJC give a predetermined figure to the organization for it to divide between the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) for their respective core operating budgets. There are also some supplementary overseas allocations.

In Canada, federation funding for JAFI and JDC has been funnelled through UJA Federations Canada for more than 40 years, Sokolsky said.

Even in the United States, he added, "the real story is that nothing has changed. What has changed is putting down a practice on paper that has existed for 20 years."

This year, Jewish communities in Canada are contributing a total of $15 million to JAFI and $1 million to the JDC, the same amount as last year. About half of that comes from Toronto.

Even if the Toronto campaign doesn't reach its anticipated goal of $66 million, of which $61 million had been raised by the close of the campaign last month – and without cutting the amount of overseas allocations – local services won't be affected, at least for the 2009-10 year, Sokolsky said.

Local campaign organizers were unable to meet their original goal of $70 million, which was set before the economy declined, but they were confident at the time the campaign closed that they would match last year's total of $66 million.

Although the annual budget process is not expected to be finalized until late May or early June, the federation has "made some internal changes and [may delay] certain programs, in case we fall short," Sokolsky said.

"We just have to cut back where we can," he said. "I think all businesses are cutting back." He added that some open staff positions have gone unfilled as part of the effort to "cushion the effect" of the economic downturn.

Sokolsky said he considers the Toronto federation lucky, because its fundraising campaign was mostly completed "before things got very bad."

'White guilt' helps Islamists, moderate Muslims say

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two prominent Muslim personalities, both of them immigrants from east Asia, share a deep concern over the state of Canadian freedoms and values – a concern they say eclipses that of homegrown opinion-makers.

In their view, the liberal and left-leaning Canadian intelligentsia is wracked by guilt and contempt for their own intellectual heritage and they do all they can to stand up for radical Islamists whose agendas are more closely linked to the Muslim Brotherhood than to Canadian freedoms.

They, on other hand, the "good-looking" Muslims whom the mainstream media generally ignore, stand with John Stuart Mill in upholding individual freedom and traditional values associated with an earlier Canada.

So spoke Tarek Fatah and Salim Mansur at a recent lunchtime lecture at the offices of the Ontario Bar Association, sponsored by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association, and in interviews with The CJN.

Fatah is founder of the Muslim Canadian Congress and author of Chasing a Mirage: The Tragic Illusion of an Islamic State. Mansur is a professor of political science at the University of Western Ontario and a syndicated columnist.

Fatah contrasted the influence of "good looking" Muslims like himself – by which he meant those who share Enlightenment values and have integrated into Canadian society – to "ugly" Muslims who dress as in Saudi Arabia, speak with heavy accents, promote jihad and claim to be authentic representatives of their faith. Canadian politicians fall all over themselves to curry favour with the latter group, giving them prestige and influence.

Meanwhile, "nine-to-five" Muslims, who are mostly concerned with making a living and getting ahead, are cowed into silence by the authority granted by Canadian officials to these traditional Muslim representatives, he said.

Fatah and Mansur also blasted comfortable Canadians who fail to stand up for traditional values and confront jihadists among them. Canadians' freedoms stem from the Enlightenment, the American and French Revolutions, and the concept that citizens of a country are governed equally by man-made laws, Fatah said. Other societies were formed around inherited racial or religious commonalities, but those belong in the past. Yet, even today, some people choose to live in the 12th century and not in the 21st, he said.

In Canada today you can find books distributed at street fairs supported by PEN Canada, an advocacy organization for free expression, that advocate jihad, he said.

Muslims like himself argue that it's nonsense to accept the premise that women should be able to testify in court while their faces are covered by burkas, yet women's groups rush to the defence of these women, he said.

He also took aim at mainstream Jewish organizations, saying Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada are too eager to foster relations with more traditional Muslim groups and ignore Muslims who prize Canadian values.

In an interview with The CJN, Fatah said "there is a tremendous amount of white guilt. The intelligentsia in this country in a selfish way tries to assuage this guilt. It caters to the most idiosyncratic behaviour of the immigrant and practices the racism of lower expectations. It sets standards of behaviour for our community, but when dealing with immigrants and especially the Muslim community, it does not expect them to live by the same standards."

He said mosques treat women as second-class citizens – something that would not be tolerated in the broader society – yet still retain charitable status. That's not something that other Canadians should be subsidizing through tax policy, he said.

Fatah said Saudi Arabia is financing Islamic groups in North America, including in the GTA, who preach "hatred of Western society" and promote jihad.

"Jews are right at the top of the jihad victims," he continued. "You can be blamed for everything that goes wrong in the Islamic world. The occupation is the biggest gift to radical Islam. The State of Israel is the gift to Islamists that keeps on giving. Palestinians' pain is used by the Islamists' agenda."

Asked about human rights commissions – several provincial and federal commissions were recently asked to look into complaints about written material that allegedly promoted contempt of Muslims – Fatah called them "a joke, a scandal."

Commissioners are political appointees and one senior person at the Ontario Human Rights Commission "is openly supportive of the Islamist cause and believes in Shariah law," he said.

In a question-and-answer period, Fatah was asked why moderate Muslims don't demonstrate against their radical co-religionists. Turning the question around, he asked why mainstream Canadians don't demonstrate against the Taliban. Why would such demonstrations be expected of Muslim immigrants who are trying to make a living and who escaped tyranny?

Mansur added: Would an Algerian, who escaped from a country where hundreds of thousands were killed by religious extremists protest against the leadership of a mosque that was controlled by those very factions from Algeria and risk the lives of their families in Algeria?

Mansur said Canadians may now be pushing back against the erosion of traditional values. You can see it in New Brunswick, where parents were angry that a school principal banned playing O Canada at the start of the day. (That policy was reversed).

You see it also in Quebec where people are "more assertive" in demanding that their values be retained, he said.

Quintessential holiday of responsibility

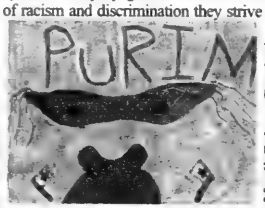
Closer to home, the monstrous lie of "Israeli Apartheid" is the drumbeating buzzword this week on campuses around North America, rocking the minds and spoiling the hearts of the ill-informed and meek of character.

The story of Purim and the merriment it prescribes teach us, among many important lessons, that we do not bow down or bend our knees to the tyrants who propagate hateful anti-Jewish lies or to the tyranny of racism and discrimination they strive to create.



Marli Cohen, Grade 4

The holiday teaches us to unite against external enemies, to join forces one with the other, to set aside differences, to have courage, to have faith and to resist.

Purim is the quintessential holiday of responsibility. As Mordechai reminded Esther, in the dreaded moments of crisis, we cannot, we must not, run from our personal responsibility to act. Neither station in life nor paucity of spirit absolves the individual from being responsible or from taking responsibility for each other.

Thus, Mordechai and the sages also decreed that the celebration of the holiday requires that we give matanot l'evyonim, monetary aid to the poor and needy among us.

We cannot celebrate fully, truly, in the intended manner if there are among us those who have not the means to do so. The entirety of the community was rescued; the entirety of the community must feel the requisite sense of celebration. This, too, is part of what Rabbi Sacks referred to as our "unshakeable hold on life." It is the core value that inspires the ethics of our social responsibility: the dignity of our friend and neighbour is as precious to us as is our own. And this year, more than ever in recent times, the holiday of Purim helps us affirm the unshakeability of that value, too.

The economic uncertainty of these times has harmed individuals, families and institutions. It falls to all of us to help those who are in financial need as much as we can, and, if we can, even more than we have in the past.

Ours is a religion of responsibility. It reminds us at every turn of the calendar that we do not live alone, that we are here on earth for the sake of each other.

Thankfully, however, our responsibilities also include the responsibility to be happy, to celebrate.

So let's celebrate.

Not all union locals support Ryan

Sara Horowitz's column "Why unions don't like Israel" (CJN, Jan. 29) is, I'm happy to report, decidedly incomplete.

It is true that the leadership of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE), Local 3903, contract lecturers and teaching assistants at York University, is pathologically opposed to Israel. The leader of the Ontario section, Sid Ryan, holds to a similar aberration.

But this is decidedly not true of the rest of Canada's labour movement. For example, the equivalent Local 3902 of CUPE at the University of Toronto supports a fair and balanced call for peace in the Middle East. They are very worthy of the support of the Jewish community.

I'm a Toronto high school teacher, and thus I have many friends and colleagues who are CUPE members. Their opinions of Ryan vary from disagreement to abhorrence.

If any part of the labour movement is ostensibly opposed to Israel, it's only due to apathy and laziness of their Jewish members.

As a hopeful example, my local Toronto Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, District 12, Secondary Teachers' Bargaining Unit, overwhelmingly defeated a proposed motion to boycott Israel. After a full debate, led by several active Jewish teachers, the boycott motion went down by a margin of 100 to 10, as was reported in The CJN in January 2007.

Similar results can be expected in any local, provincial or national union if Jewish members remember our heritage from Hillel and the Maccabees. Be involved, raise our issues and fight for what is right.

After a full and lengthy debate, you'll succeed, because Canada's unions are democratic institutions and most Canadians are decent people.

Amnesia in the Mideast

Jesse Mintz is critical of the historical amnesia that afflicts both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict ("Amnesia abounds, on all sides," CJN, Feb. 19) However, his own narrative of historical and moral relativity suffers from a more severe amnesia that makes his apparent impartiality delusive. If the clock of history is not to be set arbitrarily, our memory must stretch further back than the mere 60 years that have passed since the founding of the modern State of Israel. Before the Palestinians, the British and the Turks; before there were Muslims or Christians; before Rome and Babylon ruled; the Jewish people dwelled in their land, and their presence there never died out. Let us therefore set our clock back to the time of Abraham, when a divine promise was made. Let us see the current Israeli-Palestinian conflict in the light that radiates from the ultimate origin.

Jewish singles

Letter writer Charles Abshez laments the lack of opportunities that the Conservative movement provides for its singles to meet ("Conservative Jewish singles," CJN letters, Jan. 8). He suggests that it copy Sasson V'Simcha, which has been established by the Orthodox as a not-for-profit shidduch organization for their singles. While Sasson V'Simcha is endorsed by all Orthodox rebbetzins, they do not run it. It is run by volunteers and professional shadchanim.

We recognize the need for such a service in the entire Jewish community and would be happy to help others set up their own shidduch group. Please feel free to telephone us at 416-256-4497 or e-mail us at sassontoronto@rogers.com if we can be of any assistance.

From the private life of Ehud Olmert...

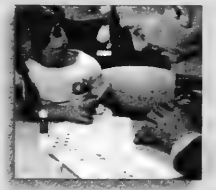
So, Tzipi, tell me. What was it like when you met him?

It was amazing, Ehud. Oh my Gawd.

When Barack looked at me I almost melted.

HAPPY PURIM!

One more time, Ehud, try to keep within the lines.



Okay, Mr. Prime Minister. What is it that you don't get about this?

Ehud, this is how it works. You push this button and say "hello."

Ehud, we have a gift for you.

George, I love gifts. Thank you. I'm so excited.

Whoaaa baby.

Ehud. Ehud. It's supposed to be coffee. "Wake up and smell the coffee." Not the lemon.

Oy. Then my face got caught in the subway door. It was so embarrassing.

Hosni. Hosni. Please. I'm looking for Bashir Assad. Have you seen him?

So, Condi. Did you see my picture in The CJN last week?

I'm happy to read your palm Ehud. I see a lot of vacation time ahead for you.

Hamilton dialogue collapses

During the recent war in Gaza, one of the founding partners to the so-called Hamilton Jewish Arab Muslim Dialogue was ominously unrestrained in castigating Israel (Hamilton Spectator, Jan. 14). Defending Hamas as "the rape child of a brutal occupier," he also referred to Israel as "the assassin, the thief, the terrorist."

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

He ranted that Israel was "responsible for 60 years of land and property confiscation, and of uprooting an entire population from their natural environment" and that "Israel has no moral standing whatsoever to portray itself as the victim, or even trumpet the usual refrain about defending itself against Palestinian terror."

In the light of this very obvious violation of a "code" whereby all members of the dialogue committee had agreed "to avoid debate on the Mideast conflict and refrain from comments or actions that could be perceived to be critical of the group or their interests," UJA Federation of Hamilton summarily terminated its participation in the dialogue initiative. Given the circumstances, federation leaders had little option but to withdraw. However, what is more to the point is why they chose to engage in this charade in the first place.

From the outset, there were countless warning signs that the dialogue, as constituted, could not, and would not, work. This latest breach of its guiding principles was one among many. And while arguably the most blatant, it differed little in tone and intent from previous acts of bad faith by dialogue partners who have sought to demonize the State of Israel and its supporters.

With each offence there was a rationalization and a pledge to immediately re-commit to the same dialogue framework. Meanwhile members of the Jewish community who drew attention to the inherent risks of what was occurring were marginalized, labelled as "detractors." Even after the dismantling of the dialogue committee, an article in last month's Hamilton Jewish News proclaimed that the federation's "involvement with the [dialogue] committee has been a valuable experience." Notably absent was any hint of acceptance that the process may have been misguided, the objectives flawed and the outcome embarrassing.

An effective dialogue requires mutual respect and mutual recognition among all participants. When such components are lacking, there's no point to continuing the deliberations.

With each contravention of the dialogue committee's own rules of engagement, there was ample opportunity for the local federation to pull out of the failing experiment. In choosing not to do so, our leadership has been tainted by what has turned out to be no more than a cynical public relations exercise that has fomented distrust, divided our community and made a mockery of civil discourse.

Bibi and Livni must set aside egos for unity

By the time this is printed, a coalition government might have been formed here in Israel. Somehow I doubt it.

When the election results became clear in the early hours of Feb. 11, it also became evident they were anomalous. The centrist Kadima party, headed by Tzipi Livni, won the most Knesset seats (28 out of 120), but a right-wing bloc of six parties, led by Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud, won a 65-seat plurality.

Yair Lapostiten in Jerusalem

Under Israel's constitutional system, after conferring with all factions elected to the Knesset, the president must call on an MK to form a government. Traditionally, the largest party's leader has been given the task. However, when it became apparent that Livni wouldn't be able to do so, President Shimon Peres gave Netanyahu the nod.

Legally, Netanyahu has 28 days to try, with Peres authorized to lengthen that period by 14 days. With the myriad issues to be dealt with, Netanyahu must act quickly and effectively to create a viable government.

He could piece together a coalition with little delay based on Likud and its "natural allies" on the right – two haredi parties (Shas and Yahadut HaTorah), a nationalist religious party (the Jewish Home), and two ultra-nationalist parties (National Union and Israel Beytenu).

The last, Avigdor Lieberman's Israel Beytenu, is now the third-largest faction in the Knesset, its success based on nationalistic fervour in the wake of the recent Gaza operation (and the party's call to annul "disloyal" Arab Israelis' citizenship), and huge support from Russian new immigrants.

While this "natural alliance" might function in relative unison when dealing with security-related issues and demands on Israel to make concessions for peace, it will be hard-pressed if Lieberman lives up to his campaign promises to promote legalized civil marriages and easier conversion procedures. These initiatives won't sit well with the religious elements in this possible coalition, and it won't be long before it begins to teeter.

Understanding the limits of his success and grounded in his own experience, Netanyahu is bent on forming a wider coalition. During his previous stint as prime minister in 1996, he managed to hold power for only three years, due to his government's slim plurality and constant infighting within it, and particularly within his own party.

With this backdrop, Netanyahu has invited Kadima and Ehud Barak's debilitated Labor Party to join him in a national unity government. While such governments have been criticized for serving the lowest common denominator and leading to stagnation, there have been several successful precedents for such administrations. Menachem Begin joined Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir in governments that functioned well from just before the Six Day War in 1967 until nearly the end of the War of Attrition in 1969. Peres and Yitzchak Shamir governed satisfactorily for four years in the mid 1980s, each serving as prime minister for two years.

Given its abysmal election results, the chances of Labor joining any coalition are slim. To do so would be political suicide. It needs time in opposition to regroup and renew its voice.

Kadima might be a different story. Netanyahu has offered it two of the most important ministerial positions. Livni, who views herself as the election's true victor, has to date rejected Netanyahu's overtures, claiming his government will be far too hawkish and refusing to become a mask for its policies. She might reluctantly consider a prime ministerial rotation between Netanyahu and herself, similar to Shamir and Peres, which would allay suspicions about Netanyahu's true ambitions. For now, however, the party's line is that it prefers consolidating power while in opposition.

Not having attained pre-election goals, neither of the major parties can achieve all their aspirations.

The matters at hand demand political maturity and magnanimity – Gaza and Hamas, Gilad Schalit's release, a nuclear Iran, the economy and the need for election reforms, to name but a few. While a national unity government is not a solution to all our woes, it's what this country needs and is also what an overwhelming majority of the people want.

Whether through prime ministerial rotation or some other political formula, Netanyahu and Livni must put their egos aside and responsibly forge a sustainable united government.

Israel-bashing Jews: not in my name!

Israel's response to thousands of rocket attacks from Gaza brought another wave of vituperous attacks, with more false claims of "war crimes," human rights violations and other spurious allegations of immorality. The Durban strategy of demonization is moving at top speed, with trade union boycotts, university "apartheid weeks," and legal campaigns to bring Israeli officials to trial in kangaroo courts. In parallel, demonstrators chant slogans in support of Hamas and Hezbollah, which openly proclaim their genocidal goals.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In this rejectionist war that has continued for more than 60 years, a tiny group of anti-Zionist Jews and Israelis play central roles. They are given prominence as columnists and on television, claiming to present an "enlightened" and "independent" Jewish voice that's opposed to the evil "occupation" (erasing a history of genocidal goals and terrorism that began long before 1967) and other terrible Israeli actions. The group includes university professors, journalists and officials of human rights superpowers. Many have giant psychological chips on their shoulders and gain notoriety by being vocally anti-Israel.

These "independent voices" do not speak in my name. With the restoration of Jewish sovereignty, Israelis choose their own leaders, for better or worse, and engage in active policy debates. The age of Diaspora interlocutors and apologists selected by foreign powers is over.

The small number of "independent Jewish voices" speak for themselves and constitute a tiny fraction of the Jewish people. But in an atmosphere of anti-Semitism, they provide imagined shields against claims of anti-Semitism and justify the singling out of Israel. In many cases, this is their only "Jewish" activity – most are not active members in synagogues, play no role in other Jewish institutions and do not contribute to Jewish life or continuity.

A prominent example of this activity is provided by Antony Lerman, who briefly served as director of London's Institute for Jewish Policy Research, and now has a column in the influential Guardian newspaper – one of the leading platforms for the anti-Israel invective pervasive among leftist intellectuals in Britain.

On Feb. 13, in "An open letter on anti-Semitism," addressed to an official addressing a major conference on the topic taking place in the British Parliament. Assuming the ostrich position, Lerman wrote that the way to stop numerous anti-Semitic attacks in Britain was to be louder in criticizing Israel. Lerman also alleges that the anti-Israel obsession in which he participates is not a form of modern anti-Semitism – replacing all of the evidence with sentiment from his fantasy world. He also refers to concerns about this anti-Semitism as "exaggeration" and "hyperbole."

The main reason that Lerman's opinions receive any attention is that he is a prominent Jew and, therefore, useful in the demonization campaign. Lerman has been embraced by J-Street – a U.S.-based organization funded and founded by George Soros – another anti-Israel Diaspora-based "independent" Jewish voice.

Canada's "independent Jewish voices" are less articulate or influential than Lerman or Soros, and no more credible. In a letter to Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney, who is a world leader in the battle against anti-Semitism, this group sought to justify the activities of the Canadian Arab Federation, claiming that this controversial organization "has been a consistent and valued supporter of Canadian Jewish individuals and groups, including Independent Jewish Voices (Canada)." This is transparently self-serving propaganda, and nothing more.

Free speech gives all voices – including the most marginal – the right to state their opinions, but in the free marketplace of ideas, the unjustified attention and vacuous claims can be exposed and countered. Jews can always be found for those seeking to justify "wiping Israel off the map," but they do not speak in my name.

Islamic revolution turned Iran into Israel's enemy

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last month, as Iran marked the 30th anniversary of the Islamic revolution, Khaled Meshal, one of the leaders of Hamas, visited Tehran, one of his favourite destinations. He was there to thank the Iranian government for having helped Hamas during Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip.

"Iran has definitely played a big role in the victory of the people of Gaza and is a partner in that victory," Meshal told Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, a vocal backer of radical Palestinian factions and a fierce and unremitting opponent of Israel's existence. "The people of Gaza have always appreciated the political and spiritual support of the Iranian leaders and nation."

Meshal's reference to Hamas' victory was overblown, of course. Militarily, Israel's armed forces trounced Hamas during its 22-day offensive, known as Operation Cast Lead. But Meshal – the object of an Israeli assassination attempt in 1997 in Jordan – was not exaggerating when he referred to Hamas' alliance with Iran in glowing terms.

As the air and land war in Gaza unfolded in December and January, Iran encouraged Hamas to hang on, urged young Iranian men to volunteer for Hamas, and warned Hamas not to accept a ceasefire with Israel. Later, as Israel escalated its attacks, two Iranian emissaries – Ali Lafijani, the speaker of Iran's parliament, and Said Jalili, a senior representative of Iran's intelligence service – conferred with Meshal.

Amid these developments, Ahmadinejad called on U.S. President Barack Obama to cease American support for Israel, claiming that Israel's days were numbered. Only months earlier, in a speech to the United Nations General Assembly, Ahmadinejad, a Holocaust denier, claimed that "the Zionist regime is on the slope of decline," and that "Zionists" dominated financial and political capitals in Europe and the United States.

Before hostilities in Gaza erupted, Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, castigated Egypt and Saudi Arabia for not ending Israel's blockade of Gaza.

Iran's embrace of Hamas was not merely rhetorical. Prior to Operation Cast Lead, Iran, a big oil producer, supplied Hamas with generous subsidies, caches of arms and munitions, logistical assistance and training for its fighters.

During the war, Israel targeted Iranian-affiliated targets, destroying a special Hamas unit consisting of 100 men who had been trained by Iran's Revolutionary Guards, striking a building housing Al-Alam, Iran's Arab-language television station in Gaza, and arresting two Palestinian journalists working for Al-Alam.

As well, the Israeli navy intercepted an Iranian ship carrying humanitarian aid, food and medicine for the Palestinians of Gaza, while U.S. and Greek naval vessels stopped two Iranian boats bound for Gaza. Both ships were believed to be ferrying weapons and weapon parts to Hamas.

Since the 1979 Islamic revolution, Iran has gone to extraordinary lengths to champion the rejectionist Palestinian cause and decry Israel's existence. The revolution was a major strategic blow to Israel and the United States, ushering in a repressive era of theocratic rule in Iran.

Israel, threatened by hostile Arab states, established relations with Tehran as part of David Ben-Gurion's "periphery" policy of cementing alliances with key non-Arab countries in the region, Iran, Turkey and Ethiopia.

Israel established a mutually beneficial and supremely pragmatic relationship with the pro-western king of Iran, Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi. Iran became one of Israel's closest Muslim allies, even as Iran rescinded its recognition of Israel in 1951, harshly criticized Israel's settlement policies in the post-1967 territories and voted for a United Nations resolution equating Zionism with racism.

But with the overthrow of the monarchy, Iran cut ties with Israel, notwithstanding the fact that Israel sold about $2 billion (US) worth of military equipment to Iran during its draining eight-year war with Iraq.

Iran's new rulers, the mullahs and their religious and nationalist supporters, hated Israel, viewing it as an illegitimate state and a beachhead of western colonialism.

Iran's first supreme leader, Ayatollah Khomeini, described Israel as an "enemy of Islam." His equally zealous successor, Ayatollah Khamenei, said of Israel, "This cancerous tumor of a state must be removed from the region." Even an alleged moderate such as Mohammed Khatami, the president from 1997 to 2005, branded Israel an "illegal state" and a "parasite."

By sharp contrast, the new Iranian regime rallied around the Palestinian cause, handing over Israel's embassy to the leader of the PLO, Yasser Arafat. Today, Iran's backing of the Palestinians is confined to its extreme wing, as exemplified by Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

But as much as this concerns the Israeli government, Israel is far more worried about Iran's budding nuclear program, which was originally launched by the Shah.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei

Iran's nuclear project, which Iran insists is peaceful in intention, has made significant strides. Yet no one is certain when Iran will actually be able to build a functioning atomic device. The director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohammed El Baradei, has said that Iran may be able to build a nuclear arsenal by 2011.

Iran has apparently completed two of the vital steps toward joining the nuclear club, of which Israel is a member.

Iran has converted uranium ore into yellowcake and transformed the yellowcake into pure hexafluoride UF6 fuel. The challenge facing Iran now is enrichment, feeding the UF6 fuel into clusters of high-speed centrifuges, or cascades. According to a report issued recently by the International Atomic Energy Agency, Iran has built 5,600 centrifuges. This has enabled Iran to make 2,227 pounds of low-enriched uranium, enough for a single atomic bomb. More ominously, Iran has made progress in fitting a nuclear warhead to a missile.

Iran has also tested long-range missiles that can reach Israel, and last month, Iran successfully launched its first domestically manufactured satellite, the Omid, into orbit. Ehud Barak, Israel's defence minister, called the Omid a "technological feat" and proof of Iran's "intelligence and military capabilities." Iran claims that the Omid will be used strictly for civilian purposes, but the ballistic technology can be deployed for launching warheads, too.

Given Tehran's hostility to Israel, its alliances with Israel's enemies and its Holocaust denial, Israel regards Iran's nuclear program as a threat that must be countered by either economic sanctions or military means. Shaul Mofaz, Israel's former defence minister, has said that Israel would be prepared to take "unilateral military action" to wipe out Iran's nuclear facilities.

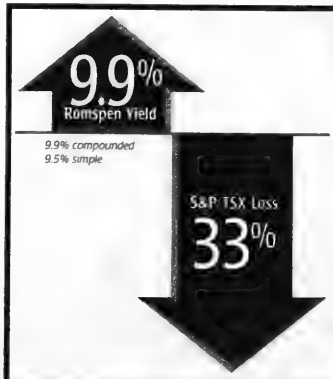
But the former commander of U.S. army operations in the Middle East, John Abizaid, doubts whether Israel has the capabilities to inflict serious damage on Iran's nuclear infrastructure.

Thinking of mounting such an attack, Israel asked the United States for advanced bunker-busting bombs in 2008. Washington not only rejected Israel's request, but turned down a parallel Israeli request to fly over Iraq to reach nuclear sites in Iran. To Israel's satisfaction, Russia has reportedly frozen the sale of S-300 anti-aircraft missiles to Iran, a state-of-the-art system that can track 100 targets all at once.

For Israel, the burning question is whether Iran can be stopped in its tracks. Maybe not, as NATO's secretary-general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, suggested last year. "I am not positive about the world being able to stop Iran from fulfilling its ambitions," he said in a bleak statement.

Tighter economic sanctions may be useful in diverting Iran from its course, but Russia and China oppose such drastic measures. Future U.S. talks with Iran may nudge Iran to reconsider its policy.

Absent these scenarios, Israel may have to learn to live with an Iranian nuclear arsenal. Call it mutual deterrence.



2008: Another Great Year at Romspen

Many investors now regret that they took on more risk than they realized by overweighting their portfolios with stock market investments. They are now waiting for these investments to recover. But is this really the best solution?

For a risk-averse investment strategy consider the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, a leading Canadian non-bank commercial mortgage lender. Since inception and including 2008, investors in the RMIF have earned about 10% per annum. That's not just a paper gain – it's cash paid to investors each and every month. Mazon fundraiser to help feed the hungry

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada raised close to $100,000 at its annual benefit event, held this year at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue on Feb. 18.

The money is allocated to the organization's general funds for front-line hunger relief organizations, Shira Lester-Cohen, Mazon's executive director, told The CJN.

The event featured a cooking demonstration with cookbook author and CJN contributor Norene Gilletz speaking on Food Memories: Then and Now.

As well, some 300 attendees sampled the offerings of Toronto-area kosher caterers and wine merchants.

The crowd sipped wine, or cocktails such as Cosmopolitans and Purple Hazes, and chose from a range of dishes, from truffled beef carpaccio and deep-fried gefilte fish with horseradish aioli to sushi and pareve Indian-style "butter paneer" (with tofu replacing the traditional cheese).

Less adventurous types could try gluten-free hot dogs, fresh fruit smoothies or all-natural salads, among other selections.

"People today are not cooking the way they used to," Gilletz said in her presentation.

She demonstrated how to make mock chopped liver, grilled chicken and potato-onion knishes from scratch.

The mock liver was based on mushrooms, a cholesterol-free substitute for the original meat, with onions that were "sautéed until they're brown and very well caramelized." It also included hard-boiled eggs, almonds and a touch of salt.

"You have to taste the food, of course," Gilletz said.

To serve it, she used an ice-cream scoop, and placed a thin wedge of pumpernickel on the serving.

"It makes it fancy," she explained.

"Another nice presentation would be to take this mixture and put it into a mould," she added, recalling Herman Wouk's 1955 novel Marjorie Morningstar.

"You can line a bowl with plastic, and then unmould it," she said.

"If you're a bubbie or a zaide, you should be cooking with your children and your grandchildren," Gilletz added. "Pass those traditions on."

Parents urged to respect kids' coping mechanisms

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

We must not think that everyone deals with trauma in the same way, says psychologist and author David Pelcovitz.

"Coping comes in different flavours, and we can't be judgmental. We have to support each other's coping mechanisms," said Pelcovitz, a professor at Yeshiva University's Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education, director of psychology at North Shore University Hospital in Manhasset, N.Y., clinical professor of psychology at New York University's school of medicine and the author of Balanced Parenting.

Speaking at a recent lecture at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue co-sponsored by the shul along with B'nai Torah Congregation and Yeshiva University, Pelcovitz said that when kids are going through a hard time, such as a painful medical procedure, they usually fall into one of two categories.

"There are the distracters who don't want to know what is going on and need things to get their mind off what is happening, and the attenders, who need to know everything. We have to let the distracters distract and the attenders attend. [In that way] they'll build up a toolbox of coping mechanisms that can be helpful for them."

Some people need to talk, he said, and some people need to escape. "That is true in any family. Spouses deal differently with difficult issues."

When children are facing issues such as death, illness or financial crisis, it's like "they're living on a narrow bridge. By letting them know we're there for them, we build a protective shield around them."

Pelcovitz cited studies that found children who were uprooted because their families lost their homes came through the crisis resiliently if their family stayed together despite the stress.

"Although the parents had lost everything, they built a protective shield around their children."

He stressed that parents need to talk to their children "mindfully. They have to override all technology and be there. That is a key point in helping our children through stressful times."

Youth from wealthy homes have about triple the rate of anxiety than their less affluent counterparts, he said, "because it is never good enough for them to be average. As well, their parents are often too busy."

When kids are not asked to pitch in at home, he said, "they take, and they don't [learn] to give back. That leads to entitlement and being unable to deal with stress."

The bottom line, Pelcovitz said, is that we have to be there for our children, "teach them what matters, give them a voice, and light a spark in their souls. Hopefully they will be able to deal with whatever comes their way."

Youth book contest addresses racism

An awards ceremony for Toronto Residents in Partnership's Morley S. Wolfe Youth Book Competition: Challenging Racism and Celebrating Differences is being held on March 5, at 7 p.m. at the North York Central Library auditorium. The annual contest is open to high school students who create children's books that address issues that are incompatible with the values of equity and inclusion. Arielle Maze, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is among the five finalists.

York president addresses climate on his campus

the individuals identified and give them an opportunity to present their perspective."

Tiffin added that students involved in the confrontation with Jewish students could receive penalties ranging from fines to suspensions.

At the CFJS press conference last week, Ferman said he was disappointed with York's response so far.

"It's been more than two weeks since this [Feb. 11 incident] occurred, and the only response we've heard from them is that they're investigating. After two weeks, we'd hoped that actions would be taken to protect Jewish students and all students."

York president Mamdouh Shoukri also spoke out against the climate at York when he addressed the university's senate on Feb. 26. He said that when students returned to school following a 12-week strike by teaching assistants and contract teachers, they were faced with "disruption, hostility and even intimidation from their fellow students.

"This state of affairs is unacceptable to me, and it should be unacceptable to you. Intimidation, bullying, and discrimination will not be tolerated here, and we are taking action to protect the rights and the safety of all students and staff," Shoukri said.

Although York hasn't finished investigating the Feb. 11 incident, the administration has issued proposed sanctions to student groups involved in a rally and counter-rally in York's Vari Hall rotunda on Feb. 12 for using sound amplification devices that disrupted classes.

Hasbara and Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) were sent letters of intent stating that they will each receive a 30-day suspension and fines totalling $1,250 for the Feb. 12 rallies. The sanctions against Hillel would be a 15-day suspension and fines totalling $650.

Tiffin said he is waiting to finalize the penalties after hearing from all the groups this week.

"To take action against rally participants and not against members of a mob who deliberately threatened Jewish students reflects York's lack of credibility," Yablonsky said in the statement.

Kochman referred to a number of anti-Semitic incidents by "racist thugs" who voice "the most vile expressions of race hatred. They can enjoy no conceivable protection of academic discourse. They are expressly intended to silence debate, to shut down discussion, to intimidate those who disagree. And they are becoming shockingly frequent on Canadian campuses."

For example, he said, posters at the University of Manitoba "have ranged from offensive to blatantly racist," and they include "the same type of anti-Semitic caricatures that you would see in the 1930s Nazi Germany."

The posters include images such as an Israeli fighter jet dropping missiles on a baby carriage, and a hook-nosed, bearded Jewish man pointing a rocket at a Palestinian defending himself with a slingshot.

Ferman said York students wearing items that identify them as Jewish, such as a kippah or a Star of David necklace, have had anti-Semitic slurs directed at them while walking to class.

"We need people urging the administrations on campus to uphold their own codes of conduct, to start protecting these students," Kochman said.

"Enough is enough. Our students are calling out for further help and they're doing the best they can and we're doing the best we can, but we need more support."

Jewish Students unite to fight intimidation and harassment

Students refuse to be bullied; say enough is enough

By Howard English and Sally Szuster

Jewish students from across the GTA including York University, University of Toronto and Ryerson University have come together in a show of solidarity to counter Israel Apartheid Week and other intimidating events on their campuses.

Israel Apartheid Week (IAW) is an initiative by opponents of Israel on campuses around the world that accuses Israel of practicing apartheid. The video trailer for this year's edition of IAW claims the event is taking place "in the wake of the brutal military assault on Gaza" and that "the latest massacres further confirm the reality of Israeli apartheid." It goes on to demand that Israel "end the occupation and the colonization of all Arab lands."

Jewish students from several organizations, such as Hillel of Greater Toronto, financially supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Hasbara Fellowships, the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism and Zionists at U of T, have mounted a proactive campaign against IAW that involves a workshop for students, empowering them to deal with IAW allegations and special guest speakers, such as David Makovsky, a senior fellow and director of The Washington Institute's Project on the Middle East Peace Process. Students will be at information tables with materials that urge an end to intimidation on campus and highlight Israel as a democratic and peaceful country. There's also a hard hitting on line campaign at www.peaceoncampus.ca.

"The campus community will be exposed to the truth about Israel, its democratic values and its consistent efforts to achieve peace," said Orna Hollander, president of the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism.

Israel Apartheid Week follows a wave of incidents at York University, which involved threats, intimidation, anti-Semitic slurs against Jewish students and the barricading of Hillel's lounge at York by an anti-Israel mob.

"Students are saying enough is enough. This is no longer just an issue of Israel advocacy. This is about every student's right to pursue their education free of fear and intimidation. All students, not just Jewish students, are fed up with the toxic environment on their campuses, aggravated by Israel Apartheid Week and fed by a small group of students trying to forward their own hate-inspired agenda," said Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel@York.

The hostility toward Jewish students at York has generated a large degree of Jewish community concern and anger. Dozens of community members have written to York president Mamdouh Shoukri after receiving an e-mail from UJA Federation about the situation.

"The community outpouring about this issue has been extraordinary. It is a loud and clear message to students that we, as a community, stand with them every step of the way," said UJA Federation chair David Koschitzky.

UJA Federation, CIJA (Canadian Council of Israel & Jewish Advocacy), UOC (University Outreach Committee), Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and their student partners have been mobilizing the community, discussing the situation with political representatives and university donors, examining ways to improve student security and consulting with police.

"As campus leaders and activists, what we accomplish by working together will also shape the future of our community," said Ferman.

Globe column repeats myths about Iran's intentions

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In "Iran: the enemy that almost isn't," (Globe and Mail, Feb. 21) Doug Saunders argued that Tehran could well return to its halcyon days under former president and "pro-Western reformist" Mohammed Khatami, who is again a candidate for president of Iran.

Saunders claims that in the spring of 2003, Khatami sent a Swiss official to Washington with a "peace offer": "In exchange for recognizing Israel, cutting off Hamas and proving it had abolished any nuclear weapons plans, Iran wanted an end to sanctions, normal diplomatic relations with the U.S. and recognition of its role in the region."

Saunders insisted that the deal was rejected by the Bush administration, because "nobody in the White House thought it would look good to make peace with Iran, a country that only the year before had been made a rhetorical component in Mr. Bush's 'axis of evil.'"

In the end, Saunders wrote, "the offer was stuck in a drawer. That diplomatic snub was one of several humiliations, diplomatic and economic, that led to the defeat of Mr. Khatami's reformists in subsequent elections and the victory of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's neo-conservative [sic] zealots."

If all this sounds too good to be true, that might be because it almost certainly isn't true.

In "The Guldimann Memorandum: The Iranian 'road map' wasn't a road map and wasn't Iranian" (Weekly Standard, Oct. 22, 2007), Michael Rubin, a former Pentagon advisor on Iran and Iraq, debunked this alleged Iranian peace offer.

The fallacy gained traction, Rubin wrote, when Peter Galbraith, a former American ambassador to Croatia, wrote in the Oct. 11, 2007, New York Review of Books that the Bush administration had refused an Iranian offer to settle all outstanding disputes.

Rubin wrote: "The problem is that [Galbraith's] argument is rooted in a fraud. The 'Iranian Road Map'… was not an Iranian overture but the work of a disgruntled Swiss diplomat, Tim Guldimann."

According to Rubin, "Guldimann developed the one-page 'road map' in conversation with Sadeq Kharrazi, the Iranian ambassador in Paris."

Guldimann, then the Swiss ambassador to Tehran, was not "sent" to the United States. Rather, he sent his proposal by fax to American officials, who could not reconcile this missive with what they were hearing from their own Iranian contacts. But in any event, only the word of Iran's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, matters, and there's no evidence he approved of any such proposal.

Rubin concluded: "There was no Iranian offer in May 2003, but rather a Hail Mary pass thrown by an activist ambassador and pitched by limelight-seeking former officials to a receptive press. Almost seven years into the Bush administration, Tehran has yet to offer a single confidence-building measure."

Even proponents of negotiating with Iran, most notably former (2001-05) deputy secretary of state Richard Armitage, acknowledged that the offer was a myth.

Saunders went on in his piece to dismiss claims that Iran is close to developing nuclear weapons. Among his arguments, he cited as proof "[o]ur most authoritative source of information about Iran's nuclear program… the 2007 U.S. National Intelligence Estimate [NIE], which stated categorically, based on voluminous sources, that Iran had abandoned its nuclear-weapons program in 2003."

However, the 2007 NIE report was neither authoritative nor was this statement made "categorically." In fact, the NIE asserted only with "high confidence," not as an established fact, that Iran had desisted from its weapons program in 2003. The report immediately added that Iran was "at a minimum" keeping open "the option" to develop nuclear weapons, something Tehran has been pursuing with its nuclear fuel enrichment program – in violation of International Atomic Energy Agency directives, leading to UN sanctions.

In 2008, Mike McConnell, the director of U.S. national intelligence in charge of the NIE report, admitted before a Senate committee to careless wording in the report about Iran's nuclear weapons aim.

Moreover, many other intelligence sources, including European ones, claim Tehran is currently pressing ahead with its quest for nuclear weapons.

For whatever reason, Saunders ignored these developments.

He concluded his piece with a glib misinterpretation of quantum theory – saying that "simply by looking at Iran as a threat, we've made it one" and that if we look at it differently, we'll likely find something else entirely. Reality, in Saunders view, is what we choose to see, not what's actually there.

What nonsense.

Enjoy the Purim show...help children at risk

Compiled by CJN Staff

In a unique partnership, Beth Tzedec Congregation and Jewish Family & Child have teamed up to present this year's original Purim musical and celebration at the synagogue.

Proceeds of The Las Vegas Megillah: What Happens in Shushan Stays in Shushan will support children at risk in the Greater Toronto Area Jewish community who have been abused or marginalized because of their economic circumstances.

Created by Cantor Simon Spiro, a British pop singer, and his wife Aliza, an American singer/songwriter, the show is complete with a full professional orchestra, state-of-the-art sound and lights, glittering sets, jugglers, acrobats and the king's horse.

The Las Vegas Megillah will also feature a king who looks like Elvis, an evil man named Hamanilow, and showgirls of all shapes and sizes.

The 60 actors and 30 behind-the-scenes workers, all Beth Tzedec members or employees, range in age from five to 75 and include two mother/daughter duos, one mother/son duo, one set of twin sisters, nine husband/wife teams, four entire families, four rabbis, two rebbetzins, and synagogue staff and their spouses and children.

Aliza Spiro said they are raising money and raising awareness of JF&C because new financial challenges have arisen as the result of a funding crisis facing the agency and other Ontario children's aid societies, as well as the growing needs of the community being served.

In the lobby before the show, audience members can learn about the organization they are helping to support, she said.

"It is a tough time for them, and by piggybacking on this production, everyone coming will be exposed to the agency and its good work."

There will be four performances of The Las Vegas Megillah – March 7, 8 p.m.; March 8, 2 and 7 p.m.; and March 9 after the Megillah reading, approximately 8 p.m. Tickets are $10 for adults, $2 for children 13 and under. Call 416-781-3514, ext. 218.

The benefit of feeling happy for others

Life Coach Corner
Judy Siblin-Librach

In thinking about what bliss is and what it isn't, and seeing people at their best and not at their best, I have come to realize that there is a state of mind that stands in the way of people feeling happy and "in their bliss."

That state is one of jealousy and envy. In the Bible and in Shakespeare's plays, there are many accounts of people who suffer from jealousy, which is not only one of the worst emotions, it's also an emotion that poisons and destroys lives.

Look at Cain and Abel. When God clearly favoured Abel, Cain, driven by jealousy, killed his brother and was forced into a life of misery and despair. We only have to look to the Torah and to Jewish writings to know that jealousy is always destructive, even more to the person who is jealous than to the person he/she is jealous of.

According to William Penn in Some Fruits of Solitude, "The jealous are troublesome to others, but a torment to themselves." In the Book of Proverbs, it states, "Jealousy in the heart makes the bones rot."

What is jealousy? According to Webster's Dictionary, the word "jealous" means "resentful and envious, as of someone's success, achievements and advantages."

Jealousy is when a person feels resentment that someone else has something they think they rightfully deserve. Another definition of jealousy is when someone wants something that belongs to someone else.

In the Bible, God forbids us to be jealous. The reason it is forbidden is that everything we have in this world comes from God, and as it states in Mirrors of Our Lives, "God gives each person what he needs to maximize his potential."

Jealousy is accompanied by a wish that another person should not have the accomplishment or achievement at all. The jealous person becomes so focused on what someone else has that he/she never develops the ability to figure out what he/she does indeed have. Also, living with a constant state of jealousy creates anger, rage, depression and destructive, unethical behaviour.

How do you know when someone is envious of your success? If silence is the response to the particular success you are experiencing, or if there is a negative energy that you can feel in the room and it doesn't make anyone feel good, someone envies your success. The jealous person finds it difficult to be happy for you. There is no space for generosity and joy, because he/she is so consumed by the flames of their jealousy that he/she can't see and be happy for your good news, as it only illuminates what he/she doesn't have.

I love what Oprah says about the writer and activist Maya Angelou, that when Angelou receives an award, she always feels as if it's happening to her, too. That's exactly what we all want to strive for.

Remember, when we hear about someone else's success, it should make us feel good, too, because we really are all connected to one another and someone else's success becomes ours as well.

Jealousy is really a fear that you don't have value, that you don't have enough. "Envy is the art of counting the other fellow's blessings instead of your own," says author Harold Coffin. The irony is that by counting the other person's blessings, you miss the very thing you should be focusing on, which is appreciating and building on what you have that is unique, original and special. What are your strengths? What distinguishes you from everyone else? Those are the areas that should become your starting point.

The topic of jealousy is a hot potato. It makes people squirm and feel uncomfortable, because we have all experienced a modicum of envy, which can be very natural. If you see someone swim well, you are motivated to improve your stroke. When you hear that someone has just run a marathon, you might even think to yourself, what a lofty goal, maybe I'll start running. That's healthy and creates positive energy, motivation and forward motion. So where does it get uncomfortable? It becomes uncomfortable when jealousy stands in the way of your happiness and interferes with your relationships. Jealousy keeps you stuck, and as a coach, my mission is always to get people to move forward.

If you are faced with a jealous person in your life, remember never to stoop to his/her level, ignore the behaviour and fight back with goodness, love and kindness. Learn to be happy for others, because when we are happy for others, we are always happier ourselves.

Dance troupe helps those with developmental delays

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Helen Winkler, leader of Move'n'Mingle, an international folk dance program for adults and teens with developmental delays, gets as much out of the program as her students.

Adults and teens with developmental delays kick up their heels at their weekly dance program, Move'n'Mingle.

"It is so rewarding for me to take my hobby, and see the positive effect it has on people," she says.

Held at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, the program is co-sponsored by the BJCC, Reena and Yachad, an organization that brings together young adults with developmental disabilities and their peers.

Winkler has been involved with international folk dance for 30 years and has taught international and Israeli folk dancing for the past 27 years.

With a strong interest in the dances of Jews of eastern Europe, she maintains a website – www.yiddishdance.com – dedicated to the revitalization of these arts.

She is a member of the Performing Arts Educators of Canada's international folk dance division, she's on the steering committee of the Ontario Folk Dance Association, and she's a member of the Yiddish Dance Action Network.

Winkler, whose 21-year-old daughter has Down syndrome and dances in the troupe – members range in age from high school students to people in their mid-60s – said that for the purpose of the program, she simplifies the movements and slows down the music.

"I extract from the dances what I think will work well."

She said that some dancers come with helpers, and a couple come in wheelchairs.

Members enjoy both the dancing and the socializing, Winkler said. "It helps their self-esteem when they get out and learn a new skill and make some new friends."

She said the troupe has performed at Reena and at last summer's Kinus Conference, and she would like to schedule further performances. "The dancers feel good when they see the response they get."

The next program, which is set to begin March 19, is open to new members. For information, call Teme Kernerman at 416-636-1880.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

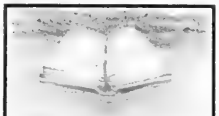
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

A happy holiday's sad lesson

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN



Rabbinic Reflections

Purim is a time of gaiety and rejoicing. We read the Megillah, sound the graggers and enjoy hamantashen. But Purim also sounds a note of sadness, because it reminds us of the perennial problem of anti-Semitism, as exemplified by the cruel Haman. In the Midrash, a certain Rabbi Levi comments: "Woe unto the wicked, who are constantly forming evil designs against Israel, each one saying, 'My plan is better than yours.'"

Here, Rabbi Levi implies that one of the tragic side effects of human progress is the fact that it appears to bring with it a continual perfection of the means of destruction of our people. He observes that Haman believed that Pharoah was foolish. He only ordered that Jewish males should be destroyed. He did not realize or take into account that the females would marry and bear children. Haman would not make the same mistake. He would order the destruction of all Jews, male and female, young and old.

How true is Rabbi Levi's observation. There was a time Jews suffered from oppression and from occasional pogroms whenever mobs were incited against them. But then there arose a new anti-Semitism that declared the past anti-Semitism foolish and unsystematic. This anti-Semitism decreed a "final solution" for the Jewish problem. Six million of our people were destroyed and the lives of hundreds of thousands more were crippled.

Now, we are experiencing a new form of anti-Semitism. It seems to be, in general, unacceptable to disparage individual Jews or Jews in general. But it clearly is acceptable, in a number of circles, not to criticize the actions of the Israeli government, but to viciously attack the State of Israel and question if not deny its right to exist.

If one listens, as I do, to certain radio stations, one can hear remarks, from time to time, that paint Israel in the most outrageous terms, even hinting that Israel is a rogue, illegitimate state. Yet, one hears nary a word concerning Sudan, Myanmar, or North Korea and their repressive, dictatorial regimes from these same sources. Why is this the case? Among the reasons for this would be that such incendiary remarks represent anti-Semitism in its latest and most modern form. It's true that one can still hear the older, direct attacks on the Jews in some quarters. But this is unacceptable among those radio reporters to whom I refer. For them, it seems, to directly attack the Jewish people is outside the boundaries of public discourse. Attacking the Jewish state is not.

Rabbi Levi's midrash concludes with these words from the Prophets: "Then shall the Lord go forth and fight... and the Lord shall be King over all the earth."

Somehow, says Rabbi Levi, the tyrants never seem to learn from the experiences of their predecessors. Pharoah tried to destroy our people, but he and his army were drowned. Haman had already persuaded the King of Persia to order the destruction of the Jewish people. The date was set and all the necessary preparations were made. But what was the result? "They hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai." And what of the Jews of Shushan? "Layehudim hayta orah vesimchah, vesason viykar" – "The Jews had light and gladness, joy and honour."

We need to believe and have faith that just as tyrants throughout history sought to destroy us and could not, so will this latest tyranny against the existence of the Jewish state also come to naught and we shall proudly declare: Am Yisrael chai – despite all the machinations against us, the people of Israel in all corners of the earth, live.

Rabbi Mark Friedman is rabbi of the Castel Royale Senior Residence in Cote St. Luc, Quebec.

Modern warfare is messy, unfortunately

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Fought over the course of only three days in 1863 (July 1 to 3), the Battle of Gettysburg had the largest amount of casualties in the American Civil War. The death toll on both sides was just under 8,000, with another 27,000 seriously wounded and 11,000 captured or missing – all of this in less than 72 hours.

As sobering as those statistics may be, what is perhaps more noteworthy is one other fact. Jennie Wade was 20 years old and engaged to be married when the Battle of Gettysburg commenced. At 8 a.m. on July 3, while kneading dough in her kitchen, a stray Confederate musket ball ricocheted off of two doors in her house and lodged beneath her shoulder blade. She died instantly, the only civilian death from Gettysburg. Her demise was considered a deep tragedy and was mourned on both sides. Her body was carried out by Union soldiers, and she was buried in a coffin fashioned by Confederate soldiers.

How much the rules of warfare have changed can be easily discerned when one turns to recent events in Gaza. Detractors fiercely criticize Israel for the number of children killed over the course of three weeks, and defenders of Israel not only point out that the country was long overdue in responding to Hamas rocket fire, but that Hamas fighters were deliberately embedded among the civilian populace, thus guaranteeing the deaths of innocents.

Whatever one's politics, it has become clear to everyone that the strictly enforced battle lines of wars past are – literally – history, and that to engage in military conflict today means to recognize that, for a whole variety of reasons too lengthy to rehearse here, civilians will die.

Israel gets preached to from all ends of the spectrum. Those on the right will sanctimoniously bemoan what they see as the Israeli government's reticence in "not finishing the job" – destroying Hamas completely, regardless of the civilian cost. The self-righteous consciences on the left will remind Israel about proportionality, as though Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Hamas leader Khaled Meshal could be likened to Robert E. Lee, and that the genteel codes that governed the reaction to Jenny Wade's death are telecast daily on Al-Jazeera.

Often, the pragmatic solution is the one least satisfying to all sides of the ideological divide. But one must be wary of the alternative, the reversion to "purer" and less-compromised attitudes.

One such ideal was expressed in its quintessential form by Gandhi, who wrote to Martin Buber that rather than counter the Nazis through violent means, the Jews should have practised satayagraha (soul-force), a version of non-violent resistance, even if would mean every last Jew were to be massacred. Gandhi's position was idealistic and consistent. It would make the champions of international law very happy. But had it been followed, none of us in the Jewish community would be alive today to discuss its benefits.

On the other hand, if one advocates for the other purity, one must be prepared, given how Hamas almost seems to relish its own civilian casualties, for the carnage of tens of thousands of dead children.

Sometimes the world is as it is rather than how we would like it to be, and perhaps, for the moment, that may be as good as it gets.

Evils of religious fanaticism

Abraham's Curse: The Roots of Violence in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, by Bruce Chilton, Doubleday.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The biblical account of the Aqedah is familiar. Abraham is about to sacrifice his son Isaac when at the last moment, an angel stops him, telling Abraham that he has passed his test of faith and doesn't need to actually slit the boy's throat.

In all three of the Abrahamic religions, the moral of the story is that God rejects human sacrifice. However, the author of this disturbing book, a professor of religion and the rector of an Anglican church, attempts to show how all three religions have managed, at one time or another, to twist or ignore the story and to interpret it, not as a condemnation of martyrdom, but as a glorification of it.

History and the daily headlines show that militant religion and violence seem to go together, from Islamic suicide bombings and graphic glorifications of the crucifixions of Jesus to the indefensible actions of Israeli extremists.

Chilton shows the terrible "blood harvest" that leads from the Crusaders to pogroms against Jews to the European wars between Catholics and Protestants, right down to our own time. He concludes that the "impulse to praise martyrdom and therefore to encourage adolescents to become martyrs is embedded in the cultural DNA of the West."

However, after his depiction of the evils that flow from religious fanaticism, the author, in the final portion of his book, castigates the recent exponents of atheism. He advises his readers that the "more closely the three religions relate to one another in their mutual challenge to realize the blessing of Abraham, the more quickly that interpretive and ethical key will turn in the lock of Abraham's curse."

Verdict: A scholarly, often tedious mélange of theology and history around a dubious theory.

Living Without God, by Ronald Aronson, Counterpoint Publishing.

The author of this humanist approach to reality is the grandson of Jewish immigrants and a professor of the history of ideas at Wayne Sate University in Detroit.

A longtime socialist, he takes as his starting point Immanuel Kant's three questions – "What can I know? What should I do? What may I hope?" Above all, Aronson is eager to make us think. He writes, "Instead of lending our power to a being above us and then asking for it to be lent back to us, we may be able to feel our power as drawn from and connected to, all that we depend on."

This interconnectedness makes it imperative that we assume responsibility for the nature of our society. For example, he writes that the coming to power of Hitler and the unspeakable horrors of the Holocaust "required the active or passive consent of tens of millions. Many of the accomplices may have done very little or even nothing. Some only averted their eyes. But each did "exactly what was needed" for the triumph of evil.

Aronson asks and strives to answer questions such as these: "Without God, how do we experience gratitude for life's gifts? How do we confront aging and death? How do we make sense of an often insane and inexplicable society?"

It is refreshing that he is less interested in attacking religion than in offering an alternative to those "who manage to live fundamentally secular lives and who search for meaning and truth."

For the most part, his approach is humane, modest and irrepressibly hopeful. He points out that the most unequal and insecure of advanced societies, the United States, is also the one that has the greatest presence and intensity of belief in heaven above and in a transcendent force managing human lives.

Verdict: A well-meaning, readable humanist approach to the modern situation that offers few answers to the old, baffling questions that religion poses.

Purim around the world

BY MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"King Achashverosh was Finnish with his disobedient wife Vashti. 'You Congo now!' he ordered her. After she had Ghana way, the king's messengers went Roman the land to find a new queen. And India end, the beautiful Esther won the crown."

Think you know everything about Purim? Think again. As Judaism's happiest day of the year, we are familiar with the graggers, the masquerades and the hamantashen. But how about holiday snowmen, human-shaped cakes and crying cacti? These are just some of the Purim traditions from around the world.

In Cairo, revellers would take to the streets in costume, riding donkeys that were dyed in stripes and patterns. Lithuania would see yeshiva students get the opportunity to dress up as rabbis, deliver outrageous speeches and gently mock their teachers. In Minsk, they were ingenious with their noisemakers: "a hammer was fixed to an anvil, to strike at every mention of Haman. A large stone rigged to ropes, was released with a loud thud… A tinsmith and his two sons made a noisemaker with tin balls rolling from chamber to chamber, jingling and jangling." [tinyurl.com/purim09]

How many ways can you think of to let Haman have it? In Afghanistan, they stomped on Haman cutouts, and in Yemen, they dragged a Haman scarecrow through the streets. [tinyurl.com/purim13] In wintry Bukhara, a large "snow-Haman" was built near the synagogue. After the meal, a bonfire was built and everyone gathered to sing while "Haman" melted. [tinyurl.com/purim11]

Over in Germany on Purim eve, torches containing gunpowder would be ignited. During the Megillah reading, the gunpowder exploded with a deafening noise. In Italy, youngsters would divide into two camps and throw nuts at each other. And how about that Salonikan tradition? "Haman-shaped" cakes were baked and placed on the window ledges until the festive Purim meal. During the meal, the cakes were sliced and eaten.

What would a tour of Purim around the world be without a look at the traditions of the country where it all began, Persia? "Esther and Mordechai existed in the conscious and subconscious during the whole year," said Rabbi David Shofet of Santa Monica's Nessah Israel Congregation. Iranian Jews would often make the trek to pray at the tombs of Esther and Mordechai. "It was the Jewish place to go and ask and pray and cry, especially when it was difficult to go to Israel and the Kotel HaMaaravi," the Western Wall. As for other traditions, Rabbi Shofet remembers effigies of Haman being hanged and burned in backyards and mounds of halvah in the mishloach manot. [tinyurl.com/purim04]

Make sure to download the marvellous booklet, Purim Traditions from the Lands of the Galuyot. It has yet more traditions, including from Yemen where "they would find a cactus with many branches, spread them like heads in a row and call them 'the 10 sons of Haman.'" They would then bury them in a "grave" or throw darts at them "so that they would leak the milky juice from inside. They would say that these were the tears of Haman begging for forgiveness, but he didn't deserve it." In Morocco, they would bake challah with hard-boiled eggs inside. When they sliced and ate the challah, they would say they were tearing out the eyes of Haman. Ouch! [tinyurl.com/purim02]

And then there is The World Famous Story of Purim. Rather than try to explain this piece of work, I'll leave it to you to wade through it. Here's how the story ends… as if you didn't know. (Best to read it aloud.) [tinyurl.com/purim07]

"Haman and his 10 sons were hanged and went immediately to the Netherlands. And to Sweden the deal, the Jews were allowed to Polish off the rest of their foes as well. 'You lost your enemies and Uganda friend,' the king smiled. And that is why the Purim story Israeli a miracle. God decided to China light on His chosen people. So now, let's celebrate! Forget all your Syria's business and just be happy! Serb up some wine and Taiwan on!"

Happy Purim!!!

Woman donates hair to kids who've lost theirs

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Floralove Katz's four-line e-mail signature is a concise summary of her eclectic accomplishments: "Senior policy adviser, government of Canada; Licensed wedding officiant, province of Ontario; Band leader, artistic director, the Ottawa Klezmer Band; Professional mediator, conflict resolution."

Add to that "volunteer extraordinaire" and you have a picture of a woman whose boundless enthusiasm and mammoth talents have enriched her adopted city of Ottawa in a variety of ways.

Katz's latest mitzvah is the donation of her hair to Locks of Love, a non-profit organization that provides hairpieces to financially disadvantaged children in Canada and the United States who have lost their hair for medical reasons.

"I first learned about Locks of Love in a TV news story about four years ago. A young girl in elementary school was deeply moved by the story of another little girl elsewhere in the United States who had suffered from alopecia [a disease that causes baldness]," Katz said.

"The story featured the first little girl determining to grow her hair long enough [10 inches, tip to tip] to convert into a wig for the little bald girl. Eventually she did, and the short news piece showed her going to the hair salon with her mom and the deft young wig-maker who donated his time and talent for the new wig, and eventually, the two smiling little girls meeting – with their mothers – both sporting the same hairstyle, and the same hair colour, of course."

Katz said that she "was so moved by that act of selflessness and goodwill and the happiness it generated in so many people and the potential for further goodwill, I resolved to do the same and started growing my hair long from then on."

On a lighter note, Katz regularly donates her musical talents as both a vocalist and cellist. She's a soprano with the Opera Lyra Ottawa chorus who served for 10 years as lay cantor at Ottawa's Temple Israel, and she performs regularly with her own 25-year-old Ottawa Klezmer Band. The band has played across Canada and in the United States.

Active in the Jewish community and on behalf of Israel, Katz has used her musical talent to promote peace and understanding. In one such project, she brought together more than 100 musicians, poets, artists, and parliamentarians of all parties on one stage for a concert titled "Suicide Bombing is an Act of Genocide Against All of Humanity."

Ballerinas are rehearsing in Tel Aviv.

Chefs are preparing dinner in Jerusalem.

Visitors are strolling the gardens of Haifa.

Musicians are preparing for a concert in ancient Beit She'an.

Archeologists are digging on Masada.

TODAY in ISRAEL

Children are playing, people are smiling, and visitors from around the world are enjoying the restaurants, the hotels, the ancient sites, and the endless wonders of today's Israel. In other words – today is another beautiful day in Israel, where everyone always has a warm and friendly "Shalom" for you. Today is a perfect day for you to plan your trip to Israel.

Jews must reject Turkey's genocide denial

By NORMAN L. EPSTEIN

Guest Voice

"Dogs can enter, but no Jews, no Armenians" read the odious sign that encapsulates the pernicious anti-Semitism percolating in Turkey – all in response to Israel's recent incursion in Gaza. Turkish Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan has been leading the charge, foaming at the mouth with his repeated rantings and accusations against Israel of "mass murder" and "massacring innocent civilians." Turkish media outlets have further fomented anti-Israel and anti-Jewish sentiment with similar hyperbole. Mass rallies all over Turkey, some of the largest worldwide, have deteriorated into vile anti-Semitic spectacles.

The height of hypocrisy is self-evident in Turkey's own highly suspect human rights record. Moreover, its own campaign against Kurdish separatists in northern Iraq has caused thousands of innocent civilian deaths over the years, with little effort to avoid mass casualties.

Israel has carved out a close strategic alliance with Turkey recently, the only genuine one it has with a country in the Muslim world. It was born out of necessity, and Turkey has served as a mediator in peace talks, particularly with Syria, in exchange for advancing Turkey's military know-how and technology.

In light of recent events, there has been much reflection in Israel on the make-up and tenor of this expedient alliance. I am not going to debate the merits of the relationship. However, there is a very unsettling element to it. This partnership is predicated on pro-Israel groups in the United States working in concert with pro-Turkey groups to prevent the U.S. Congress from passing a resolution (which has passed in Canada) recognizing the genocide of the Armenians by Turkish nationalists at the beginning of the 20th century. This denial by Turkey exists despite compelling and irrefutable evidence.

During the waning years of the Ottoman Empire, a group of army officers overthrew the sultan in 1908. Turkish nationalism began to flourish, and the Armenians, a significant Christian minority, began to assert their own cultural identity and push for regional autonomy. The Turkish leadership resented the Armenians' resistance to assimilation, and plans were made to exterminate the Armenian population.

It started on April 24, 1915, when Armenian leaders were summarily executed. Men of military age were forced into labour camps, and those who survived starvation and illness were shot in mass graves. Hangings and mass executions continued on a large scale. Women, children and the elderly were forced to march for weeks without food, with few surviving.

Females of all ages were brutally subjected to torture, rape and murder. Those who survived such atrocities threw themselves off cliffs. In the end, 1.8 million Armenians perished.

Since the inception of modern Turkey in 1922, resolute denial of the Armenian genocide has been intrinsic to Turkish society. It's a crime to speak of the genocide.

A further disturbing aspect of this denial of history is that Adolf Hitler used the Armenian genocide as a template for the Nazis' Final Solution, curtly saying at the time, "Who today remembers the extermination of the Armenians?"

As Jews, we are ever so vigilant and outraged whenever diabolical Holocaust deniers rear their ugly heads and spread poisonous hatred. Therefore, it is an absolute moral imperative that Jewish groups not become a party to Turkey's denial of its crime.

Israel is strong enough to redefine its strategic alliance with Turkey on its own terms. But it is morally unacceptable that a people reborn out of the ashes of the Holocaust be complicit, even reluctantly, in the denial of another genocide. It goes against the very essence of the Jewish soul.

Apartheid week poster banned

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Carleton University and the University of Ottawa have banned one Israeli Apartheid Week poster from their campuses because it included an image that was "inflammatory and capable of inciting confrontation."

The decision, first made by the Carleton administration on Feb. 8, came after the group Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) put up 100 posters throughout the school by political cartoonist Carlos Latuff depicting a helicopter labelled "Israel" firing a missile at a teddy bear-holding toddler labelled "Gaza."

Carleton's equity services ordered that the posters be removed from campus, because they "could incite infringements of the Ontario Human Rights Code," said Carleton spokesperson Lin Moody.

She added that the university did not ban IAW events, but the posters had to be removed because they didn't have the necessary approval to be displayed.

Nearly two weeks later, the University of Ottawa became the second Ottawa-area post-secondary institution to ban the same IAW poster, following Carleton's lead.

U of O issued a statement that said "the administration has the right and the responsibility to ensure that all posters comply with the posting regulations before they are displayed on a bulletin board owned by the university.

"One of the posters in relation to Israeli Apartheid Week was found to be inconsistent with our posting regulations for reasons that included the use of an image that was inflammatory and capable of inciting confrontation."

In the days following the announcement that Carleton would not allow the poster to hang on its walls, Carleton's provost and vice-president academic, Feridun Hamdullahpur, sent a letter to the entire university community calling the posters "hurtful and discriminatory."

He wrote: "Carleton University, regardless of the circumstances, cannot and will not tolerate actions that infringe or contravene the Ontario Human Rights Code and Carleton's own University Human Rights Policy and Procedures."

Hamdullahpur added that if anyone violates the school's policies, they would be subject to sanctions under these rules, and "students can be withdrawn from their studies indefinitely."

Alana Kayfetz, executive director of Hillel Ottawa, commended the schools' response to the situation.

Although Hillel wasn't involved in having the posters removed, Kayfetz said she encouraged Jewish students who complained to her about feeling intimidated to voice their concerns to their school's administration.

"There was an influx of those types of complaints, and I think the administration responded. We commend them, because they responded and they're standing by their guns," she said.

"I think the issue at Carleton originally was that they had printed 100 posters, so you couldn't escape it. It was everywhere."

U of O has approved a different IAW poster, which Kayfetz said students are still complaining that it is offensive.

"They are propaganda posters… It's blue and it has all [IAW event] information. At the bottom of it there is a cartoon image of the 'apartheid wall' with a mother on one side crying and a baby on the other side crying."

There was a similar issue last year at McMaster University when a student group hung a banner in the school's student centre that used the slogan "Israeli Apartheid" and depicted a soldier-like figure pushing a small child.

McMaster spokesperson Andrea Farquhar said that this year, school officials have not seen any IAW posters.

"We certainly don't take a position to say that they aren't going to be allowed. All posters that go up have to be approved individually. But there aren't any that I've seen at the moment. It seems to be something that is more of an issue at other campuses," Farquhar said.

In response to the Ottawa universities' decisions to ban the IAW poster, the Ontario Public Interest Research Group at Carleton staged rallies at Carleton and U of O last week in support of SAIA and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, student groups that organize IAW events.

According to the OPIRG-Carleton website, the purpose of the rallies was to call on the schools to clarify why the posters were banned and students were invited to "symbolically cover their mouths" as if they were being silenced. Students were also encouraged to deliver letters from unions and organizations to the administrations after marching to the presidents' offices.

Historian returns to Queen's as principal

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For historian Daniel Robert Woolf, it's nothing less than a homecoming.

Woolf, a 1980 graduate of Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., was recently appointed its new principal and vice-chancellor, succeeding Tom Williams.

"I most certainly regard [the appointment] as going back to my academic home," he said in a recent interview.

Born in London, England, in 1958 and raised in Winnipeg, he officially takes office on Sept. 1 for a five-year term. But in fact, he will return to Queen's on July 1 as a tenured professor in the department of history, juggling administrative duties with teaching.

Daniel Robert Woolf

"I doubt I will be doing any formal course instruction," said Woolf, who is currently dean of the faculty of arts and a professor in the department of history and classics at the University of Alberta in Edmonton.

"The demands of administrators are pretty intensive," he added. "I will carry on with graduate supervision, and I don't rule out casual lecturing here and there."

Woolf, a specialist in early modern British cultural history and historical thought, is drawn to administration and teaching.

"I find them both satisfactory," he explained. "With teaching, I still hear from students I have taught over the past 25 years. The notion that I made a difference to these young people in career choice or personal development is, to me, the single most rewarding feature of being an academic.

"With administration, I have less direct student contact, but there is the opportunity to put ideas into practice, to encourage others in their teaching and research, and, now and then, to be able to fix things that always bugged me as a student or professor. Then there is the chance to be an advocate for higher education on a national stage."

Woolf's career has taken him far and wide.

After graduating from Queen's and Oxford University (with a DPhil in modern history), he returned to Queen's as a postdoctoral fellow and teacher.

Subsequently, he was a professor at Bishop's University and Dalhousie University, where he also served as associate dean and acting dean of graduate studies.

In 1999, he joined McMaster University as dean of the faculty of humanities and a member of its history department.

The University of Alberta hired him as its dean of arts in 2002, and he was reappointed in 2007.

In announcing Woolf's most recent appointment at Queen's, the chair of its board of trustees, William Young, described him as "a noted scholar with significant leadership and management credentials that will serve the university well."

Asked what his primary tasks in Kingston will be, Woolf replied, "The most obvious one is that Queen's, like other post-secondary institutions, faces many financial issues, from inadequate operating grants to crumbling infrastructure. Queen's has embarked on a bold, but necessary, capital program, and it will be imperative that I connect early and frequently with all three levels of government and with donors and industry."

Woolf also wants to reconnect with his alma mater by making himself visible on campus.

"I want to make sure that the students feel heard, as I detect on their part a feeling that at times in the past they have not been heard. That's also important to me on another level, since one of my three kids is currently a student at Queen's. In the longer term, I'm especially interested in seeing what can be done to bring research and teaching into a closer relationship."

Despite the demands of his latest job, Woolf is working on two projects. He is the general editor of The Oxford History of Historical Writing, and he's finishing a textbook on historiography for Cambridge University Press.

Woolf said he studied history because the past fascinates him and because he has a knack for dates. His uncle, a historian, greatly influenced him.

Woolf's parents are both retired. His father was an ear, nose and throat surgeon, while his mother was an English professor.

"We immigrated to Canada because consulting physician positions were tough to get in Britain. My mum was evacuated to Canada [during World War II] and had positive memories."

Actively involved in Edmonton's Jewish community, he sits on the membership committee of Temple Beth Ora. In Hamilton, he was a member of the board of governors of Beth Jacob Synagogue, and in Halifax, he was a trustee at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

"Being Jewish has been an important part of my identity for a long time," he said.

99-year-old helps archive photos by memory

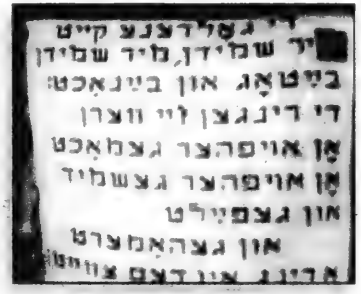
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mel Cederbaum, director of Toronto Workman's Circle, is in the process of archiving the 100-year-old organization's pictures and documents with the help of someone who's been there almost since the beginning: 99-year-old Molly Haar.

In preparation for an upcoming get-together – Oct. 17 and 18 – of Workman's Circle's Camp Yungvelt campers, former Peretz school students, Workman's Circle members, and anyone else interested in celebrating the organization's 100th anniversary, Cederbaum is preparing a historical display, assisted by Haar, who is identifying photographs.

"Molly worked at camp and at the shule [Yiddish school], and she has an extraordinary memory. Not only does she remember everyone, she can relate stories about them that we can't repeat here."

Born in New York City in June 1909, Haar, who moved here as a child, is still a U.S. citizen. She said that Yiddish was her second language, which she spoke with her husband, Moshe, a Yiddish and history teacher who died in 1966.



Molly Haar, 99, designs and stitches Yiddish pillows

Haar, who has no children, said she has never remarried because her husband, whom she met in Detroit and was married to for 26 years – she returned to Toronto in the mid-1970s – was "too good a husband. He was handsome and intellectual, and he knew about everything, from baseball to theatre. Forty years later, I still miss him."

She has a box of Yiddish letters from her husband, she said, that he wrote when he was drafted in 1943. "What other soldier wrote his wife in Yiddish?"

Describing herself as a "perfectly ordinary woman," Haar, who was dressed in a red sweater and matching scarf and had red, manicured nails, said, "I don't dress like an old woman. I like tailored things."

She never thinks about her age, she said, adding that "my two best friends are 46 and 70. Maybe that's my secret to staying young.

"I don't go out much, but I did drive until I was 90. I watch the news, shop on the Shopping Channel, do crossword puzzles, and read. I love a good story. I don't have a computer. I get a phone call and I make a phone call. That's all I need."

An avid reader of the Jewish Forward and The Canadian Jewish News, Haar thinks U.S. President Barack Obama "is terrific, but he'll have to be a magician to do what he has to do. He's bright and intelligent, and he's head and heels over that other one."

Her favourite hobby is designing and sewing needlepoint pillows, which she adorns with Yiddish expressions.

"I took up this hobby when my husband died. I must have made at least 100 pillows. He would have been pleased with the Yiddish sayings. This type of thing hasn't been done in years. Workman's Circle wants them for their archival display."

She used to be a good cook, she said, and now she teaches her caregivers to cook such dishes as sweet and sour meatballs. "We also buy gefilte fish, and then we re-season and re-cook it. Scrambled eggs and soup is enough for me now, though. I also like a glass of wine, but only once in a while."

Haar lived with her brother until late last year, when he died suddenly at age 90, and she still lives in her own condominium, where she gets part-time help.

She said she has nothing planned for her 100th birthday, "but I think my friends might be planning something."

Those interested in the Workman's Circle get-together – which Haar said she plans to attend – should contact Cederbaum at 41-787-2081 or wcarto@yahoo.com for more details.

גידי קורן וחברים

לבנימין נתניהו ישנן בעת שתי ברירות די ברורות:

אני כותב את הדברים האלה כשבוע לפני פרסומם. אבל לא עושה לי רושם שנתניהו יסגור על קואליציה ימנית כחודש לפני המועד שהקציב לו הנשיא.

Prossin 'lived and breathed the Jewish people'

'He was an emblem for Israel and the community'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

It's "poetic" that Ben Prossin, 64, died Feb. 20 as the community ushered in the last Shabbat of Shvat, the month in which Israel celebrates the new year for trees, said Rabbi Howard Morrison, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Speaking to the almost 600 people who attended the funeral, held at the synagogue, Rabbi Morrison called Prossin, the executive director of the Jewish National Fund's Toronto region, "a real mensch, a tree of the field."

Born and raised in Glace Bay, N.S., Prossin, a lawyer by training, was involved as a youth in Canadian Young Judaea, was founding director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, served as program director at Young Judaea's Camp Kadimah and was on the executive of such organizations as the Canadian Zionist Federation and United Israel Appeal.

In Toronto, he worked at Canadian Jewish Congress for three years before joining JNF 19 years ago.

Never having married, said Rabbi Morrison, Prossin was in many ways married to the people and to the State of Israel.

"He was an emblem for Israel and the Jewish community in the [Greater Toronto Area.] He lived and breathed the Jewish people."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth, said that one of Prossin's greatest virtues was that he was not impressed with himself. "He didn't see himself as great, but rather, a part of a team."

Ben Prossin

While at CJC, Rabbi Kelman said, Prossin worked on behalf of Soviet Jewry, "and he energized the Jewish community to realize that we all must contribute. He taught us that we must work with other Jews [for the well-being] of the community."

Frank Wilson, past JNF Toronto president and JNF's current national vice-president, said that Prossin was devoted to JNF and its cause, "and all his family should be proud of his legacy.

"The man whom we called Gentle Ben was the consummate fundraiser. He was also our mentor. He always had time for people, and he could defuse an awkward situation with wit and charm. He was loyal to a fault, and [always] open to new ideas."

Lil Jacobson, who has worked for 19 years as Prossin's secretary and office manager, was also a close family friend.

She said that JNF was "his life" and two years ago, when he was in hospital for four months, he was kept apprised about everything at the office. "I was there every day keeping him up [to speed].

"He was a dear person, and I find it very strange that he won't come back to the office. [JNF] will never be the same. There will never be another Ben Prossin."

Prossin's nephew, Andrew Prossin, called his uncle his role model.

"He was a true soldier for many causes, and his lifelong priority was Israel and JNF. He should also be remembered for his thoughtfulness, kindness, sense of humour and mischief."

With the family now far-flung, Andrew Prossin said that this was the first time in 10 years they have all been able to get together at one time. "Uncle Benny did what he did best. He brought people together."

Prossin was brother and sister-in-law to Albert and Andrea Prossin; Rita Aronson; Sylvia and Irving Brown; the late Molly and Donny Mallman and Hy Aronson.

Purim incomplete without hamantashen

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Purim is celebrated in Jewish communities around the world each year on the 14th day of Adar. The festival is based on the story told in the Book of Esther, in which the beautiful and brave Queen Esther and her uncle, Mordechai, save their people from the twisted genocidal plot of the wicked vizier of Persia, Haman.

The order of the day is costumes, giving gifts of food, and historically, a good amount of drinking. The Talmud instructs that one should consume enough alcohol to render one unable to distinguish between "Bless Mordechai" and "Curse Haman."

Part of the Purim atmosphere in Israel is seeing children and adults in costume, walking through the neighbourhood, giving baskets and plates filled with hamantashen and other goodies to family, friends and neighbours. Purim is a major event, with many businesses closed, and even the bus drivers dress in costume.

Although it is traditional to have a Purim seudah, or festive meal, on Purim day, there are no specific traditions regarding the food, as there are on other holidays. Some people serve a long coiled challah or an especially long braided one to symbolize the rope that was used to hang Haman; some serve turkey as a symbol of King Achashverosh, whose kingdom stretched from India (Hodu, or Turkey, in Hebrew) to Ethiopia; and some serve a vegetarian meal such as Esther might have eaten, since she ate only vegetarian dishes in the king's palace to maintain kashrut. Kreplach are also often eaten at the seudah to symbolize Haman's three-cornered hat.

Since no celebration of Purim would be complete without delicious baked goods and other sweets, diets are on hold for most people. But whatever type of menu is served, the one traditional food of Purim is hamantashen.

Here are two very different but delicious hamantashen recipes.

ALMOND HAMANTASHEN

This recipe from Eileen Goltz is more time-consuming than many hamantashen recipes, but the compliments you'll receive will make it worth it!

1/2 cup chopped blanched almond slivers
2 1/2 cups flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1/8 tsp. salt
3/4 cup cold unsalted butter or margarine, cut into small pieces
1/2 cup sugar
1 large egg
1 large egg white
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
1/4 tsp. almond extract
1/8 tsp. very finely grated lemon zest

Filling

7 to 8 oz. marzipan or almond paste (see note)
1 large egg white
1 1/2 tsp. fresh lemon juice
water
1 to 2 drops food colouring (optional)
1 1/2 to 2 tbsp. powdered sugar

To prepare dough, place almonds in a food processor fitted with a steel blade and process until finely ground. Add flour, baking powder and salt. Process in on/off pulses for about 15 seconds longer, or until the ingredients are well blended. Sprinkle the butter over the dry ingredients. Process in on/off pulses until the mixture resembles coarse crumbs. In a small bowl, use a fork to beat together sugar, egg, egg white, lemon juice, almond extract and lemon zest. Add egg mixture to the processor and process for 30 seconds, or until ingredients are incorporated and dough begins to mass around the blade – be careful not to over process.

Turn dough out of the processor and divide in half. Roll out each half to a scant 1/4-in. thick between sheets of parchment paper, being sure to smooth out any creases in the underside of the dough. Stack dough sheets on a large tray or baking sheet and refrigerate for about 15 minutes, or until cold but not stiff.

To prepare filling, combine marzipan, egg white, lemon juice and food colouring (if used) in the food processor. Add 1 teaspoon water and process until the mixture is smooth and well blended. If mixture is still too dry to hold together, add enough additional water (1 to 2 tbsp.) to soften and smooth it.

Susie Fishbein cooks up a storm in Toronto

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

On Jan. 14, more than 250 Toronto women braved the cold to attend a warm and inspiring cooking demonstration co-hosted by Uptown Chabad and Chabad on the Avenue, featuring celebrity chef and cookbook author Susie Fishbein. The audience "ate up" every word as Fishbein shared her secrets on how to make kosher cooking easy and elegant.

The author of six cookbooks in seven years, Fishbein's books have sold more than 350,000 copies worldwide. Her latest book, Kosher by Design Lightens Up (Artscroll), offers "fabulous food for a healthier lifestyle" with 145 brand new recipes and 160 colour photographs by John Uher. A helpful feature is the commentary throughout the book by certified nutritional expert Bonnie Taub-Dix, spokesperson for the American Dietetic Association, who acted as the nutrition consultant for the book.

Kosher by Design Lightens Up is not about deprivation. It's about blending an array of foods of varying colours, flavours and textures with a bouquet of nutrients to please both your palate and your desire to feel good. The book is packed with useful information, delicious options and simple concepts for foods loaded with style and panache. You'll find recipes for unusual dishes such as Rice Cracker Slaw, Japanese Udon Noodle Soup, and Argentinean Bison Steaks, as well as soon-to-be favourites such as Garlic Burgers, Lebanese Salad and Bruschetta Chicken.

The audience was impressed by Fishbein's culinary skills and relaxed approach to entertaining in front of a large audience as she demonstrated a variety of recipes from some of her previous books. The menu included Creamy Chummos with Steeped Tomatoes, Winter White Soup, Salmon Primavera, Steamed Thai Sole Rolls, and Warm Apple & Pear Fruit Beggar's Purse. She also offered terrific tips on simple, yet elegant presentations (serve the hummus in a martini glass; the salmon makes a spectacular centrepiece if served whole). She also talked about some of her favourite kitchen gadgets: an electric deep fryer (she has four of them) and a mandolin for slicing vegetables paper-thin (for her Salmon Primavera).

Fishbein recommended that cooks should have "a menu of five or six items that are in your comfort zone" and the recipes should come from "a cookbook you can trust." She encouraged the audience to get their kids into the kitchen as this helps expose them to different foods. When kids help prepare a recipe, they've invested in the cooking process and are more likely to eat the food that's been prepared. Fishbein said that her children get a kids' choice meal once a week.

Chana Gansburg, one of the co-ordinators of the event, told me: "Women like to talk about food, so this event was an ideal way to get Jewish women in the Toronto area together to enjoy a night out and to create awareness in the community about Chabad's projects."

From the enthusiasm of the women I spoke with as we nibbled and noshed together, this goal was certainly accomplished. For more information about Chabad, contact chana@chabadavenue.com or call 416-546-8770. You might even get an invitation for Shabbat dinner!

Here are the recipes for some of the delicious dishes Susie Fishbein demonstrated that night, as well as one I chose from Kosher by Design Lightens Up. Enjoy!

WINTER WHITE SOUP
Source: Kosher by Design Entertains

2 tbsp. olive oil
1 large leek, white and pale green parts only, sliced
4 medium parsnips, peeled, cut into 1-inch chunks
1/2 turnip, peeled, cut into 1-inch chunks
1/2 stalk celery, sliced
5 cups fresh chicken or vegetable stock
1 1/2 cups soy milk
1/8 tsp. ground white pepper
1/4 tsp. fine sea salt
pesto, store-bought or homemade

Place the olive oil in a large pot over medium-low heat. When the oil is hot, add the leek and slowly cook for 4-5 minutes, until it is shiny and soft but not brown. Add the parsnips, turnip and celery. Saute for 6-7 minutes longer.

Add the stock and turn the heat to medium. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for 15-20 minutes, or until the vegetables are soft. Add the soy milk, white pepper and salt.

Use an immersion blender, or transfer in batches to a blender, to blend until completely smooth. Ladle into bowls. Garnish with 1/2 teaspoon pesto in the centre of each bowl. Swirl with the tip of a knife. Yield: 6 to 8 servings.

PAREVE PESTO

2 cups fresh basil leaves
1 clove garlic
1 tbsp. pine nuts
2 tbsp. walnuts
3 tbsp. good quality extra virgin olive oil fine sea salt
freshly ground black pepper

In the bowl of a food processor fitted with a metal blade, process the basil, garlic, pine nuts and walnuts. Drizzle in the oil. Season with salt and pepper. Can be kept covered in the refrigerator for 1 week. To keep the pesto from changing colour, top it off with 1/2-in. olive oil. Pour off the extra oil and stir before serving.

SALMON PRIMAVERA
Source: Kosher by Design Entertains

2 1/2-3 lb. wild Pacific or sockeye salmon fillet salt
freshly ground pepper
Dijon mustard or thick honey mustard
1 small zucchini, with skin, thinly sliced
1 small yellow squash, with skin, thinly sliced
2 Roma or plum tomatoes, thinly sliced
1/4 cup unflavoured breadcrumbs or panko crumbs
2 tbsp. chopped fresh dill
2 tbsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 375. Season the salmon fillet with salt and pepper. Brush an even, thick coating of the mustard all over the salmon.

Place the salmon on a parchment- or foil-lined baking sheet. Place the fish horizontally in front of you. Starting at the left end of the fillet, lay a column of overlapping slices of the zucchini on top of the salmon.

On the next row, lay a column of overlapping slices of the squash; they should be overlapping the zucchini a bit as well. On the next row, lay a column of tomatoes; they should slightly overlap the squash. Begin again with the zucchini, followed by the squash and the tomato. Continue in this fashion until the whole fillet is covered.

In a small bowl, mix the breadcrumbs, dill and olive oil. Sprinkle over the top of the vegetables.

Bake for 30 to 35 minutes. Remove one of the vegetables in the thickest part of the fillet and test to make sure the fish is done, and then cover it back up with the vegetables.

Serve hot or at room temperature. Can be refrigerated overnight and brought to room temperature the next day. Yield: 8 to 10 servings.

PISTACHIO-CHERRY BISCOTTI
Source: Kosher By Design Lightens Up

Cherries, whether fresh or dried, are exploding with more than just flavour. They get their beautiful red colour from anthocyanins, which may reduce inflammation and help decrease the risk of heart disease, as well as reducing the pain of arthritis and gout. Quercetin, a flavonoid in cherries, may protect your heart, and beta-sitosterol, a plant sterol, may reduce cholesterol levels. Cherries also contain vitamins A and C as well as calcium, iron, potassium and fibre.

1 cup whole wheat flour
1 cup all-purpose flour
2/3 cup sugar
1 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. fine sea salt
2 tbsp. canola oil
1 large egg plus 1 egg white (from large egg), lightly beaten
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1 tsp. orange zest
1/4 cup orange juice (from medium orange)
1/2 cup dried cherries, coarsely chopped
1/3 cup (2 oz.) chopped good quality semi-sweet chocolate or chocolate chips
1/3 cup shelled pistachios, coarsely chopped

Preheat oven to 350. Cover a cookie sheet with parchment paper and set aside.

In the bowl of a stand mixer, at medium speed, combine the whole wheat flour, all-purpose flour, sugar, baking soda, baking powder and salt. Add the oil, egg and egg white, vanilla, orange zest and orange juice. Mix until a loose dough forms. Do not over-mix as whole wheat flour will toughen. Stir in the cherries, chocolate and pistachios.

Transfer the dough to the cookie sheet and form into a long, flat log about 14x4-in. wide. Bake for 25 to 30 minutes or until outside of log is baked but log is still soft. Remove from oven and cool for 5 minutes.

Using a bread knife or a serrated knife, slice the dough into 1/2-in. thick slices. Arrange the slices on the cookie sheet and return to the oven to bake for an additional 10 minutes. Flip the biscotti and return them to the oven for a final 10 minutes. Cool completely and store in an airtight container. Makes 18 biscotti.

Enjoy eating Haman's three-cornered hat

Preheat oven to 350. Generously grease several baking sheets or line them with parchment paper and set aside. Remove one sheet of dough from the refrigerator and carefully peel off the bottom sheet of parchment paper, then replace it loosely. Turn dough over and peel off top sheet of paper. Cut dough into rounds using a 2- or 2 1/2-in. round cutter or rim of a drinking glass.

Working with one dough round at a time, place a small, rounded 1/2 tsp. marzipan filling in the centre and fold up dough to form triangle. The marzipan should mound just slightly in the centre of the "hat."

Repeat with each round, spacing the cookies 2 in. apart on the prepared baking sheets. If the rounds become soft and difficult to handle at any point, slide the cookies and parchment paper onto a tray or baking sheet and refrigerate until they firm up again.

Gather dough scraps and roll out between sheets of paper again. Cut out the cookies, transfer to baking sheets, and fill and shape until all the dough is used. Repeat the process with the second half of the dough.

Place hamantashen in centre of oven and bake 10 to 12 minutes, or until the cookies are just barely tinged with brown at the edges. Remove from the oven and allow the cookies to stand for 1 to 2 minutes. Using a spatula, transfer cookies to wire racks and let stand until cooled completely. Sprinkle the tops with a generous sifting of powdered sugar. Store cookies in an airtight container for up to a week. Freeze for longer storage. (Makes about 3 dozen)

GINGERBREAD HAMANTASHEN

2 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
1/4 tsp. salt
2 tsp. ground ginger
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. allspice
1/4 tsp. cloves
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
1 tsp. baking soda
3/4 cup brown sugar
1/2 cup margarine
1 large egg
1/2 cup molasses
1 tsp. vanilla
apricot jam for filling

Mix together the flour, salt, ginger, cinnamon, allspice, cloves, nutmeg and baking soda.

Use an electric mixer tocream together the brown sugar and margarine. Add the egg, mixing it in, then the molasses and the vanilla.

Add the dry ingredients and mix until well combined. This will make a very soft dough. Turn it out onto a work surface, cut in half and form into 2 flat squares. Wrap each piece in plastic wrap and refrigerate for a minimum of one hour (can be done a day or two ahead and kept in the refrigerator).

Preheat oven to 350. Generously flour worktop (I like to roll this dough out on parchment paper because it tends to stick a little as it's so soft). Roll the dough approximately 1/4 in. thick. Use a cutter to cut 2- to 3-in. circles. Place about 1 tsp. of filling in the centre of each circle and fold up three sides, pinching to form triangles. Place on a baking sheet lined with parchment.

Bake for 9-11 minutes, until the edges are just starting to brown. Cool. Makes about 3 dozen.

Kenney praises U.S. for boycott of Durban II

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Now that the United States has followed Canada and Israel's lead in boycotting the upcoming Durban II world anti-racism conference over concerns about anti-Semitism, Canada's citizenship, immigration and multicultural minister, Jason Kenney, said he hopes other countries will do the same.

"I would like to believe that we had some positive impact, and certainly the recent decision of the Obama administration, I am confident, will be followed by other European allies," Kenney told The CJN on Sunday in Toronto, referring to the followup conference to the 2001 United Nations World Conference Against Racism, known as Durban II.

The 2001 human rights meeting in Durban, South Africa, singled Israel out for criticism and compared Zionism to racism. Israel and the United States walked out.

Kenney – who was meeting with representatives from Jewish groups, including Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to brief them on last month's inaugural conference in London of the Inter-Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism – said he hopes to deepen his close relationship with the Jewish community.

"Canada under the Harper government takes a zero tolerance approach to anti-Semitism, both domestically and internationally, and we understand the direct connection between Holocaust denial, anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism," Kenney said.

He added that when he attended the Feb. 17 London conference, the Obama administration had not yet opted to pull out of the Durban II conference, set to take place in Geneva next month.

The CJC released a statement that applauded last week's decision by the United States to join Canada and Israel in refusing to participate in the United Nations Durban Review Conference.

"In the preparatory conferences for Durban II, it has already become clear that Israel would be singled out among all the nations of the world for condemnation… Durban II has already become nothing more than a venue for the most pernicious and vile anti-Semitism," CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka said.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber added that the refusal of democratic countries such as Canada, Israel and the United States to take part sends a message of tolerance and hope to the international community.

"We now call on all other democratic countries to be true to their pluralistic values. They should follow Canada's lead, together with Israel and the United States, in dissociating from the hatefest that Durban II has already become," Farber said.

Kenney told The CJN that anti-Semitism in Canada is fuelled by "anti-Zionist rhetoric" and has become "almost epidemic in Canada."

But he said he hopes that the London conference last month will push other members of the international community to actively combat anti-Semitism, starting with a boycott of the Durban II conference.

RESPECT AND REMEMBRANCE AT YAD VASHEM

During a visit to Jerusalem earlier this week, Canadian Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon participated in a memorial ceremony in the Hall of Remembrance at Yad Vashem. During his three-day visit to the region, Cannon met with leaders of Israel, Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority. In Jerusalem, he met with Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu. Cannon said his meetings with the Israeli and Palestinian leaders "will serve to reaffirm Canada's full support for reaching their goal of a comprehensive peace agreement. We recognize the efforts [PA] President Mahmoud Abbas and [PA]Prime Minister Salam Fayyad have made to improve the security situation in the West Bank. Canada will support only those Palestinian leaders who understand that civil order and an end to terrorism are essential conditions for the fulfillment of Palestinian national ambitions. Our government continues to support Israel's right to protect its citizens and defend itself." [Isaac Harari photo, courtesy of Yad Vashem]

Gadhafi blames Israel

Libyan President Muammar Gadhafi said Israel is to blame for the crisis in Darfur. Gadhafi, president of the African Union, said that "foreign forces," including Israel, are to blame for the genocide in the Sudan region. "We discovered that some of the main leaders of the Darfur rebels have opened offices in Tel Aviv and hold meetings with the military there to add fuel to the conflict fire," the Libyan state news agency Jana quoted Gadhafi as saying. Gadhafi urged the International Criminal Court to stop proceedings to decide whether to issue a warrant for the arrest of Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir, who is accused of masterminding the genocide. "Why do we have to hold President Bashir or the Sudanese government responsible when the Darfur problem was caused by outside parties, and Tel Aviv, for example, is behind the Darfur crisis?" he said.

Rockets in Lebanon

Four rockets were discovered in southern Lebanon, on the border with Israel, Lebanese security officials said. The rockets were found in a region facing the Golan Heights. The discovery comes days after two rockets were fired from Lebanon at northern Israel for the third time this year. The attacks sparked Israeli retaliation. No group has claimed responsibility for the attacks.

Biblical markings found

Seal impressions that date back to the reign of the biblical King Hezekiah were found in southern Jerusalem.

Archeologists from the Israel Antiquities Authority unearthed a large building on the site in the village of Umm Tuba that dates to the time of the First and Second Temples. The royal seal impressions were discovered in the building. Pits, agricultural installations and subterranean silos were discovered hewn inside the courtyard. In addition, a potter's kiln, a large columbarium cave with a rock-hewn hiding refuge and pottery vessels also were discovered inside the complex. The pottery vessels that were found in the ruins of the building suggest it dates to the First Temple period in the eighth century BCE.

Missiles on nuclear site?

Syria built a missile facility on the site of an alleged nuclear reactor, according to Associated Press. Syria's nuclear chief reportedly told the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency that either a control centre or a launching pad was built on the site of what was believed to be a nascent nuclear reactor that was bombed by the Israeli Air Force in September 2007. The IAEA reported earlier last week that traces of uranium and graphite, both used in a nuclear reactor, were found at the site.

Gaza inquiry named

A committee was appointed to investigate the handling of the resettlement of Gaza evacuees. The committee, headed by retired Supreme Court judge Eliyahu Matza, also will make recommendations for their resettlement, as well as look at the state of the evacuees' employment and welfare situation.

Israeli, Diaspora volunteers to create an eco-farm in India

By ARYEH DEAN COHEN
Israel 21c

TAMIL NADU, India – When 10 Israeli and Diaspora Jews aged 21 to 30 get together on an eco-farm just outside of Tel Aviv this month on their first step to making the world a better place, one of the skills they'll learn is juggling.

But that's only natural for the Leaders for Tikkun Olam (LTO), which aims to balance Jewish values with a desire to make a difference. In July, the group moves to India to assist Indian villagers.

Israeli backpackers in Goa, on the west cost of India, are thought to be "ugly Israelis" by the local population, and one of LTO's goals is to project a positive image of Israel in India and around the world.

The International Jewish Service Corps project in Israel and India, supported by the Foreign Ministry and the Jewish Agency's MASA program, is the brainchild of the Adam LeAdam – International Human Aid NGO, which was founded by former Jewish Agency emissaries Uri Amit and Yarden Tenenbaum about a year ago. They believe the NGO will not only revolutionize the lives of south Indian villagers in the Sadhana Forest region but also create future leaders to pursue similar projects.

"I think that the whole idea of starting a Jewish/Israeli peace corps was somehow inside us years ago," Amit said.

Relying on their experience as Israeli emissaries and in volunteer work in the developing world, "we realized there might be an option, a vision to combine both things – to say there is a call for young, Jewish Israeli leaders to make a change both in Israel itself, but to [also] bring it to the outside world," he said.

The target is to create an eco-farm in Auroville, Tamil Nadu, in southeast India, where local agriculture was destroyed because villagers used methods that polluted water and soil. Working with Indian NGOs, the Centre for Culture and Development in India, and the Sadhana Forest, "we are trying to find a solution by creating an eco-park training centre to teach ecological agriculture, that doesn't use pesticides or create pollution," Tenenbaum said.

But the 10-member team will do even more when they take their "mini-kibbutz" from the Tel Aviv suburbs to India after studying biology and organic farming.

Using their juggling skills as an ice-breaker, they'll interact with people in 11 villages. They plan to teach English, find out what the villagers' problems are and develop future leaders to create a ripple effect of change, even among members of the "untouchable" caste.

"We're not coming on a white horse to save the world, but rather to… answer their needs," Tenenbaum said. In so doing, they hope to change the way Israelis are perceived in India and offer another option to Israeli travellers who previously only sought hedonistic adventures in India.

"We realized that many Israelis know Indian people simply as service providers and hardly have been exposed to real Indian culture. On the other hand, the Indian people think most Israelis are backpackers in Goa – the ugly Israelis. We're trying to create something else, something positive," Amit said.

Tenenbaum added: "The- main problem is that they don't know about the possibility of doing something else in India besides just enjoying themselves. If we give them the opportunity to do something meaningful, people will do it."

The LTO blends the idea of strengthening one's Jewish roots with the concept of tikkun olam. "People are forced to choose whether they are dealing with their Jewish identity and asking themselves what their relationship to Israel is, or following their ideas of tikkun olam, which sometimes have nothing to do with Judaism," Amit said. "We are trying to merge those ideas together."

Once back in Israel, the volunteers will write proposals for volunteer projects in Israel or their own communities, with support from the NGO. The farm in India will also be open to backpackers who want to stop in to help.

"We think Israelis have a lot to offer, a lot of good characteristics that people don't always see – initiative, a willingness to give. They don't just talk about it, they find a way to do it. And one of our goals is to show the world something good that comes out of Israel, not just what they see on TV," Tenenbaum said.

The pair hope to "make the issue of volunteering a trendy one," they said, and are currently spreading the word in India, on various websites, through Hillel offices and on college campuses in Israel and abroad.

Vatican rejects bishop's apology

JTA

ROME — The Vatican dismissed as insufficient Bishop Richard Williamson's apology for making comments minimizing the Holocaust.

Bishop Williamson expressed regret for making the remarks, but did not recant his views.

"The Holy Father and my Superior, Bishop Bernard Fellay, have requested that I reconsider the remarks I made on Swedish television four months ago, because their consequences have been so heavy," Bishop Williamson said in a statement published Feb. 26 by the Zenit Catholic News Agency.

Pope Benedict XVI sparked a furor in January when he reinstated Bishop Williamson and three other excommunicated bishops, all members of the traditionalist Society of St. Pius X, just days after Bishop Williamson told Swedish TV that he believed "the historical evidence is hugely against six million Jews having been deliberately gassed in gas chambers as a deliberate policy of Adolf Hitler." He said no more than a few hundred Jews died in the war.

Bishop Williamson expressed regret for making the remarks.

"Observing these consequences, I can truthfully say that I regret having made such remarks, and that if I had known beforehand the full harm and hurt to which they would give rise, especially to the Church, but also to survivors and relatives of victims of injustice under the Third Reich, I would not have made them," he said.

He concluded, "To all souls that took honest scandal from what I said, before God I apologize. As the Holy Father has said, every act of injust violence against one man hurts all mankind."

The apology "does not seem to respect the conditions" for re-admission into the Church as a clergyman, a Vatican spokesperson said, because it doesn't apologize for the Shoah denial itself.

The founding chair of the International Network of Children of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, Menachem Rosensaft, also called the apology unacceptable. "Williamson in no way recanted his denial of the Holocaust," he said. "Instead, he merely expressed regret that his public expression of his noxious views called attention to Pope Benedict XVI's ill-advised attempt to rehabilitate him."

Bishop Williamson left Argentina last week after authorities there expelled him for violating the conditions of his work visa. He returned to his native Britain.

Explosive hits Venezuela Jewish community centre

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CARACAS — Assailants threw an explosive at a Jewish community centre last Thursday, the second assault against Venezuela's Jewish community this year. Fortunately, nobody was hurt in the blast.

Abraham Garzon, president of the Jewish Community Centre, told the local Globovision television news channel that a small explosive resembling a pipe-bomb was lobbed at the building in Caracas before dawn on Thursday. The explosion damaged the centre's doors.

"It seems there are people in the country dedicated to sowing terrorism," Garzon said.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack, which immediately reignited fears of increasing anti-Semitism in Venezuela.

A Caracas synagogue was ransacked and vandalized last month. The assailants shattered religious objects, spray-painted "Jews, get out" on the synagogue's walls and stole a computer database containing names and addresses of Jews living in Venezuela.

Authorities have arrested 11 people, including eight police officers, suspected of participating in the first attack. Investigators believe the assailants forced their way into the temple to steal a large amount of cash they believed was inside. The vandalism, authorities say, could have been aimed at turning attention away from the true motive behind the crime.

Last Thursday, Sergio Widder of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center criticized Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez for failing to take steps to curb anti-Semitism.

Chavez should strongly criticize pro-government websites and newspapers that have carried articles and columns that many Venezuelan Jews perceive as anti-Semitic, he said.

"This is outrageous, it's turning into an escalation," said Widder, the centre's representative for Latin America. "It's the government's responsibility to stop this."

During Israel's offensive in Gaza, Chavez fiercely criticized the Jewish state and ordered the Israeli ambassador out of Venezuela. Protests against the military incursion were held in Caracas, and demonstrators hurled shoes at and sprayed graffiti on the Israeli Embassy.

Chavez, who has repeatedly condemned the Jan. 30 attack on the synagogue, denies being anti-Semitic. The socialist leader says he simply opposes Israeli policies on the Palestinians. He accuses the Israeli government of acting as an arm of Washington.

Women may chant Megillah of Esther for men: rabbi

By YAIR ETTINGER

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Women are allowed to chant the Megillah of Esther on behalf of men if no competent men are available, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual leader of Israel's Sephardi community, ruled in a landmark decision liable to outrage many of his Ashkenazi counterparts.

Esther is traditionally read in synagogue on the holiday of Purim, which falls next week. And while some rabbis have long permitted women to read the Megillah for other women, most do not allow women to read on behalf of men.

In his weekly Torah class on Saturday night, however, Rabbi Yosef discussed the rules of reading the Megillah and ruled that not only may women read it in front of men, but the men will thereby have fulfilled their obligation to hear the Megillah read.

"It is permissible for a woman to fulfill this obligation on behalf of men," he said, because the obligation to hear the Megillah falls equally on men and women.

Rabbi Yosef said that most rabbis forbid women to read the Megillah on the grounds that men are forbidden to listen to women sing. However, he said, he does not agree that a woman chanting a sacred text falls under the general prohibition regarding singing. The analogy rabbis have drawn between singing and chanting sacred texts has "no value," he declared.

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef

Rabbi Yosef said that women should not read for men if there are men capable of doing the reading. But in a "small community" where there are no men capable of chanting the text properly, it is permissible to bring a woman to read, he ruled.

Rabbi Yosef also said that women could write a kosher Megillah of Esther – another task that most rabbis say can be done only by men. He said that ancient megillot written by women have been found in Yemen, and it would be permissible for women to do so today as well, "to earn a living for their household," since women "were part of the miracle" that the Megillah describes.

In both cases, Rabbi Yosef's rulings were specific to Megillat Esther and do not necessarily apply to other sacred texts, such as the Torah.

British PM signs declaration against anti-Semitism

JTA

LONDON — Britain's prime minister became the first world leader to sign the London Declaration on combating anti-Semitism.

The measure was adopted last month in the British capital by 125 legislators from more than 40 countries at a coalition meeting to combat anti-Semitism.

On signing the declaration, Gordon Brown said, "So many of the principles it enshrines are already things we are doing here in Britain, and while I'm proud of the bold action Britain has taken to combat anti-Semitism – such as improved reporting, prosecutions for anti-Semitic Internet hate and the funding of Holocaust education in schools – there is no room for complacency."

He noted that the department for communities and local government is organizing an event at Beth Shalom, London's Holocaust Centre, to look in detail at how the government can implement the declaration.

Gordon Brown

"I encourage other heads of government to become signatories to this historic agreement," Brown said. "Together, our renewed efforts can rid the world of this ancient virus."

The London Declaration called on legislators to "expose, challenge and isolate political actors who engage in hate against Jews and target the State of Israel as a Jewish collectivity." It also calls on governments to "challenge any foreign leader, politician or public figure who denies, denigrates or trivializes the Holocaust and must encourage civil society to be vigilant to this phenomenon and to openly condemn it."

The London Declaration also urges the United Nations to "reaffirm its call for every member state to commit itself to the principles laid out in the Holocaust Remembrance initiative, including specific and targeted policies to eradicate Holocaust denial and trivialization." It also calls for action on education for the public and the authorities.

European states expected to follow American example

Kenney said that Italian Foreign Minister Franco Frattini has said that "Italy is ready to withdraw, but it wasn't announcing that it was doing so."

He added that Britain is also close to making the decision now that the United States has pulled out.

But the main message Kenney said he wanted to present to the Canadian Jewish community was that his government recognizes that "the new anti-Semitism – that is to say, anti-Semitism taking on the form of anti-Zionism, this notion that Israel is an abomination, that the Jewish people alone have no right to a homeland and that Israel must be destroyed – is [manifesting itself] even here in Canada."

He said that events such as Israeli Apartheid Week, happening this week on campuses worldwide, are efforts to scapegoat and delegitimize the Jewish state.

"[Israel] is not a perfect country, and it is entirely fair, as I said in London, to disagree with particular policies of the Israeli government, but this anti-Zionism is much more profound than that," Kenney said.

"It questions, essentially, the right of Israel to exist as a democratic Jewish state, and for the government of [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper, that is a totally outrageous and unacceptable position."

Family tradition inspired Bonnie Stern's latest cookbook

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For food maven Bonnie Stern, Friday night Sabbath dinners are sacrosanct and always will be.

"From a Jewish point of view, it's our night," she explained. "For others, it's goodbye to the work week and hello to the weekend."

With this idea in mind, Stern – one of Canada's most respected culinary authorities – wrote her latest book, Friday Night Dinners, published recently by Random House Canada.

"I wanted to write a family book," said Stern, whose previous 13 books run the gamut from Bonnie Stern's Essentials of Home Cooking to Simply HeartSmart Cooking.

"For me, Friday night dinners, a perfect time to share a meal with family and friends, seemed like a great theme."

Friday Night Dinners is a family affair.

Her son, Mark, a television story producer, took the photographs, while her daughter, Anna, a graduate student in speech pathology at the University of Toronto, assisted her brother.

Stern's husband Raymond Rupert, a physician who knows his way around a kitchen, cheered them on.

Out of respect for the Jewish tradition of Friday night dinners, the recipes in Stern's 309-page volume are kosher friendly and feature chapters on Rosh Hashanah, Passover and Israeli cuisine.

But within this framework, Stern ranges far and wide, offering readers easy-to-follow recipes for Italian, Indian, Asian, Greek, Australian, Middle Eastern, South African, vegetarian, barbecue, fast food, fish and al fresco meals.

Although her parents were not particularly observant or even kosher, Stern was raised on Friday night dinners. And after they died, this tradition was even more important to her.

"At least once a week, it's wonderful to share a family meal," she said, sipping tea and sharing home-baked mandel brot and shortbread/chocolate cookies with a reporter at the Bonnie Stern School of Cooking, a business she has run since 1973. "People who grew up with this tradition are so lucky."

Stern cut her teeth in the kitchen when she was just a little girl, baking cookies and cakes. In Grade 8, she began cooking meals for her family, who appreciated her efforts.

Stern's interest in and dedication to food was whetted by her home economics teacher at Forest Hill Junior High School who, she said, had a considerable influence on her.

As she recalls, her mother, the scion of Polish Jews, was an adventurous cook who had to curb her enthusiasm because no one else in the family shared her proclivity for cutting-edge fare.

Her father, a chartered accountant, was a "plain eater," while she was a "fussy" eater.

"I don't like things that are too rich or complicated," she said.

Looking back, she liked nothing more than poached eggs on toast, lamb chops and carrots, and on Friday nights, brisket, rib roast and apple crisp.

After graduating from high school, Stern earned a BA degree, majoring in English, at the University of Toronto.

She intended to pursue a career as a librarian, but eager for a break, she enrolled in a two-year chef training and food administration course at George Brown College of Applied Arts and Technology.

"My parents weren't happy," she said. "They wanted me to continue my academic education. But they also wanted me to be happy."

Back then, food did not have the same social cachet it has now. "It was nothing, not the big thing it is today." Yet Stern was hooked. "Next to reading, the only thing I loved was food."

In retrospect, George Brown made her what she is today.

"I learned cooking techniques and how to be really organized in the kitchen. I did well and gained lots of self-confidence."

Stern worked in several restaurants, in culinary and management positions, after leaving George Brown. Then she landed a job as a cooking demonstrator at the Eaton's department store.

"I was supposed to get people excited about food so they would buy kitchen supplies."

Bonnie Stern

Stern might have remained at Eaton's indefinitely had not one of its suppliers asked her to open a cooking school.

Eventually, she bought out her partners, and today, she offers classes to individuals and corporate groups.

So far this year, she has taught courses on 10 "super" foods, braising meat, Asian and Italian cuisine, fish, cheese and vegetarian cooking.

Later this month, she will teach a challah workshop and the basics of Middle Eastern cooking.

Moroccan, Egyptian and Lebanese food appeals to her, though Stern has never visited Morocco, Egypt or Lebanon.

Five years ago, in keeping with her lifelong passion for literature, Stern formed a book club at her school, inviting local authors to discuss their works with her students and then share a sumptuous meal together.

Since 2004, Stern has also led food tours to Israel.

On her first-ever trip to Israel six years ago, one of her travelling companions, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, warned her that she might not take kindly to Israeli food.

Stern, however, was blown away by Israel's gastronomic treats.

"I thought the food was incredible. The carrot soup flavoured with cumin. The chicken baked with dried fruits. The phyllo pastry. It was the most interesting food I'd had in years. It's very exotic, yet familiar, and I love the spices and herbs."

Stern was to have led her fourth food tour to Israel last month, but cancelled it due to the war in the Gaza Strip. She hopes to reschedule it.

Apart from her books and cooking school, she has hosted two TV shows, Bonnie Stern Cooks and Bonnie Stern Entertains, and hosts a website featuring recipes and food news.

Even after all these years, Stern enjoys cooking, generally dishing up four family dinners a week.

"I like everyday home cooking," she said.

In this age of fast food and pre-cooked meals, she encourages people to prepare their own meals.

"Cooking is really easy and fun, though food companies lead you to believe that cooking is hard. And, of course, everything tastes better when you share a meal, especially on Friday nights."

Behind the scenes of the Cool Jew book tour

By LISA ALCALAY KLUG
Special to The CJN

This Hebrew month, Adar, is best known for the holiday of Purim. It's another great example of that ancient wisdom, "They tried to kill us. We survived. Let's eat." Thus our ancient sages taught, "When Adar arrives, joy increases."

Lisa Alcalay Klug

That makes this an opportune time to look back on what we've been doing the past few months and give it a high five. What have I been up to? Travelling around North America telling jokes. I'm not a standup comedian. I just play one on book tour.

Truth is, my agenda is much wider than merely making Jews laugh. I'm celebrating how cool it is to be Jewish and sharing thoughts on what I call the Jewish cultural revival. You might call it, showing Judaism a good time.

My book, Cool Jew: The Ultimate Guide for Every Member of the Tribe (published by Andrews McMeel) is a comprehensive, loving and irreverent look at Jewish life.

It covers everything from identity, Jewish diversity, cuisine, gear and language to life-cycle events, holidays and spirituality – what I call Kabba Lah Lah for Non-Dummies.

It's been said Cool Jew does for gefilte fish and matzah balls what The Official Preppy Handbook did for plaid and polo, only with much more chutzpah.

We've had a few parties to celebrate. Forty-two to be exact. Soon after Sukkot, I left my home in California for a whirlwind tour that continued through much of January. And I just want to say, dear Canadians, your country has been good to me.

My Canada tour started out at the Ghetto Shul in Montreal, continued at Toronto's Indigo bookstore and was capped off with an amazing night of local talent, a few stolen moments inside the Incredible Bar Mitzvah Machine, an interactive installation created by artist Charles Katz, and some jokes I told at the original Cool Jew Cabaret at the Koffler Centre of the Arts in Toronto.

But that's not all. Random strangers gave me a subway token, carried my things through the turnstile, and even walked me through the Yorkdale Mall to Indigo's door, where another stranger introduced herself to me as "Lisa Klug" – her real name.

The Koffler Centre served adorable blue and white "Cool Jew" cookies, happy-face sugar cookies with rainbow sprinkle yarmulkes and gingerbread Yidden with tallit stripes of white icing.

And the good people at the Koffler are continuing to showcase local artists at ongoing Cool Jew Cabarets (No. 2 was slated for Feb. 15).

CBC Radio One invited me for a live interview with honorary Heeb Jian Ghomeshi, host of Q TV, Arts, Culture, Entertainment, who grew up in Thornhill, Ont.

Our interview is now immortalized on YouTube. And the local Costco stocked Cool Jew, reportedly next to a stack of Art Scroll prayerbooks, which my book jacket spoofs. Now that's divine providence.

Because I keep kosher, friends had warned me, "You're going to starve." Are you kidding me? This was a Jewish book tour. With a dessert bar that kept appearing everywhere I did. I ate gingerbread in Toronto, brownies in Kansas City, chocolate fondue in Scottsdale, Ariz., and cotton candy in San Francisco. I gained 10 pounds. (The curse of the "Book Tour Ten.")

When I wasn't busy snacking, people asked me all kinds of questions like, "Do you have a day job?" Yes, of course. I'm a stay-at-home mom. But without the husband and kids. Actually, I'm a freelance journalist. In other words, my day job requires another day job. Do you need any one-liners in your office?

A true Heebster knows where to be. As Americans celebrated the inauguration of President Barack Obama in Washington, D.C., Cool Jew was there.

Being on tour is its own Twilight Zone. You visit so many places (and eat so much sugar) in such a short period of time that some days you wake up forgetting you're in a foreign country. You know how it goes. You're walking down the street and things feel familiar, but suddenly you're really tripping because those red hexagonal signs you've read all your life as S-T-O-P suddenly say Arret.

Once I realized I was in that one part of North America known as "Kabeck," I figured I'd play along. I started reading all the signs as if I were Lumiere. You know, that talking candelabra from Beauty and the Beast? It was fun. "Park Olympique. Jardin Botanique. Irrigation Colonique." You French know how to make anything sound good.

As the tour continued, people started calling me cool Jew. It's been kind of uncomfortable. I'm not that cool. I'm the dork who wrote the book. But that hasn't stopped people from asking me to evaluate their coolness. They say things like, "Lisa, my name is Mordechai Lefkowitz. Does that make me a cool Jew? Lisa, I'm Moroccan and I speak Yiddish. Am I a cool Jew? Lisa, I'm a shiksa and I love knishes. Does that count?"

My labour of love has done all right. In June, Cool Jew won Honourable Mention in the New York Book Festival. In October/November, I was named Erma Bombeck Humor Writer of the Month. And just weeks ago, Cool Jew was named a finalist in the 2008 National Jewish Book Awards in the category of contemporary Jewish life.

It appears to be the first humour/pop culture title honoured in the 50-year history of the awards. And this month, the Contemporary Jewish Museum in San Francisco is debuting an installation I created called Matzo Ball Disco, which incorporates light, music and holograms of flying Jewish stars. It's my Heebster interpretation of a seder plate.

The tour has changed me, perhaps forever. I've become... emboldened. One night, after a reading in Baltimore, I used lipgloss to sticker my book logo onto a massive sign and the image of a tranquil reader in lotus position.

The first full day of the new U.S. president's in office, I slipped Cool Jew into the hands of an Obama puppet at the Washington Monument. I even risked the reprimands of the Secret Service to sneak a giant semblance of my book onto the White House lawn to snap a photo. That's part of the joy of having written this book. Now, nearly every day has the potential of a little Purim... with a lot more chutzpah.

When your book comes out, Alcalay Klug is available for hire... to be you. Learn more about her Cool Jew adventures at her website, www.cooljewbook.com.

Oscars for Holocaust films, but Israeli movie loses

JTA

LOS ANGELES — A Holocaust-related short and a Holocaust-related film won Academy Awards, but an Israeli film again came up short in the quest for best foreign-language film.

Waltz With Bashir, Israel's hopes for its first Oscar, failed to win for best foreign film. It was the eighth time that an Israeli film was nominated for an Academy Award but didn't win.

Ari Folman's animated masterpiece, a psycho-historical investigation into one man's inability to remember what he did during the 1982 Lebanon War, won this year's Golden Globe for best foreign film, and critics and audiences in Israel and around the world have embraced the movie.

Folman's animated psychological drama had also been named by the American National Society of Film Critics as the best overall picture of 2008.

So much for the "experts" or, if you prefer, the peculiar ways of Academy Awards voters: even after Japanese director Yojiro Takita walked off the stage Sunday night clutching the statuette for his film Departures, he acknowledged in a backstage interview that Waltz had been the front-runner all along.

For Israelis, an Oscar win would have meant nearly as much as the country's first Olympic medal.

On Oscar night at the Beverly Hilton, where Israeli diplomats and journalists had gathered, the festive mood turned grim when Departures was named the top foreign language film.

Israel's consul general in Los Angeles, Yaakov Dayan, didn't hide his disappointment.

"I've been in Los Angeles for two years," Dayan said. "Last year, Beaufort was nominated but didn't win. This year, it was Waltz With Bashir, and it didn't win. Maybe I'll have to resign before we can take home an Oscar."

Waltz with Bashir was good enough to win a Golden Globe but not an Oscar.

Toyland, a 14-minute German film that was four years in the making, won the Oscar for best live-action short.

Set in a small German town in the winter of 1942, the film follows the friendship between two six-year-old boys, the Aryan Heinrich and the Jewish David Silberstein.

When the Silberstein family is about to be deported, Heinrich asks his mother where his friend is going. She tells him that David is taking a trip to Toyland. An intrigued Heinrich sneaks along for the ride when the town's Jews are packed onto a train.

"Well, it was a drama, but it was a story I really wanted to tell – a film about ignorance, truth and the history of my country," director and producer Jochen Alexander Freydank told Moving Pictures magazine.

"Shooting this film was one of the most rewarding experiences in my film life," he added.

"Growing up behind the Berlin Wall, I always dreamt about making films. But I never, ever thought that a film of mine might be nominated for an Oscar one day. It still feels a bit unreal, I must say. But makes me very, very happy."

Actress Kate Winslet won for her role in The Reader, in which she plays an illiterate former SS concentration camp guard whose teenage lover is unaware of her Nazi past.

Some observers have panned the film for trivializing the Holocaust.

"Essentially, it takes a woman who serves in, is responsible for, is complicit in – you pick the words – in the deaths of at least 300 Jews, and her big secret shame is that she's illiterate," Mark Weitzman, head of New York's Simon Wiesenthal Center, told the New York Post.

Sean Penn, the son of Jewish director Leo Penn, whose own parents arrived as immigrants from Lithuania and Russia, won the Oscar as best actor portraying a gay Jewish politician in Milk.

Veteran comedian Jerry Lewis received the Jean Hersholt Humanitarian Award, recognizing his philanthropic efforts to aid muscular dystrophy victims.

Award-winning designer is also a prominent artist

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

If you've ever eaten in the food court at Toronto's Pearson International Airport, chances are you have seen the work of Martin Hirschberg.

Through his design firm Hirschberg Design Group, Hirschberg and his team of nine interior designers redesigned the Terminal 3 food court in Pearson Airport.

They are also responsible for the interiors of Piazza Manna and Pumpernickels in downtown Toronto. The Pickle Barrel and Superior and Fran's restaurants make up some of Hirschberg's Toronto-based projects as well.

One of Hirschberg's more challenging projects was to redefine what people think of off-track betting. This he accomplished with the design of downtown Toronto's Turf Lounge, an upscale bar, restaurant and off-track betting lounge for the business crowd.

Hirschberg's passion for design is unmistakable, from the attention to detail in each of his projects and how no two designs are the same.

"There's an excitement every day here. If there wasn't an excitement, I wouldn't be here," said Hirschberg, an interior designer for the hospitality industry for more than 35 years.

Early in his career, Hirschberg worked for a fixture company that specialized in restaurants. When he began working there, not much importance was placed on design. That changed, though, and Hirschberg was eventually made head of the company's design department. He founded the Hirschberg Design Group in the early 1970s.

Lingering Days from the Santorini series.

However, Hirschberg is renowned not only for his award-winning design firm but also for his art. His work has been in shows at the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Stratford Art Gallery and the Blue Dot Gallery in the Distillery District in Toronto. Hirschberg also designed the Illuminated Glass Ark Doors at the Temple Sinai in Toronto.

Hirschberg's interior design career grew out of his first love, art. When he was a teenager, his grandfather paid for art lessons for him – something Hirschberg and his wife, Marion, now do for their grandchildren.

Hirschberg's series of paintings include some from the Greek island of Santorini and Provence, in France.

"I saw in Santorini this brightness, this life," he said. "None of the scenes in Santorini have people – it's all architecture."

Another series of his paintings is titled The Family – a departure from his usual painting of landscapes – in which he reflects on the dysfunctional nature of families.

Family comes first, before work, for the Hirschbergs.

"The most important thing in our lives, truthfully, is family," Marion Hirschberg, an actress, said. "The greatest pleasure is Friday night sitting around [the] table."

Another important part of their lives is Judaism, and the honouring of tradition that comes with it.

"When I light the Shabbat candles with my children and grandchildren on Friday night, that's probably one of the most important things in my life, because I am instilling in them a tradition. No matter where they go they'll remember those Fridays and they'll remember how we did it together," she said.

"We're extremely proud to be Jewish, and that's what we instil in our children – how lucky they are that they are living in a country where they can say that," she added.

Hirschberg is exhibiting his Santorini series of paintings at the Toronto Art Expo at the Metro Convention Centre March 19 - 22

Choir to Record Album: Toronto's Renanim Youth Singers are preparing to record an album of Jewish prayers and songs in the Jewish annual cycle for an interactive multimedia DVD-ROM to be distributed to students around the world. Founded 10 years ago, Renanim is a non-profit, Jewish community youth choir that "represents the full spectrum of Judaic pluralism," according to its artistic director, Susan Michaels. "A core mandate of Renanim is to foster a love for the richness and beauty of our collective Jewish heritage through music, regardless of one's Jewish affiliation, level of religious observance, or schooling," said Michaels, the daughter of observant Holocaust survivors and sister of Hollywood producer-director Ivan Reitman.

Koltor Publishing of Richmond Hill is producing the DVD-ROM in stages over the next three years. Students in grades 6 to 12 may audition to join the choir. www. renanim choirs.com

Names in the News: For the second time in two years, Rafi Aaron's play Mandelshtam has won third prize in the Toronto Fringe Festival's new-play competition. The play tells the story of Stalin's persecution of Russian poet Osip Mandelshtam, who died in a transit camp near Vladivostok in 1938 at the age of 47.

The revised play is based on Aaron's book of prose poetry, Surviving the Censor – The Unspoken Words of Osip Mandelshtam (Seraphim Editions), which won the 2007 poetry prize at the Jewish Book Awards. However, the play is a completely new piece of art. "What excites me about this medium is it has allowed me to delve deeper into the human story beneath the historical narrative," Aaron said.

Cantorial concert correction

The story "Cantorial concert to aid children with medical problems" (CJN, Feb. 26) incorrectly named one of the local cantors. It was Cantor Shlomo Sufrin who was to perform with the others mentioned, not Cantor Jodi Sufrin. We apologize for the error.

However, Chai Lifeline Canada has since informed The CJN that only featured Cantor Yizchak Meir Helfgot and local Cantor Benjamin Maissner will be performing.

Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts opens

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The new arts facility north of Toronto opened its doors on Feb. 28

The Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts celebrated its grand opening Feb. 28 with a concert headlined by award-winning Canadian stage actress and star of Broadway's Mamma Mia, Louise Pitre.

The facility, situated on 1.5 acres of land in Richmond Hill's downtown core at Yonge and Wright streets, includes a 631-seat main auditorium – the largest theatre-seating capacity in York Region. The centre also includes a rehearsal hall seating 150, lobby art galleries and an outdoor piazza for large-scale art exhibits and open-air presentations and productions.

"The building was built on the premise that it would serve the multicultural makeup of Richmond Hill and York Region," says Eli Lukawitz, the centre's marketing and development co-ordinator.

"It is an extremely diverse community. The Jewish population of Richmond Hill makes up about seven per cent, then when you look to our neighbour Thornhill, the Jewish demographic is huge," Lukawitz, 37, a longtime resident of York Region, said.

Audiences at the opening witnessed the debut performance of the Richmond Hill Philharmonic Orchestra. Community groups, including the more than 100 voice Bayview Secondary School Choir, were also represented. Local thespians presented ensemble performances as well.

Lukawitz says that the artists he plans to book will reflect the cultures of the community.

"I think the Jewish community will play an extremely large role on how we see Richmond Hill going forward," he says. "In terms of patronage, I see the Jewish community, which has always embraced the arts, embracing this building. That is why we have been sensitive to make Jewish programming a valid piece of our puzzle."

On March 31, Toronto jazz singer Sophie Milman, who was born in Russia and raised in Israel, will perform. The first programming at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts was to have been Holocaust Education Week events last year, but they were cancelled due to the centre's construction delays. Lukawitz says he hopes the centre will be involved with Holocaust Education Week in some way this year.

Upcoming performers at the centre include Chantal Kreviazuk, Arlo Guthrie and Blue Rodeo's Jim Cuddy.

There are also preliminary talks going on with the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, with an eye to staging future theatrical presentations, Lukawitz says. He also hopes to bring in internationally known Jewish singers, musicians and comedians.

Lukawitz is the co-artistic director of the theatre company Tribal Productions, but the company is on hold while his new responsibilities at the centre take precedence.

He took the position at the centre because it is a way for him to lay down roots in the community and stay close to his young family, something the national touring schedule of Tribal Productions didn't allow for, Lukawitz says. He is married to actress Lisa Messinger and has two children, Jason, 4 and Jamie, 2.

For more information about upcoming performances at Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts, visit www.richmondhill.ca.

Profiles of people who discover their Jewish roots

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When Madeleine Albright was appointed U.S. secretary of state in 1997, the Washington Post disclosed that her Czech-born parents had been Jewish. Albright, who had been raised as a Christian, professed to be surprised by the news.

Barbara Kessel

Whether she was sincerely surprised is debatable, but the disclosure intrigued Barbara Kessel, a New York writer.

"This phenomenon of uncovering hidden roots fascinated me, and I was determined to do some research," she writes.

Kessel placed an authors' query in the New York Times Book Review and a posting on the Internet seeking non-Jews who had discovered they were of Jewish origin.

Of the 178 individuals who came forward, Kessel interviewed 166 in person or by telephone or mail.

The result is Suddenly Jewish: Jews Raised as Gentiles Discover Their Jewish Roots (University Press of New England).

The book profiles the descendants of Spanish and Portuguese Jews who were forced to convert to Christianity in the 15th century, Jewish children who were placed in non-Jewish homes during the Holocaust, children of Holocaust survivors who denied their Jewish heritage, and Jews adopted by Christian parents.

Kessel's modus operandi is to introduce the theme and let her subjects speak their mind.

Her chapter on Crypto-Jews is particularly instructive.

During the Inquisition period, Jews in Spain and Portugal could convert to Roman Catholicism, leave the Iberian Peninsula or die at the stake. A small proportion of Jews, unhappy with any of the above, lived openly as Christians but inwardly as Jews. Known also as New Christians, some of them settled in Latin America and later, in the southeastern United States.

Eventually, the vast majority of Crypto-Jews and their descendants were completely assimilated by Christian society. A few, however, never lost touch with their Jewish roots, and these are the people Kessel interviewed.

Maria, a Catholic to her priest and a Jew to her rabbi, talked about her grandmother, who kept separate pots and silverware for different kinds of food, and lit candles on Friday night.

Miriam told Kessel that her grandfather never ate pork and prayed in a foreign language, which, it turned out, was Hebrew.

Rogelio said that many members of his family had Jewish-sounding first names – Abraham, Zacarias and Elias –and that "all our men are circumcised."

Kessel, in her discussion on hidden Jewish children, writes that they were traumatized twice – first when they were removed from their parents, and again when they were reunited after World War II. As she puts it, "Not only were they transferred from home to home, but when they rejoined their Jewish parents, they had to leave the church, which some of them had learned to love."

Abraham Foxman, the director of the Anti-Defamation League, was one such child. "My Jewishness I had no choice about," said Foxman, who was born in Poland. "Had my parents not survived, I would have stayed Christian. I was five when they came back for me. There was a fierce custody trial, and if I had been older, my caretaker would have won…"

Foxman is convinced that there are thousands of children who do not even know their parents were Jewish.

Yossi, a Jew from Holland who lives in Israel today, told Kessel his mother was so determined not to be targeted again as a Jew that she cut all her ties with the past.

"Having come from a practising [Jewish] family, this was a traumatic break with Judaism, but she had lost her faith and suffered tremendous anxiety about anti-Semitism," Yossi said.

Yossi's mother, having married a Christian, swore her husband to secrecy about her Jewish background. But when the Six Day War broke out, Yossi heard her wailing. "Oh, no, not again." She feared that Israel would lose and that its Jewish citizens would be killed.

Yossi did not make the connection immediately, but as time passed, he became increasingly interested in Israel and wanted to be part of the Jewish people. In 1974, he made aliyah.

Rose, raised as a Catholic in Poland, discovered that her Jewish mother persuaded her father to join her in converting to Christianity.

"She was afraid to be Jewish," Rose explained. "My father figured, God is God, so he went along with it. They sent me to a Catholic school and we all went to church together. But they must have had mixed feelings, because when my younger brother was five, they had him circumcised."

Rose and her family immigrated to the United States in 1959, maintaining their Catholic identity. Fulfilling a promise, her father sent Rose on a trip to meet her relatives abroad.

Rose spent a year overseas, including three months in Israel.

"At first, the idea of being Jewish didn't mean anything to me because I didn't know anything about it," she said. "Later, as I read Holocaust novels like Exodus and Mila 18, it became more and more meaningful."

Carol, born in Boston, is the daughter of a German Jewish woman who converted to Christianity before marrying her Lutheran husband in Germany.

When life under the Nazis became untenable, Carol and her family settled in the United States, where she was baptized. Yet, after her father's death, Carol's mother decided to move to Palestine, where her two sisters lived.

Recalling her days in Palestine, Carol said, "I remember going to my aunt's kibbutz wearing my crucifix. When my uncle saw it, he ripped it off my neck and replaced it with the Star of David without any explanation. That was a traumatic moment for me. Nobody told me what was going on."

Carol and her mother moved back to the United States in 1947, shortly after Arab-Jewish riots broke out. They returned to Israel in the wake of the 1948 war. In Israel, Carol embraced Judaism. "I absolutely identify now as a Jew," she said.

In the final chapter, Kessel shines a spotlight on Shelley, who was adopted by a Mormon family but never really fit in because of her olive complexion and dark hair and dark eyes. Ultimately, Shelley found her Jewish relatives, studied in Israel and converted to Judaism.

Shelley's story and that of all the others in Suddenly Jewish is emblematic of a larger reality – the allure of Jewishness despite the greatest odds.

National CUPE union distances itself from Ontario affiliate

so that's what our new group is about – building on our past efforts, our past successes, and building a larger organization and a bigger network to respond to what were seeing now."

The core group currently has about a dozen people, he said.

CUPE National president Paul Moist issued a statement Feb. 24, distancing the national body from the resolution adopted by its provincial affiliate.

In the statement, Moist said, "CUPE is made up of autonomous provincial divisions and local unions, each of which has the right to adopt policies independent of one another, and independent of the national union… The views expressed in the resolution are those of a small number of CUPE Ontario members. The resolution does not represent CUPE national policy."

Calls by The CJN to Moist were not returned by deadline.

Singer said, however, that "since members of the public don't necessarily understand the distinction between CUPE Ontario and CUPE national and the different CUPE locals, [the Ontario resolutions have] an effect on all of us. We all get painted with that same brush in the eyes of the public."

He said his group will also approach other unions, such as the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, and various locals to try to form a broad coalition against future anti-Israel resolutions and practices that create "divisions in membership" and in Canadian society at large.

Singer said he wants Ryan to know that he and others are "proud to be union members but also proud to support Israel. I think there is a tendency of many Jewish union members to be embarrassed about their belonging to the union, and that has intensified since Resolution 50 was adopted."

He encouraged people to visit www.unionmembersforIsrael.ca and join the mailing list.

Depending on level of interest, UMI will consider holding meetings to discuss strategy and plan events.

"There is strength in numbers, and I would love to build a strong network that could be a foundation for planning all sorts of activities and events going forward."

Others are taking up the anti-Ryan torch.

Last week, some 40 academic members of CUPE Ontario Local 3902 – representing nearly 6,000 sessional teachers, teaching assistants and other contract instructional staff at the University of Toronto – signed an open letter to Ryan expressing "outrage" at his union's actions, questioning his leadership and calling for Ryan's resignation as president for his role in "undermining our union."

Paul Egan Nahme, a PhD student and teaching assistant at the university's Centre for Jewish Studies and the originator of the letter, told The CJN last week he hoped it would let the Jewish community know that there are those in unions on campus who will stand up for Israel.

Nahme, who is also a member of UMI, wrote the open letter questioning why CUPE Ontario's leaders are doing anything "even remotely anti-Semitic" and describing Ryan's presidential tactics as more "authoritarian" than democratic.

The union's passage of a motion to boycott Israeli academic institutions calls into question the principles of "academic freedom" and, just as importantly, Nahme's letter says, raises concerns about CUPE Ontario's "expression of an autocratic minority that has disregarded the tenets of the democratic socialist tradition – namely, the freedom of discussion, critique, votes involving all members and transparency."

Paul Moist

It closes with the following statement:

"We do not consent to have our wages used to support resolutions on which we have not been allowed to vote, which violate the spirit of the union's constitution, and which compromise our integrity at a most fundamental level."

(For the full text of the letter visit The CJN's website www.cjnews.com).

Nahme said he circulated the letter to some of the major national newspaper outlets last week, but as of the weekend had not heard back from them.

"Most of the signatories on the letter are not Jewish," he said. "They're just people who are frustrated and… in a wider sense, intimidated by resolutions that can spark anti-Semitism. These are not union politics."

Nahme said he also wanted the letter to reflect the idea that Ryan is seemingly more concerned about Middle East politics and his own "dislike of Israel" than he is about improving the contracts and treatment of his organization's members.

"I don't see how meddling in international politics has anything to do with [union operations]," he added.

Local 3902 did not support CUPE Ontario's Resolution 50 and has also decided "not to endorse a call for a boycott of Israeli academics," according to its website.

Still, Nahme said he believes there is a possibility that he and others who worked on and signed his letter could have their union memberships revoked.

"Despite the fact that my local has distanced itself from CUPE Ontario on this motion… I think Local 3902 is still politically volatile," he said. "But if I challenge [the local], I risk being blackballed."

Nahme said, however, that his worries in this regard are tempered by the fact that CUPE national has distanced itself from the CUPE Ontario motion to boycott Israeli academic institutions.

"It's clearly not an essential resolution for a labour movement or union politics in Canada," he said.

The federal Conservative government, the Liberal opposition and Jewish groups were all unanimous in denouncing the motion last week and encouraging Moist to take an even stronger stance against CUPE Ontario and Ryan.

In a statement, Mark Goldberg, vice-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region, said the resolution "represents another low point in the proud history of the Canadian labour movement's involvement in international affairs."

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, called on Moist to ensure that CUPE national continues to condemn "the vehemently anti-Israel agenda for which its Ontario affiliate has become notorious."

Last Monday, Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney told Canadian Press that the CUPE Ontario motion was full of "unbalanced rhetoric about Israel as a… racist state" and that CUPE Ontario was proving itself "intolerant" of Israel.

Dominic Leblanc, Liberal justice critic, called the CUPE motion "reprehensible" and "discriminatory."

"This goes beyond reasonable criticism," he said in a statement. "We're seeing Israeli Jews demonized in a way that has absolutely no place in our public discourse."

Israel, Sweden to play Davis Cup match sans fans

JTA

STOCKHOLM — Israel and Sweden will play their Davis Cup match without spectators.

Swedish organizers last week cited security concerns for the empty-arena policy when the national tennis squads compete March 6 to 8 in the southern city of Malmo, cbssports.com reported. Anti-Israeli demonstrations spurred by Israel's recent military operation in Gaza are expected during the best-of-five series.

Stockholm, saying it could better guarantee security, had offered to host the match, but officials in the capital realized later they didn't have enough time to organize before the Israelis arrived Feb. 28.

Stockholm officials claimed that Malmo's decision was political. Malmo, Sweden's third-largest city, has a left-leaning government and a large Muslim minority. Its leaders strongly criticized Israel after the Gaza invasion, and some called for dropping the Davis Cup match.

Shahar Pe'er

Stockholm has a centre-right majority that is more pro-Israeli.

Malmo Mayor Ilmar Reepalu insisted the decision to bar spectators was solely based on security concerns. He noted that pro-Palestinian groups disrupted a recent pro-Israel demonstration by throwing bottles, eggs and fireworks.

The decision comes after an Israeli tennis player, Shahar Pe'er, was denied a visa last month by the United Arab Emirates to compete in a Dubai tournament. Another Israeli, Andy Ram, was given a visa to play in the men's Dubai tournament Feb. 25 to March 9.

JTA

DUBAI — Israeli tennis star Andy Ram lost his opening doubles match in the Dubai tournament.

Ram, ranked 12th in the world in doubles play, received a special permit Feb. 19 to enter the United Arab Emirates to play in the Barclays Dubai Tennis Championships following international criticism over the country's decision not to allow Israeli Shahar Pe'er to play in the women's competition.

Andy Ram

Ram and partner Kevin Ullyett of Zimbabwe were beaten Feb. 25 by Russia's Marat Safin and Spain's David Ferrer. Security was tight for the match, including the use of metal detectors.

Earlier in the week, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert urged Ram to boycott the tournament.

"I was a bit surprised to discover that Andy Ram did intend to go there," Ha'aretz quoted Olmert as saying on Feb. 22. "It would be highly worthwhile for someone to advise him to demonstrate patriotism and solidarity and boycott the tournament."

The men's defending champion, American Andy Roddick, skipped the tournament over the failure to grant an entry visa to Pe'er.

Israeli wins gold medal in judo

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WARSAW — Arik Ze'evi won a gold medal on Sunday in judo's World Cup second round, held in Warsaw.

Ze'evi, competing in the under-100-kilogram class, defeated Bulgarian Daniel Dichev on points in the first round. He then went on to win the next four rounds, including the final against German Robert Zimmerman, whom he defeated in an Ippon win. It was Ze'evi's last competition before the European Championship later this year.

Arik Ze'evi

Ze'evi is one of Israel's leading judokas and was one of the country's medal hopefuls entering the 2008 Beijing Summer Olympics.

Though he failed to win a medal, at the time Ze'evi told Israeli media he didn't want to finish his career on a losing note, a strong indicator that he intended to make amends at last weekend's World Cup meet.

'It's not you, it's him'

Apparently, he's just not that into me. Or you, or her or anyone else for that matter if we are to believe this new so-called philosophy.

This catch phrase from a Sex and the City episode-turned-book-turned-movie is beginning to get on my nerves.

"It's not you, it's him," is something the girls and I say to one another regularly when we're complaining about the boys in our life. And it always seems to make so much sense at the time.

He didn't call after a great date? He's obviously dumb – it's not you, it's him. He wants to hang out with his friends? He's definitely still stuck in high school – it's not you, it's him. He doesn't want to get married? He's got commitment issues – it's not you, it's him.

We say that to one another because every woman deep in her heart is always afraid she's not enough. And now we've got a book/movie that just confirms that fear.

A girlfriend of mine said she found the movie inspiring, while I found it downright insulting.

If you haven't seen it yet and still plan to, you might want to skip the next few paragraphs but basically, in the movie the "wise-guy" tells a pathetic excuse for a girl that every guy she meets is "just not that into her" and that while there are exceptions to the rule, most likely, the girl is the rule and not the exception.

Of course, the movie-makers couldn't let every girl walk out of the theatre depressed and so obviously the girls in the movie end up being the exception to the rule.

This movie is supposed to be the guy-dictionary we've all been searching for all these years? Maybe I'm just clueless when it comes to love, but I walked out of there more confused than ever.

All I know is that when I'm not romantically interested in someone who I know is romantically interested in me, I don't send out mixed signals.

I don't call them, kiss them or ask them to hang out. I don't reach out when I'm down, reach out when I'm happy or reach out at all really. I'm always friendly, but I never give them a reason to ever question whether I'm into them or not.

I'm not a complicated girl and I wear my heart on my sleeve. If I'm just not that into you, you're not gonna need a cheesy movie to figure it out.

But guys are different it seems. It doesn't take a genius to feel when love has gone cold, but what about when the guy in your life is constantly hot and cold? Not all guys mind you, but a lot of guys love the game, love feeling wanted, love being chased. They are the masters of mixed signals.

If they're just not that into us, then why won't they just leave us alone?

It's easy to make sweeping generalizations – boys are bad to the bone and girls are made of sugar and spice and everything nice. But I know that's a load of bull.

There are girls out there who love the attention and never really let any guy get too far before reeling them in again, without a second thought about if she's into them or not.

I'm just not that into that.

But what I and a lot of other girls are into unfortunately are the guys who keep us guessing. The players who are as charming as they are emotionally distant. The womanizers who know just what to say but don't ever say what you want. The men who we can never quite figure out.

And in that case, it's true girls. The problem is not them. It's us.

SUGARED ALMOND SALAD

SALAD:
12 c salad greens of your choice
1/4 c sugar
3/4 c slivered almonds
3 11-oz. cans mandarin oranges, drained
1 purple onion, sliced

DRESSING:
3/4 c white vinegar
3/4 c granulated sugar
6 Tbsp. parsley, snipped
1 Tbsp. salt
1 1/2 c vegetable oil

Blend dressing ingredients. Refrigerate at least 1 hour. Cook and stir almonds and sugar in skillet over low heat until sugar is melted and nuts are coated. Cool on wax paper. Break apart. Set aside. Toss dressing with salad greens and arrange on plates. Top with orange sections, onion slices and sugared almonds.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Dear Ella,

My husband Paul and I have been married for six years and we have a two-year-old daughter. Everything was just fine until Paul was laid off work a month ago.

It seems that all we do now is fight. Money is tight, Paul and I are both worried, and our nerves are raw. I find that even our daughter is crying and is crankier than ever. I guess she feels the vibes in the house.

I am hoping we will get through this with our marriage intact, but as each day goes by, we seem to be growing further apart, as the pressure is chipping away at us, and inappropriate comments are being made that can't be taken back. Somehow the love we share seems to be taking a back seat to the stress we share. We need a strategy to get us through these tough times.

Marriage Meltdown

About Life

Dear Marriage Meltdown

This recession affects every part of our lives. Every time you turn on a radio or TV, all you hear is doom and gloom. Your family has become a victim of this recession, but it's not too late to climb back up to a safe place to weather this storm.

The most important way to manage this stage in your marriage is communication – not accusatory discussions, but constructive ones. You've now had some time to get over the shock of Paul's layoff, and you are both running the gamut of emotions. You need to regroup both emotionally and financially. You need a plan.

Sit down together and make a budget. Seeing numbers on paper not only makes it easier to plan, but once you see how much you need and how much you have, it's easier to find areas where you can trim. There's no question this will require a lifestyle adjustment, but in the grand scheme of things, this is a blip, albeit a big blip, in a lifelong marriage. Don't forget to make time to enjoy yourselves, too – a family outing, a walk in the park, ice skating, tobogganing, playing games. You need the fun stuff to balance out life.

Work together and support each other though this. It won't last forever. Just hunker down and ride it out together. You have a strong common goal: your family. Working together through this crisis will empower and strengthen your marriage. You can do this.

Kippah-Friday: proud to be a Jew!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A few weeks ago, I encouraged CJN readers to e-mail me to let me know if they were interested in being involved in a grassroots movement to fight anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiments. I received 10 responses.

Brothers and sisters, major Jewish organizations are slowly recognizing the need for an aggressive grassroots community mobilization strategy to defend ourselves and present our case in a very religious, yet paradoxically godless, time.

There is much to do, however, and everyone needs to be involved.

Now is the time to recognize that we need to let go of some of our material pursuits so as not to fall deeper into the comfort trap. We have a beautiful life in Canada, thank God, but some things are changing. It's time to step up.

How many of you were concerned with the following and tried to get involved in fighting these actions?

Israeli Apartheid Week, born in Toronto, and now co-ordinated in 40 cities around the world, is taking place at Ryerson University, the University of Toronto and York University as you read this. It's one week of virulent anti-Israel and anti-Semitic speeches, lectures and films "showing the true nature of Israeli Apartheid."

Sid Ryan, the president of CUPE Ontario, recently pushed through his union's resolution to boycott Israeli universities, an act called "shameful and fundamentally un-Canadian" by a local Jewish activist.

For years, you and I have ensconced ourselves in Holocaust education trying to answer questions such as, "How does hatred grow?" Remember how disturbing it was when you discovered how hushed the world was, including many of our own people? Remember when you swore you would fight if you were asked to become a Jewish soldier? Now you're being asked.

There are role models in our community, regular folk, who are responding to this call. One such person is Mel Korn, a Jewish businessman who authored a petition calling for Ryan's resignation. It garnered 13,000 signatures.

"I'm just your average middle-aged guy, trying to survive this economy, making sure my kids graduate into a good world," Mel said. "I am a Yid who found my voice."

Mel also called the office of the president of York University, after Jewish students were harassed on campus and a pro-Palestinian mob barricaded Hillel's lounge. (Yes, this happened in Toronto!) He told the president's liaison he would organize a grassroots campaign to discourage Jewish donors from making pledges unless action was taken. He let them know about his anti-CUPE petition.

"They were quite conscientious about answering my concerns," Mel said. "We as Jews have to say, 'I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take it anymore.'"

I urge you to approach your rabbi and major community organizations and request the creation of a committee whose sole mission is to determine ways of getting every congregant and member involved in this Jewish battle.

I ask you to approach our Jewish campus organizations and offer your services and presence during events where anti-Semitic crowds might be present.

I ask you to befriend decent people of all backgrounds so that they can recognize the true nature of Israel and the Jewish people – one of goodness and Shalom.

I call on you to show Jewish pride by wearing a kippah and/or a visible Magen David every Friday in March, even if this is not your tradition.

To be Jewish is to fight for justice. Fight, then, because you are a Jew.

E-mail me through my blog, avrum.net This grassroots movement is gaining momentum.

Living & Learning

Editorial

At The CJN, we tend to refer to the section of the paper you're reading as the education supplement. Its title, however – "Live & Learn" – may be a better reflection of its content.

Academic learning is enriched by a real-life component, just as life is often enhanced when lessons, not necessarily academic ones, are learned through experience.

In the supplement, which appears annually in our Purim issue, we meet the first deaf Jewish student to attend Yeshivat Or Chaim and feature a story on the ways in which teachers at pluralistic schools address and validate their students' individual takes on Jewish theology. Both stories contain implicit lessons on life in an increasingly diverse world.

An article about security at Jewish schools speaks to concerns related to the recent conflict in Gaza, while another piece looks at how Jewish schools make prayer meaningful for students.

Replacing praise with description, and how doing so benefits young children, was a concept I was unfamiliar with until I interviewed Vancouver preschool educator Debbie Lewin. Although she spoke to the paper in her professional capacity, she and I have a personal connection that goes back some 50 years.

We actually attended nursery school together in 1960, the year we turned four.

Next week the Jewish community celebrates Purim. Enjoy the colourful artwork in our centre spread, featuring the winning submissions from our annual Purim art contest, and Chag Samayach!

Pluralistic schools respect students' diverse views

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

One of the top priorities of Jewish school educators is to make sure that all students – regardless of their denomination or belief in God – have a strong Jewish identity, said Debbie Cohen Savage, Judaic studies co-ordinator at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

Cohen Savage, a modern Orthodox Jew who teaches Grade 6 at the pluralistic day school, said she and her colleagues teach students from senior kindergarten to Grade 8, some of whom are very strong believers in God, while others may not believe in God at all.

"My role… is to help teachers teach in a pluralistic way so that no student feels like they are not validated," she said.

"We are a God-believing school and we make that very clear, but what your concept of God is could be extremely different. They all need to be embraced as something that is valid."

She said the staff comprises both Orthodox and secular teachers who recognize that there is more than one way of being Jewish.

"No matter what your belief is, kids need to leave feeling proud of who they are and have a strong Jewish identity. That is the core of our teaching."

An example of the way Paul Penna teachers encourage diverse theological views is the way they expose students to prayer through a variety of lenses.

"They might try with their kids a few different kinds of Shema and ask the kids, 'Which one are you comfortable with?'" Cohen Savage said.

"The point of exercises like that is that the kids see that there is not one way of practising or reciting the Shema. You can do it with your eyes open, you can do it in English, you can stand, you can sit, you can drum it, you can move to it."

Each week, the students also participate in a discussion called "Awe-talk," during which teachers and students have the opportunity to delve into the prayers in an English discussion. But, Cohen Savage added, it doesn't always have to be about God and prayer.

"Some of the kids in my class went to a shiva, so we got into an amazing discussion about how Judaism approaches death and mourning and all the different rituals around a shiva. It is really a chance to have a spirituality-infused discussion within the classroom as opposed to just your traditional prayer service," she said.

Despite the emphasis on spirituality, Cohen Savage said there are many instances when students approach teachers about their struggle with a belief in God.

"If a student says, 'I don't believe in God and my parents don't believe in God,' what we've trained teachers to do – and it is difficult, especially if it goes against your own beliefs – is to say, 'That's OK. If you don't want to say the Shema to God, then why is it still important to say the Shema?… Why is it still important to pray?' They still see that a big part of Judaism is prayer and it doesn't necessarily have to be attributed to God."

Debbie Cohen Savage

She said that children naturally challenge everything and she encourages her students to question.

"Even adults are constantly struggling and it's OK to not know what exactly you believe yet, but to realize that there is still a place for prayer, there is still a place to be spiritual."

She said that one of the biggest challenges for the teachers is to break the habit of referring to God as a masculine being.

"They have to practice whenever they say God's name, to say God, say Hashem and not use the Lord, which is masculine, not use He," Cohen Savage said.

"What happens when you do that, is that especially for little kids, when you keep saying He, they develop a very concrete kind of image in their head, and because they are such creative thinkers at such a young age, we want them to come up with their own image."

The purpose of her school's pluralistic approach, Cohen Savage said, is to create "literate Jews" who can feel comfortable in any Jewish atmosphere.

"They can leave our school and walk into any synagogue, whether it is in Toronto or another country, and be able to adapt to what they're doing."

'A spirit of constructive discussion'

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, which serves students from grades 9 to 12, said that students who have differing beliefs in God is something that the teachers at TanenbaumCHAT are encouraged to deal with.

"CHAT is a pluralistic school. We are very proud that our faculty and our student body embrace a very wide diversity of views. We consider that to be a feature of our school."

He said the school's student body is about 13 per cent Orthodox, about 50 to 60 per cent Conservative and about 15 per cent Reform, plus there are other students who may not identify with those three denominations.

He said that although it has happened that students have clashed with their teachers over their differing beliefs, "we try to engender a spirit of constructive discussion in and outside our classroom, and if and when people disagree, I would hope that they are always able to disagree in a civilized manner."

Paul Shaviv

In a speech Shaviv gave at a TanenbaumCHAT staff retreat in 2005, he said, "There are occasional points where this delicate balance tips. They are regrettable, but realistically they are inevitable and not particularly common – in fact, they are surprisingly rare."

He said that teachers are welcome to give their own views in the classroom, as long as they identify them as such, and as long as they open their classrooms to a diversity of views and opinions.

"Ninety five per cent of the time, that works very well. We are not a dogmatic school. I think that is a large part of our success," Shaviv said.

School distinguishes between serious and non-serious Jews

"The only distinction we recognize among our students is between serious Jews and non-serious Jews. This school is in the business of educating serious Jews."

Shaviv said he defines a serious Jew as someone who "engages with their Jewishness in whichever dimension that takes, but it has to be a serious engagement based on knowledge, reflection and genuine curiosity…

"We consider that if you can't ask questions when you're a teenager, and if you can't express doubts when you're a teenager, when can you?"

Describe, don't praise, preschool educator advises

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In a society that reinforces praise as a route to a positive self-concept, most adults have a hard time accepting the idea that praising children is not always in their best interests, according to a Vancouver preschool educator.

Debbie Lewin, assistant director of the Vancouver Jewish Community Centre's early childhood education (ECE) department and its head of Judaic programming, said in a telephone interview, "When you say, 'Don't praise,' people feel that something is going to be missing."

Lewin, who has led workshops for both parents and ECE educators on subjects including positive language and praise, believes in using descriptive words instead, "to help children recognize what they accomplished."

Don't use "judgment words" like "good" or "bad," Lewin advises.

An alternative might be to say, "Look at that – you came down the slide all by yourself!" she suggested.

"It's about learning a new language. What are you doing when you say, 'Look at that?' You're asking the child to reflect."

Facial expression, tone of voice and body language can indicate that you are impressed, she added.

"You're noticing what they've done. You're acknowledging them, but you're also bringing it back to them... Their natural reaction should be, 'I did it!'"

As well, she said, if you describe what you see, it can open a conversation with the child.

Debbie Lewin

Lewin, a Toronto native who has been teaching in Vancouver for 23 years, said, "If you're always looking for praise from someone in order for you to judge who you are, you're not building your own sense of self. You're depending on someone else to tell you. But if you help children just reflect on what they've done, they're going to feel good about it for its own sake, and good about themselves because they're learning to acknowledge themselves."

Lewin first learned to question her tendency to praise from the preschool's past director, Roslyn Kushner Belle, who retired recently. "If she were to hear me say something such as 'I like the way you did....,'" she would comment, 'Why does it matter that you like it? It's much more effective to describe what you see.'"

As well, Lewin said, the work of Boston-based education and parenting author Alfie Kohn helped her understand the new approach.

She admits that, at first, she also struggled with the concept of not praising. "What kept coming to my mind when we tried to change our language was that I needed praise [as a youngster]. I needed my parents' approval."

But she came to the conclusion that it wasn't her parents' approval she needed, but more their acknowledgment.

"When you have very young children, they're totally dependent on their parents, so they do everything to please them. It's all about bonding.

"As you're growing into your own, it's probably good to want to be kind and do good things to please your family, but it should be more about doing something because it's the right thing to do."

Other approaches adults might substitute for praise include asking children to describe what they are doing – for example, their artwork – or even not reacting at all. "If they're really absorbed in something, interrupting it wouldn't be right."

Lewin, who has long been fascinated by children's sense of wonder and appreciation for life, said she wouldn't go so far as to tell parents never to praise children. "If it feels natural, and you're excited and you're proud, it's fine."

But she added a caveat. "This is where it gets tricky," she said. "People take that little bit of permission and they might keep praising. It's almost better to learn the new language of not praising, but rather acknowledging, and then when something happens and you just feel so proud, and you want to let the child know that, there may be a place for that."

Youth choir to record songs associated with holidays, prayers

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As part of Renanim Youth Singers 10th anniversary celebrations, they are embarking on a new project.

The Jewish community youth choir, directed by Susan Michaels, has been invited by Koltor Publishing, a company committed to Jewish interactive learning, to record the tfillot and songs associated with the yearly cycle of Jewish holidays and prayers.

The recordings will be incorporated in an interactive multimedia DVD-ROM, which will be distributed to students in congregational and day schools worldwide.

The project was developed in collaboration with rabbis, cantors, educators and lay leaders from the Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist movements.

Tzvi Taub, director of Koltor Publishing, said in a press release that he did not have to think hard about where to enlist help for the project.

"Choosing the Renanim Youth Singers to record this important collection of musical prayer was easy for me. The choir's spirited and soulful sound is inspirational, making it the perfect choice," he wrote.

The Renanim Youth Singers, above, include students from elementary school to Grade 12. Director Susan Michaels is in the back row, second from left.

Michaels, who is "humbled and grateful" for the recognition, said that it will be a multi-year undertaking for the choir. They will record the materials for grades 1 and 2 in 2009, grades 3 and 4 in 2010 and grades 5 to 7 in 2011.

"This is a natural for us. A core mandate of Renanim is to foster a love for the richness and beauty of our collective Jewish heritage through music, regardless of one's Jewish affiliation, level of religious observance or schooling," she said.

"Jewish music is the connective channel between emotional and intellectual communication. It taps into the inner soul, the neshamah, and develops a positive sense of Jewish identity and culture for these kids."

Working with the choir has been a labour of love, Michaels said. "Regardless of how high I set the musical bar, they always meet the standard, and then together we aim even higher.

"I have been given the privilege and joy of harnessing their extraordinary talent and enthusiasm. The kids take their music very seriously and can be counted on to perform and behave professionally during community events," she added.

The choir, Michaels said, is made up of students from elementary school to Grade 12 and represents the entire community. "We have members from every day school in the city and from many public schools."

She said she is working the new project into the choir's current rehearsal and performance schedule – they rehearse once a week – which also includes a second singing tour through Israel.

Other 10th anniversary celebrations include the launch of the choir's second CD, Israel at 60 – Despair to Triumph, featuring songs about the horrors of the Holocaust and about Israel and its accomplishments.

Or Chaim's first deaf student graduates this year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

For Joshua Soudakoff, the first and only deaf student at Yeshivat Or Chaim, everything does not revolve around his lack of hearing.

Speaking through an American Sign Language (ASL) interpreter, the Los Angeles native said in an interview at the school that deaf students have goals and aspirations just like hearing students do.

He has applied to university and is considering a career in law after he completes his undergraduate studies.

Soudakoff – whose father and mother, a computer programmer and an accountant respectively, are also deaf, as are his younger brother and sister – came to Toronto three years ago to attend Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid: the International Yeshiva High School for the Deaf and Hard-of-Hearing. The student population of the one-of-a-kind school includes North Americans, Israelis and Europeans.

Joshua Soudakoff

"I wanted to get a Jewish education that would be in sign language," said Soudakoff, whose first language was ASL. His mother, Sharon Ann, founded the Jewish Deaf Community Center (JDCC) in Los Angeles and runs Jewish holiday programs for the deaf community there.

Soudakoff takes his general studies courses at Or Chaim, where he is usually accompanied by an interpreter, although he has attended Shabbatonim without one.

The Grade 12 student has excelled in his studies, according to general studies principal Frank Samuels.

Samuels met with students and staff before Soudakoff started classes to ensure that there "would be buy-in" from everybody. "They were phenomenal," he recalled. "There was no hesitation."

The school also had a session for teachers on ASL, and some of the students have also learned enough sign language to communicate directly with Soudakoff.

Before moving to Toronto at age 15, Soudakoff attended a school for the deaf during the day and supplementary Hebrew school after hours, sometimes with an interpreter.

His enrolment at Or Chaim was motivated in part by his parents' desire for him to have exposure to the hearing world, he said.

"The first day, I was fairly nervous," he recalled. "I wasn't too sure how I was going to fit in."

"There's a lot of dependence on sound in Jewish life," Soudakoff noted. "Some people feel they need to hear to fit in."

In Los Angeles, he grew up attending Chabad services where there was no interpreter. "It was a small, comfortable environment, and the rabbi was very friendly."

Soudakoff lip-reads "a little bit," he said. "Really, I don't need an interpreter [in synagogue], because if I'm talking to God, it's between me and Him."

"I can usually look around and see the dynamic. You pick up on some of the subtleties." As well, he said, visual indicators such as the opening of the Aron Kodesh let him know what is going on.

During the school week, his interpreter is with him only when he is in class at Or Chaim. "I wish he could stay with me and do my laundry," Soudakoff quipped.

Or Chaim has been "very accommodating," Soudakoff said. He would advise other deaf students considering a similar move to work hard in school and make sure they have "a few good friends who can help you out" when necessary and let them know if they miss anything.

Outside of school, Soudakoff keeps in touch with his hearing friends by e-mail.

For hearing students, he would suggest trying to learn a little bit of sign language.

Although he is enthusiastic about his school experience and gave Toronto two thumbs up, Soudakoff was less excited about the winter weather here.

"I'm definitely not enjoying it, but I didn't come for the weather. I came for the academics… Whatever happened to global warming?"

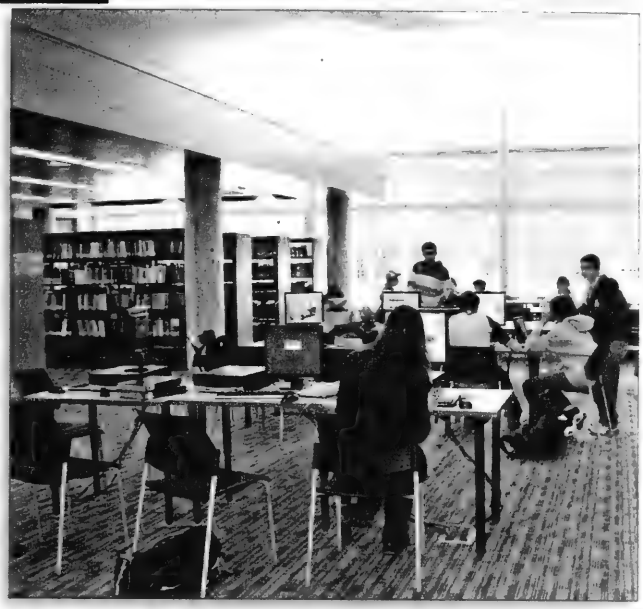
School libraries have an expanded role

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

School libraries have changed with the times and today they are much more than a repository of books.

Donna Schechter, a half-time teacher-librarian at United Synagogue Day School's (USDS) Bayview campus, describes the school library as a "warm space" filled with students engaged in reading or other related activities.



A typical scene in the library at TanenbaumCHAT's Kimel campus

"We're open three recesses a day. Sometimes you can't find room. The students sprawl themselves on the floor."

The Ida and Aaron Urman Library and Resources Centre, a facility the day school shares with Beth Tikvah Synagogue, is always being updated. Last summer, there was a major overhaul, Schechter says.

She and teacher-librarian Norma Appelton both work in the library, which offers programs from junior kindergarten through Grade 8. Regular weekly classes are scheduled for kindergarten to Grade 5.

"In the library, they develop reading, writing, speaking, listening and critical thinking skills," Schechter says. "We do all those things here."

She notes that the library sets a monthly theme for the junior school with different activities like reading magazine articles and poems, or doing math sheets and mazes. "My goal is to make the library the hub of the school."

Libraries promote literacy and research skills

Schechter stresses that one of the main roles of the library is to promote literacy. To that end, the library has initiated a school-wide reading session on Friday mornings. Every student does silent reading for 10 minutes. "Even the teachers participate. You see the kids reading with their feet up on chairs."

The library designated January as literacy month. Some of the themed activities it generated included collaborative storytelling, where each child contributes to the story to further the plot; dressing up as one's favourite literary character; and donating books to economically disadvantaged children.

Schechter, a teacher for more than 25 years and now in her third year as a teacher-librarian, can hardly contain her enthusiasm. "Working in the library is my passion," she says

She points out that in middle school, students use the library as needed, and most of the focus is on developing research and writing skills.

Promoting research skills is also one of the key roles of the libraries at both campuses of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's education centre, according to librarians Shirley Markman of the TanenbaumCHAT Wallenberg campus and Deborah Lambert of the TanenbaumCHAT Kimel campus.

Markman, who has been at TanenbaumCHAT for 20 years, has been working with librarian Elena Kvache since 1995.

Markman says she loves her work and welcomes the "tremendous changes" in the role of the librarian. "I've gone from keeper of books to information specialist."

She notes that the students are taught to use the library's collection of 15,000 books in Hebrew and English.

However, with the glut of information available, particularly online, a focus of her work is teaching critical thinking skills.

"The students need to sift and sort through the information... to find relevant information," she says. "They need to think critically to evaluate the information on the Internet. We give them a checklist so they see whether or not a site is a good academic source."

She says that the library subscribes "to carefully selected databases" with magazines and journals, and students are also encouraged to use the databases of the public library, which can be accessed through the Internet.

According to Markman, a key role of the librarian is to be a support to the students and teachers to enhance the curriculum. "We work closely with the teaching staff."

She says the teachers give the librarians assignments. "We research the topic to see what resources will be most useful... We show students which databases are appropriate."

She describes the library, which has 38 computers, as a busy place, where students often gather to do homework or assignments.

"We're filled to capacity most periods of the day."

The library at the TanenbaumCHAT Kimel campus – a wireless environment with 11 computers in the library and 25 in an adjacent room – also draws a lot of students, the librarian says. "It's a fantastic library. I think it's the most beautiful part of the school with all the glass and natural light."

For United Synagogue Day School, Beth Tikvah branch's literacy month celebrations, students listened to storytellers, took part in story contests and dressed up as their favourite storybook characters. From left are Grade 2 student David Ciss and senior kindergarten student Karen Ciss as characters from the Harry Potter series.

Lambert, who is assisted by Rabbi Ira Berman and Linda Costa, has been at the school since the beginning of this academic year. After a long stint as a medical librarian, she says she is pleased she made the switch to an academic environment.

"It's an opportunity to work with hard-working, motivated students. It's a privilege to have the opportunity to work here with such an excellent calibre of colleagues."

She says that new students get an orientation to the library in September to become familiar with the resources available to them. "We have a nice collection of print material."

Like Markman, Lambert stresses the importance of using databases at public libraries and teaching the students how to critically appraise online information sources.

She says helping students develop research skills is very gratifying. "I love what I do... I'm a lifelong learner and I want to instil that love of learning in the students."

Non-denominational private schools favoured by some Jewish parents

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish parents who want their children to get a private school education aren't feeling confined to choosing Jewish private schools.

With a number of options in the Greater Toronto Area, including Upper Canada College (UCC), Toronto French School (TFS), Crestwood School, Havergal College and The York School, some Jewish students opt for a non-denominational private school education.

Shane Altbaum, a former UCC student who studied there from Grade 7 until OAC, was a Jewish student at the school.

He said that when he asked his parents to switch him out of United Synagogue Day School (USDS), it sparked a debate within the family.

"I didn't like the Jewish day school system. It just wasn't for me. I told my parents I wanted to leave," said Altbaum, a 28-year-old recent law school graduate.

"It was a big issue. All my brothers were attending school at USDS for grade school and my brothers ended up at [The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto]. I was the first one, really, to not go to a Jewish high school."

He said that his parents, who raised a traditional family that keeps kosher and observes Jewish holidays, were concerned about whether their son would stay connected to Judaism if he went to a non-Jewish private school.

But in the end, they looked into UCC and suggested that school as an alternative.

Parents were concerned that son would lose connection to Judaism

He said that although it wasn't his parents' first choice to have him drop out of the Jewish day school system, they eventually gave in to the idea of having him at another private school.

"They weren't worried about anti-Semitism or anything like that, but they were concerned that I was going to lose my Yiddishkeit, my Jewish education, and if anything – it's funny – I think I found it more at UCC," Altbaum said, adding that there were still about four or five Jewish students in each class.

"At USDS, everyone was Jewish... and you don't think about being Jewish because everyone is Jewish. It kind of shelters you in that way. But when you go into a place like UCC, you know you're Jewish," he said.

UCC graduate Shane Altbaum

"You're forced to compare the way you were brought up thinking, with the fact that other people haven't been brought up the same way."

He said that made him confront the way his culture differed from that of his non-Jewish peers.

"When you see more of the colours of the multicultural mosaic, you see your own colour better. Keeping kosher for example, something I've done my whole life, at USDS it wasn't a big deal because a bunch of the kids keep kosher," Altbaum said.

"But at UCC, when I was keeping kosher and I would go out with the guys and they would be eating chicken wings and I'd be eating a fish sandwich, it was a part of me. Being Jewish was something that became more a part of my identity, and I was more proud of it, more proud of having my own [customs]."

He said that he doesn't know if his connection to Judaism would have been weaker had he started going to UCC at a younger age, because his parents are so traditional and reminded him and his siblings every day of their Jewishness.

He said his strong Jewish identity is probably a combination of his upbringing and his years at USDS, and he would consider sending his own kids to a non-Jewish private school on the condition that in their younger years, they would have a strong Jewish foundation and education.

Jess Thalman, a 20-year-old York University visual arts student, is also a product of the non-Jewish private school system, but her experience is very different from Altbaum's as she was enrolled in the Toronto French School for her entire pre-secondary education.

Jess Thalman

"My mom felt that I needed a bilingual, co-educational experience and non-denominational was the best way to go for me," Thalman said.

"We've always talked about whether TFS was the best decision for me and re-evaluating it and thinking about maybe transferring to another school."

Thalman said her mother often expressed that she would have liked her and her brother to go to a Jewish school, but she ultimately decided that French-speaking skills were more important.

"If my mom ever had doubts, she could teach us [about Judaism] herself or send us to Sunday school on the side."

She said she did attend Sunday school for a little bit, but she eventually stopped because even though her family observed the High Holidays and identified as culturally Jewish, she had trouble connecting to her Jewish heritage.

"In my grade, which was about 60 people, I think there were only about four other kids who were Jewish," she said, adding that she didn't have any Jewish friends growing up.

"When I was younger, I felt really disconnected from my Jewish culture and heritage. I never had a bat mitzvah. When I was growing up, I found it difficult to connect, but now that I have left TFS and I am on my own, I'm older, I find that reconnecting with it is much easier."

She said that once she graduated from TFS, she began to consciously seek out Jewish experiences in hopes of connecting to her Jewish roots.

"I do feel like being enclosed in that kind of preppy private school environment did have an effect. It was harder."

Since becoming a York student, Thalman joined Hillel and has visited Israel as a Birthright Israel participant.

Thalman said her desire to connect with her Jewish identity happened gradually because, as an artist, she wanted to self-reflect and find her own identity.

She said that if she is in a position to send her kids to private schools, she would choose non-denominational schools because she doesn't think religion is an integral part of a child's education.

"I think it should be separate. I still feel like if I have children, I will bring them up with cultural knowledge of my heritage, but I don't feel like religious schools in general are necessary."

EITZ CHAIM SCHOOLS
THE EITZ CHAIM Mission
Raising Children in the Derech HaTorah
Eitz Chaim's mandate is to imbue within all of our students a love of Torah, service of Hashem and a desire to do acts of kindness. This is what enables Eitz Chaim to achieve its goal of raising Talmidim and Talmidos in the Derech HaTorah.
Focusing on Every Child
Recognizing the uniqueness of each student, Eitz Chaim strives to offer a tailored approach to every pupil's needs that begins as early as pre-school. Our exceptional Rebbeim, Moros, teachers and our highly acclaimed resource staff allow Eitz Chaim to support the diverse educational needs of our student body.
Higher Standards of Achievement
Our graduates are accepted by their first choice of high schools, and go on to achieve distinction in their pursuits of higher learning. Working closely with Torah Umesorah, the Mercaz and other educational organizations, we endeavour to increase our effectiveness and constantly strive for higher achievement in all areas of our programming.

Jewish day schools always mindful of security

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In a world where terrorism, gangs, drive-by shootings and random acts of violence are sadly not uncommon, parents have to feel that their children will be secure at school when they drop them off in the morning.

Parents of children in Jewish day schools are no different, with one exception – the threat of terrorist acts is on their radar.

Doron Horowitz, director of community security for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said Jewish schools and campus groups are still on "heightened alert" due to the recent Israel-Gaza conflict.

Still, Jewish day schools have established protocols of behaviour and reaction for their staff and students in order to deal with almost any emergency.

School now has lockdown drills

Case in point, in June 2007, students and staff at Leo Baeck Day School's north campus were locked down after a brazen daytime robbery at the Promenade Mall – located about one block from the school – saw the armed suspect tramp across the day school's grounds, fire at officers from the schoolyard and threaten children as he attempted to evade the police.

Though he wasn't principal at the time, the school's current principal, Howard Laderman, said his institution is still recovering from the affair and has since implemented more comprehensive measures to deal with any future threats.

He said the new standard at Leo Baeck is to run one or two fire drills, lockdown rehearsals and evacuation practices every year.

Laderman added that prior to his hiring, the school's standard operating procedure didn't include lockdown drills because the school "didn't want to scare the children."

Howard Laderman, principal of Leo Baeck Day School

Lockdowns can occur for different reasons, Laderman said. "It could be for something as simple as a gas leak in the neighbourhood [or] for intruders inside or outside the building."

Laderman said his school lockdown procedures differ, depending on whether the threat is internal or external.

Recalling the Promenade Mall robbery, Laderman said external threats calls for a calm response in which "kids are kept in their classrooms, at their desks, and the doors are locked."

For internal lockdowns, meaning there's an intruder inside the school, he said teachers and students are required to go into their classrooms, go underneath their desks or into a corner. Classroom doors are covered with paper, so no one can see into the rooms.

"As part of our preparedness, our kids all now know that we have a... system," announced over the school's public address system during emergencies, he said.

Laderman said that in case a real emergency arises, various staff have been assigned to take charge of the phones and to liaise with police and emergency services.

He noted internal threats pose more of a challenge than external ones because "you really don't want people walking through the halls" if someone with malicious intent is also roaming about, he said.

Focus is on prevention, education and awareness

"So we use our public address system and cellphones to make sure everyone's where they're supposed to be, and if somebody's missing, then it's the principal and one delegate who will go looking for him," Laderman said. "It's a systematic and calm process that works very well here."

Horowitz has helped Leo Baeck and scores of other Jewish day schools beef up security and preparedness across the country.

Part of his mandate, he said, includes the safety and security for all Jewish schools and students in the city, from day schools to university campuses.

He has also written a security handbook that is used by many schools. However, given the sensitive nature of the information within it, Horowitz could not divulge specific strategies currently recommended to schools.

"But it certainly integrates terrorism and emergency management," he said. "In educating schools with security standards, guidelines, threat assessments and helping them conduct security drills... along with working closely with the school staffs... we help them adapt to the different threat levels and react with the appropriate measures."

Horowitz said much of his focus is on prevention, education and "situational awareness," to create a "culture of security awareness, so that we're not simply reacting" to incidents.

He said UJA Federation is "giving tachlis"(specific content) to the community and day schools.

"At the end of the day, the objective is that parents will send children to Jewish schools because they understand the federation is providing assistance... with money and expertise in security," he said. "I have a budget that is going towards Jewish schools and agencies for security and training to the best of our ability."

While he would not say what the budget was, Horowitz said that it has increased during his 3-1/2years in his position.

> Responses should be rational, not emotional

"But I am on the ground. I give schools accurate assessments as a professional," he said. "I'm probably the only community security director whose sole purpose is [to provide] the operational expertise and intelligence [and] to give accurate guidelines and recommendations" to the community.

Horowitz said he has been in the business of protecting the Jewish community for more than 20 years.

"Schools have received, are receiving and will continue to receive policies and protocols regarding emergency procedures" from his office, he said.

"I've also incorporated the police in this platform, so they have a better understanding of what we're doing... and can better respond," Horowitz said. "The average police officer [now] knows where the Jewish schools are and understands the threats of modern-day terrorism or radical Islam's modus operandi, and how schools could be affected."

As a last piece of advice, Horowitz said all security responses need to be guided by "rational" responses and not emotional ones.

"They need to be pragmatic," he said. "Because if I have a plan that nobody can follow, then it doesn't matter. Which is why I work very closely with the schools on a personal basis. I continue to be a resource to all Jewish communities across Canada."

DANI helps special needs youths develop skills

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

DANI worker Mike Goldberg entertains summer camp participants with his guitar. [Andrew Laszlo–Twins Photo and Video photo]

Preparing a meal, setting a table for dinner, stuffing envelopes, shopping for necessities or gifts, reading a story – these are the kinds of skills we take for granted and expect any teenager to have more or less mastered.

But for some young adults with disabilities, these basic life skills can be a challenge. Enter DANI, a grassroots organization dedicated to enhancing the quality of life of special needs children and integrating them within the Jewish community.

Formed in 2005 by parents with special needs children, DANI offers a number of programs throughout the week in pursuit of its mandate: Develop And Nurture Independence.

Young adults (most range in age from 21 to 27) participate in DANI's "lifestyle group" from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. Their day includes morning prayers, Jewish learning, kosher meals, outings and sports.

"Independence and life skills are really big in our vocabulary," said Kathy Laszlo, co-founder and co-director of DANI, along with Susie Sokol. "Nobody sits here to do nothing."

DANI's clients – six participate in the weekday events, the number grows to 16 on weekends – meet at a rented house in the Bathurst Street and Sheppard Avenue area that serves as the organization's learning centre. Morning prayers launch each day, followed by a lesson on a Judaic topic.

Monday is "recreational day," which could see the group head to an aquatic centre for a swim, followed by a trip to a public library for a reading class to develop literary skills, Laszlo said.

Monday concludes with basketball games – the boys play at Yeshivat Or Chaim, the girls at Ulpanat Orot. The games are so popular with the wider community that "we have more volunteers than clients," Laszlo said. "They love to come… If you see 25 guys in the gym, I'm sure you can't point out who's who. They just need to be together. They're just guys. Who cares if they can read or not, or brush their teeth or not. Some of the clients are great players and some of the volunteers are not. It's hard to see who is abled and who is disabled."

Wednesday is the cooking and baking day. Clients make pizza and Israeli salad (which entails lots of chopping), bake muffins and prepare soups, pasta and falafel. Guests are invited for lunch and the clients serve and clean up, Laszlo said.

"On Wednesday, we turn the place into a mini-restaurant," she said.

Fridays, which end early for Shabbat during the winter months, sees the clients making challah and enjoying a Kabalat Shabbat program. Sometimes, the day includes a community-oriented program, like visiting seniors, or a lifestyle event such as shopping or an outing to a mall.

Gala dinner will be held this month

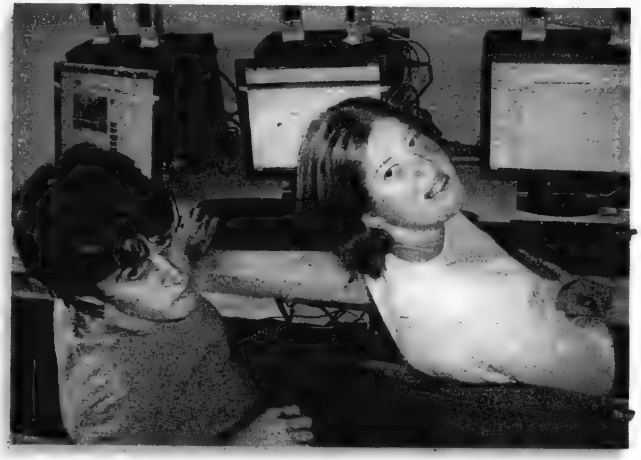
Sundays are DANI's most popular day in terms of participation. Programming begins at 1 p.m. to accommodate families that take part in Chabad-Lubavitch's Friendship Circle. Participants transfer "seamlessly" to DANI's facility for programs that continue to 4 p.m. That offers stressed families almost a full day of respite, Laszlo said.

Recently, the Sunday clients enjoyed "chesed day," which was designed to teach the value of charitable work. Everyone contributed $5 and the clients ventured to a dollar store to shop for basic items such as toiletries and cards, which were distributed to Yellow Brick House, a shelter for women and children, along with a note saying, "We're thinking about you."

"It is very important for our kids to feel they can give back to their community," said Laszlo. "Usually, they are receiving."

Recently, the group celebrated Tu b'Shvat, Israel's arbour day, with a seder led by a rabbi. Other programs include a TTC trip downtown "for subway training."



Danny Laszlo, left, visits WindReach Farm as part of DANI's summer camp program. Racheli Feinstat, far right, and Talya Sokol take part in a computer skills program.

DANI receives no government or community funding. Clients' families pay $60 per day during the week, and $40 on Sunday. Clients receive lunch and snacks. These sums cover only a portion of the costs, which includes rent to the Magen David Sephardic Congregation (DANI is located in what used to be the rabbi's home) and salaries for two professional staff. The organization supplements its income from private donations and its annual gala dinner. This year's event will be held on March 25 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Laszlo said a cookbook is being planned, including celebrity recipes and stories about the clients.

Preparing meals is certainly a big part of the life-skills development stressed at DANI. It's also part of a long-term plan. "We do it with the future in mind," said Laszlo. "Our plan is, God willing, not so far down the road to open a coffee house/restaurant. So we're training the kids to work in such an environment."

Integrating clients into the job market is also part of DANI's long-term goals. "We would love to have our clients get employment or volunteer positions, but to do that you need the right environment. They need support to get there, to do the best they can to the best of their abilities."

Laszlo said that can be accomplished if a liaison person tags along to act as a "buffer… between the client and the workplace."

In the meantime, DANI will continue to serve "all kinds of clients with all different levels [of skills]. We change the environment so they can function the best they can," Laszlo said.

Live & Learn

Helping children understand importance of prayer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The story is told that soon after the Holocaust ended, Rabbi Eliezer Silver and Dayan Grunfeld were trying to reclaim Jewish children who had been hidden in convents and Christian orphanages. Some of the rescuers denied that they had any Jewish children.

Only when the rabbis began to sing the Shema, did the children, long separated from their roots, cover their eyes, as is traditional during part of the Shema, and cry for their mothers.

Such is the power of prayer.

For Jews, prayer is a hallmark of our faith. The conclusion of Unetaneh Tokef on Rosh Hashanah avers that prayer, along with repentance and charity, will annul any bad decrees God had planned.

Adults recognize this. We may pray as part of our daily religious routine, on a yahrzeit, for health, for a spouse, for our children's welfare, for comfort.

But one question often asked is how to make children appreciate the significance of prayer.

Youngsters these days, after all, are accustomed to instant gratification, and realize very early that material things come from the adults around them.

Rabbi Ephraim Applebaum has been a Hebrew studies teacher at Eitz Chaim Schools in Toronto for many years. Prayer is part of the school's daily routine. Children, he said, are inspired by stories about the power of prayer, about specific reasons to pray, such as for someone who is ill, for Israel, for the poor.

Along with this, they must see that praying is a serious thing. "Just as one must be quiet and pay attention in science class, so too they must learn to behave the same way during davening. They have to see that it is not a joke, that one needs to show respect."

Children learn by having role models, Rabbi Applebaum said, both in school and at home. He added wryly that they should learn that during prayer, one should pray – not discuss baseball or the stock market.

Rabbi Moshe Yeres, vice-principal of Jewish studies at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's northern campus, said that high school students are able to grasp a higher level of thinking, such as whether God really needs us to pray, why we need prayer altogether, and a truly difficult concept – what happens if prayer doesn't work?

TanenbaumCHAT Kimel campus students pray at the morning minyan.

Attendance at the daily Shacharit and Minchah services are optional, he said, although many students come for the camaraderie, or just because they want to. They lead the services, including reading from the Torah on the appropriate days and giving a weekly dvar Torah on Fridays, experiences they find very positive.

Certain prayers are highlighted, Rabbi Yeres noted, such as Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut services, as are noteworthy events, such as the recent Mumbai massacres and last year's attack on the Mercaz Harav yeshiva in Jerusalem.

Praying is not a subject like Gemarah, for which you can gauge and assign a mark indicating a student's improvement or proficiency, he said.

Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president of the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto (Mercaz), said one must recognize that children "can pray in different ways, and learning tfillah, prayer, must be as differentiated as any other learning. Some pray with silence, others with a picture in their mind, others through music. Some use a siddur with ease, others need their own words."

Small children, Epstein said, need a concrete context for prayer. For instance, he suggested, it might help them to connect the mezonot blessing for foods such as cake or other bread-like items with the aroma of chocolate chip cookies baking.

Like both Rabbi Applebaum and Rabbi Yeres, Epstein stressed the importance of modelling.

"A teacher of tfillah must be comfortable in the world of tfillah and offer a model to his or her students."

Hamas claims to have film of Schalit

— Israel has no information about videotape —

By AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A senior official in the Prime Minister's Office said Monday that Israel does not know anything about a new Hamas videotape showing abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit, Israel Radio reported.

The official said Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is using every possible avenue to ensure Schalit's release and will do so until the end of his tenure.

Hamas deputy political bureau chief Moussa Abu Marzouk is in possession of the videotape showing Schalit, who appears in good health, the Kuwaiti newspaper Al Jarida reported Monday.

Hamas associates say the videotape was handed to the Syrian-based Abu Marzouk by Ahmed Jabari, the head of the Hamas military wing, during Abu Marzouk's secret visit to the Gaza Strip late last month.

Aviva Schalit stands in a protest tent on behalf of her captive son, Gilad, opposite the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. [Israel photo]

In addition, Abu Marzouk received a letter handwritten by Schalit, which he then turned over to the Syrian foreign ministry. Abu Marzouk has decided to hold onto the videotape for the time being.

The report said the contents of the tape would be released only after significant progress is made in prisoner exchange negotiations. Abu Marzouk also informed Egyptian officials of the tape's existence.

The public campaign for Schalit's release shifted gears this week as the soldier's parents, Noam and Aviva Schalit, erected a protest tent in front of the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. The move is meant to apply pressure on Olmert to expedite Schalit's release before his term in office ends later this month.

Schalit's parents left their home in the Galilee to set up the protest tent. "We are leaving the house with very tough feelings. We are leaving in order to save Gilad," Noam Schalit said.

Hadassah president beaten in Barbados

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) members and the entire Jewish community are praying for Terry Schwarzfeld, 60, national president of the organization, who, along with her daughter-in-law, Luana Cotsman, was severely beaten Feb. 28 while vacationing in Barbados.

The pair was walking along an isolated stretch of beach at 4 p.m. when they were approached by a would-be robber. When they told him they had nothing to give him, he attacked them with a piece of wood.

Schwarzfeld, who is from Ottawa, was knocked unconscious by one or two blows to the back of her head. She was taken to Queen Elizabeth Hospital in St. Michael, Barbados, and airlifted back to Canada March 4, where she is being treated at Ottawa Hospital.

As of earlier this week, she was still unconscious and in critical condition, and was being heavily sedated to reduce the swelling and internal bleeding in her brain.

Cotsman, from Guelph, Ont., was also knocked unconscious, but she regained consciousness while still on the beach and was treated in hospital overnight.

Lybron Sobers, assistant superintendent of the Royal Barbados Police Force, told The CJN that "several people have been questioned about the assault," but as of The CJN's deadline, no suspect had been arrested.

Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), called the attack an unfortunate, tragic incident, but he said that it is "an exception."

The News in Brief

Canada

Canada Stands In

OTTAWA — Canada is representing Israel's diplomatic interests in Venezuela after its president, Hugo Chavez, expelled Israel's diplomats during the Gaza war. Thornhill MP Peter Kent, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs (Americas), told the Dominion newspaper that "Canada has agreed to represent Israel's interests in Venezuela," as it does for Israel in Cuba, Kent said.

Cotler To Lead March

OTTAWA — Liberal MP and former federal justice minister Irwin Cotler will lead a rally April 21 at the gates of Auschwitz to protest the followup to the 2001 United Nations anti-racism conference. To lead the rally, being organized by the March of the Living organization, Cotler will leave Geneva, site of the Durban Review Conference, where he will be at conferences countering the anti-racism forum, the March of the Living announced. Canada, Israel and the United States have boycotted the Durban Review Conference because they say it will be a repeat of the 2001 parley, which Jewish groups criticized as anti-Israel and anti-Zionist. March leaders are urging other countries to boycott the conference, slated for April 20-24 in Geneva.

Prof Faces Charge

REGINA — A former math professor at the University of Saskatchewan who heads the National Socialist Party of Canada has been charged with contempt of court for disobeying a Canadian Human Rights Commission order to stop posting hate online. Terry Tremaine faces a charge brought forward by Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman that he posted racist and anti-Semitic material, despite a 2007 order. The material reportedly describes Jews as "highly evolved parasites" and calls for their extermination.

World

Iranian Assets Seized

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina seized five Iranian properties in the Buenos Aires area last week. Justice Minister Alberto Nisman, who heads a probe of the 1994 AMIA Jewish community centre bombing, ordered the seizure. He said the seizure, along with six other Iranian properties seized in 2008, will meet the demands of attack victims' relatives and survivors. If the Iranian owner of the property is found guilty in the attack, his property will be sold and the money given to the victims' survivors. A survivor who was severely injured in the attack on the Buenos Aires centre is seeking $1 million in a civil action. The survivor says the attack was planned by former leaders of Iran and carried out by the Lebanon-based group Hezbollah.

Muslim Man Fined For Killing Jew

SANAA — A Yemen court ruled that a Muslim convicted of killing a Yemeni Jew is mentally incompetent and ordered him to pay a fine.

Retired Yemen air force pilot Abdul Aziz Yahya Hamoud al-Abdi, 39, must pay a fine of about $250,000 (US), the court ruled March 2, for the December murder of Moshe Yaish Nahari, a Hebrew teacher and father of nine.

Abdi had shouted "I am not mad" in the courtroom after his attorneys presented an insanity defence – the same defence that saved him from prison five years ago after he killed his wife. Abdi had told police that he had sent a message to Jews in the neighbourhood that they should either convert to Islam or be killed.

Following the murder, the Yemeni government last month paid to relocate the Jews living in Amran to the capital of Sanaa in order to better protect the community. Some Jews were refusing to move, according to a Yemeni news report. A few hundred Jews still live in Yemen.

Café Owner Sorry

AUCKLAND — A New Zealand café owner who evicted two Israelis from his establishment during Israel's invasion of Gaza apologized. Mustafa Tekinkaya, a Turkish-born Muslim, told Natalie Bennie and her visiting sister, Tamara Shefa, to leave his Mevlana Cafe in Invercargill on the southern tip of New Zealand's South Island after he heard them speak Hebrew to each other.

Waltz With Cesar

PARIS — Waltz With Bashir became the first Israeli film to win a Cesar, a French Oscar. It won a Golden Globe in January but failed to become Israel's first Academy Award winner for best foreign film, despite being favoured. The animated docu-drama about director Ari Folman's experiences in the 1982 Lebanon war was well received in France.

Pius Document Found

ROME — The Vatican last week produced another document to bolster its assertion that Pope Pius XII worked behind the scenes to save Jews in World War II. Vatican Radio said a 1943 document found in a convent in Rome listed the names of 24 people who were to be sheltered by nuns there, in accordance with the pope's desire. Vatican Radio said the document was dated November 1943, just weeks after German occupiers deported 2,000 Roman Jews to Auschwitz. The Vatican said the document provides written evidence of Pius' directives. Jewish critics and other historians have said Pius turned a blind eye to the fate of Jews in the Shoah and want Pope Benedict to delay Pius' beatification until the issue is clarified.

Italy Nixes Durban II

BRUSSELS — Italy is pulling out of the Durban II UN anti-racism conference. Foreign Minister Franco Frattini disclosed the decision March 5 in Brussels, where he was attending a meeting of NATO foreign ministers. Frattini said the decision was made because of "aggressive phrases of an anti-Semitic nature" that were "totally unacceptable" in the draft of a final document to be approved at the Durban Review Conference, which takes place April 20-24 in Geneva. He said the statements "must be eliminated," and that Italy would not take part unless the draft document is changed. The United States has set the same condition to attend, while Israel and Canada also have withdrawn.

Federation downsizes Mercaz, cuts 10 jobs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Local Jewish educators are expressing concern over a restructuring plan for the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz) that was announced last week, and questions have been raised about details that have yet to be made public.

The plan will eliminate 10 full-time jobs and leave the Mercaz with only four full-time staff in a move that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto says is intended to provide more direct funding to its beneficiary schools.

Last Wednesday, in an e-mail to 20,000 people in its data bank – and in a conference call to lay and professional heads of Jewish schools that took place 90 minutes before the e-mail was sent – federation announced that it would be "streamlining" the Mercaz, the successor to the old Board of Jewish Education, while at the same time increasing financial support for Jewish education.

Although school leaders were not consulted about the decision per se, federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN that "we're in touch all the time with the education community and with senior educators. They [have] told us that the people who work at the Mercaz are fine, wonderful, dedicated, committed people, but there had to be a change in the way service delivery took place."

As well, English said, "if the [conference] call [had] generated opinions that would have led us to scrap [the announcement], we would have listened."

Redirects savings to education funding

In the call, the changes to the Mercaz were presented as the federation's "intention," and questions and thoughts were requested, he said.

April 3 will be the last day on the job for 10 full-time and two contract employees at the Mercaz, English said. As well, 2-1/2 people (two full-time and one half-time employee) have been reassigned to other duties at the federation, he said.

Four employees will remain on the job, English said. "The likely scenario" is that two of them will be education specialists, he added.

Seymour Epstein, the federation's senior vice-president for the Mercaz, "has been offered a senior position related to Jewish education, with UJA Federation," English said.

Epstein declined to comment for this article, and English would not say which employees are being let go. He did not include Epstein among the 10 full-time employees who will be losing their jobs.

Lou Greenbaum, chair of the Mercaz, said he didn't think it was "appropriate" for him to discuss the changes.

A news release said that employees who will no longer be part of the Mercaz "are being treated sensitively and generously." English said the federation has hired a company to provide relocation counselling, and they will receive "some kind of separation package."

The changes do not have to do with the recent economic downturn and will not save the federation money, English said. "The money being saved is going to direct support for Jewish education."

A report by the federation's task force on Jewish education led to the creation of the Mercaz two years ago. The entity had previously been called the Board of Jewish Education.

This year's restructuring was deemed necessary by "lead professional and lay people at the federation, including lead lay people at the Mercaz," English said. No educational professionals were involved in the decision, he added, but Epstein "was informed about our intentions a week to 10 days before the announcement was made."

The decision was preceded by several months of ongoing discussions and was approved by the federation's executive committee and board, English said.

Among concerns expressed by school leaders was the maintenance of financial assistance for supplementary schools, English said. He told The CJN that funding for supplementary schools and special needs education would

Canadians, community, education

From the editor's desk...

Last week in this space I wrote about the annual assessment by the Jerusalem-based Jewish People's Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) of the state of the worldwide Jewish community.

As our readers know, an ongoing worry of the scholars at the institute has been over the quality of Jewish education.

They do not worry less this year. "The quality of Jewish education – in Israel and abroad – is of growing concern to those who worry that ignorance about basic history, culture, and tradition has a corrosive effect on Jewish identity and, ultimately, threatens the survival of the Jewish People… Our policy recommendation… is for Jewish leadership worldwide to devote resources toward educational research, evaluation, international exchange and institutional innovation."

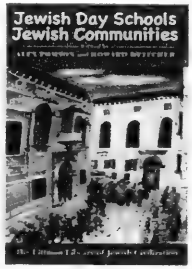
On the subject of Jewish education, it can be said that Canadian educators and lay people have been among the most active in the world. Given the number of Jews in Canada, this is not merely an expression of narrow parochial pride, but rather an important observation about how small numbers can do large things.

Some five years ago, The CJN wrote about the distinguished work Visions of Jewish Education (Cambridge University Press). One of the three co-editors was the Canadian-Israeli, Daniel Marom. Marom is the director of the Visions of Jewish Education Project of the Mandel Foundation in Jerusalem and a senior researcher there. He has published numerous books, articles and curricula in the area of Jewish and Zionist education in Israel and America.

More recently, and much closer to home, The CJN wrote about the Lola Stein Institute. Founded in 2003, the joint initiative of extraordinary lay leaders and professional educators in Toronto, the institute sprang from a desire to develop and enshrine the best of the integrative approaches and experiences at the Toronto Heschel School. The institute develops curricula and teacher training guides and publishes other educational texts that are suitable for schools across denominational divides.

Indeed, schools and teachers from other jurisdictions are beginning to take note of the institute's materials and its innovative ideas. The institute has already won wide praise from academic and educational institutions across North America.

And most recently, just weeks ago, a new publication about Jewish education has appeared that deserves the attention, as the JPPPI writers would say, of Jewish leadership. And once again, Canadians figure prominently. Jewish Day Schools, Jewish Communities: A Reconsideration is edited by Alex Pomson and Howard Deitcher (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 2009).



Pomson is a senior lecturer at the Melton Centre for Jewish education at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Though not a Canadian, before his aliyah Pomson was the Koschitzky family chair of Jewish teacher education at York University in Toronto, where he co-ordinated the Jewish teacher education program. Deitcher, a former Montrealer, is the director of the Melton Centre and a senior lecturer at the school of education at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Both are recognized scholars in the field. When they speak on the subject, people usually listen. When they write, people usually read.

The book is a compilation of some of the papers delivered at an international conference they convened in 2006 that explored the "community-building potential in Jewish day schools for students, their families and societies." It contains 21 essays by educators around the world – scholars, thinkers and administrators – that touch upon myriad, discrete aspects of the community-school relationship. In truth, the collection is geared more to the professional than the lay individual, for the essays are thick files of uncondensed observations and conclusions.

But Pomson states very plainly why he believes the community-day school connection must be studied: "The constituent components of community ultimately provide the raison d'être for Jewish day school education. Without community… the Jewish day school has no meaning or purpose." Of course, he also delves into the multiple aspects that comprise the notion of "community."

Like the book Visions of Education, the ongoing pedagogical works of the Lola Stein Institute and undoubtedly many other valuable works dedicated to the enhancement of Jewish education, the Pomson-Deitcher work is potentially an important instrument in the hands of our community leaders to strengthen the constantly strained sinews holding tight the education of our children.

Pomson and Deitcher state categorically that "components of community unite the schools." If their conclusions are correct, the innumerable ties and pathways interconnecting community and schools must be intensified and reinforced.

Since 2002, 112 Canadian soldiers and one diplomat have died in the Afghanistan mission. — MBD

Some educators 'concerned' by Mercaz restructuring be maintained and "hopefully" increased in the upcoming 2009-2010 fiscal year beginning July 1, depending on the amount of revenue raised in this year's UJA campaign.

He said the federation is confident that it will reach or come very close to last year's total of $66 million. As of last week, "close to $62 million" had been raised, English said.

For the 2008-2009 fiscal year, an extra $180,000 was budgeted for Jewish education, and the federation is "going to provide another $320,000" in the coming year, he said.

The money is already budgeted, and is "coming from donor revenue available to UJA Federation," English added.

When asked to be more specific, he answered, "I can't say it's coming from one particular source. It's a very complex process. Increases are achieved through cutting in many other ways… One of the ways is not rehiring when people leave voluntarily. We've done some internal cost cutting when it comes to seemingly small things like long distance calls and paper supplies and photocopies. We've instituted efficiencies. We're looking at every area of our operation."

According to last week's news release, a substantial sum has been "set aside, in reserve, for Jewish education, depending on campaign revenue."

"Substantial," in this context, means "over $1 million," English said. "It will be applied on a case-by-case basis for worthy programs and services that the schools in conjunction with us want to undertake."

According to the news release, federation "will be embarking on a renewed partnership with community day schools by enhancing their capacity to provide direct education services, rather than receiving services supplied by the Mercaz."

For example, English explained, "it is the schools in consultation with UJA Federation that will determine that they want to continue the Rikudiya [annual dance festival] and Zimriya [annual song festival], and together we will determine how that will be provided. One school could take the lead in providing a program or service to the community, or it could be outsourced, for example, to the faculty of Jewish studies at York [University] or the University of Toronto. The principle is the schools themselves, in partnership with us, will be supplying direct educational services to the community that were supplied for them by Mercaz."

Commenting in the news release on the change, UJA Federation president David Koschitzky said the new approach "demonstrates confidence in Toronto's excellent day schools.

"Our modern, dynamic educators have reached the point where they do not need us to deliver services. Instead, capacity-building is one of their most significant requirements."

The "new Mercaz" will likely focus on "administration of tuition subsidies, educational consultation at the schools, and liaison with the schools in a capacity-building forum," English said

The model is similar to the one the federation uses for its social service agencies, he added.

He said the changes at the Mercaz constitute "a bold, progressive move that will significantly benefit the community by redirecting money from overhead cost to direct financial support. It will be directed to the education system and not to a department that is overseeing an education system.

"Our commitment to Jewish education is genuine and it's deep, and it's ongoing."

Shana Harris, head of school at Bialik Hebrew Day School, said she was "concerned, because it's not clear to me what the new model will be and what the impact will be" on day and supplementary schools.

Many of the services that the Mercaz has coordinated and provided in the past are "critical," she said, citing as one example its Board of Licence that certified Jewish studies teachers.

As well, Harris said, the Midrasha L'Morim ran courses for all teachers in pedagogy and programming, and the Mercaz worked with York University to provide special education qualifications, which was especially significant for Jewish studies teachers.

English told The CJN there will continue to be a Board of Licence and there will be a Midrasha.

Taking on new responsibilities will "certainly… require extra staff or time" for the schools, Harris said. "Schools are [already] stretched in providing professional development and finding time to do all the programs we want to do internally."

Martin Lockshin, a York University professor and a co-founder of its Jewish teacher education program with Michael Brown and Syd Eisen, also said he was "very concerned.

"I think that something real was accomplished by having a strong central authority for Jewish education here in town." He disagreed with Koschitzky's assessment that educators no longer need service delivery from the Mercaz.

Lockshin said he thinks that "more than skeleton operations are necessary." He noted the importance of the Mercaz annual professional development day, its pedagogic library and film library that's used by teachers throughout the Jewish school system, and its mentoring services for teachers.

While mentoring can take place at individual schools, he said, he noted that new teachers may be reluctant to let their own principal know that they don't know how to do something.

The Mercaz has been "a safe place to go," Lockshin said. "I'm worried that's going to be lost."

In some ways, the Mercaz has been "even more crucial" for supplementary school teachers, he added.

Mark Smiley, director of education at Associated Hebrew Schools, said he believes that all the Jewish schools are "nervous that this will negatively impact on our ability to do high-level professional development without incurring significant additional cost to our professional development budget lines."

Associated was involved in two high-level professional development projects with the Mercaz that Smiley said he hoped would continue. One, held in conjunction with United Synagogue Day School and Bialik, related to making the school more child-centred, and the other involved Judaic studies teachers at Associated's middle school, he said.

"I think that outgoing leadership of the Mercaz were successful in – almost across the board – trying to raise standards and make the schools focus more on quality, delivering child-centredness and professionalism," Smiley said.

"I am hopeful that the reorganization of the Mercaz will leave in place a strategic forum for the planning for Jewish education, and while I believe there is an improvement in school-based leadership and excellence, most principals will agree that having outside support is essential for maintaining quality in the system."

Syd Eisen – a York University professor emeritus who founded the school's Centre for Jewish Studies and its Jewish teacher education program, and who is also a life member of the boards of both TanenbaumCHAT and Associated – said that, based on the minimal information he had, he was "delighted" to hear about an increase in tuition subsidies and hoped there would be enough funding to include some of the smaller schools.

However, he added that he was "concerned about what looks like the disintegration of the central body of professionals and handing off responsibilities to the schools.

"The schools have their job, which is to educate students. The central body's job is [to take an] overall view of quality, bringing in new things, running system-wide programs…. You need a body of professionals to do those things."

Frank Samuels, general studies principal at Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot and chair of the Association of Principals of Jewish Day Schools of Toronto, said that the Mercaz's services were geared more to elementary schools than high schools like his own.

He said he is "very excited about the possibility of working with Mercaz as a service provider as we create our own professional development," but he added that he doesn't have "nearly enough time, given the demands of my own school.

"I know how difficult it is to embrace change, but I think that we're all going to be stronger as a result of this," Samuels said. "I say that with a really sad heart for the people who are no longer working."

JEWISH EDUCATION SERVICES
AN OPEN LETTER TO THE COMMUNITY

Dear Jewish Community Member:

We are writing to tell you about an important change in services provided by UJA Federation to our funded Jewish schools. It is an approach that will substantially reduce overhead and increase our financial support. It is also an initiative that is unrelated to currently poor economic conditions, for which discussions began before the current economic downturn.

Here are the key changes:

- Enhancing Financial Support for Jewish Education - UJA Federation's total formal Jewish education commitment is already over $14 million. Now, we will be increasing tuition subsidies by $500,000 over the next year and a half, in addition to an extra $2 million in direct assistance for Jewish schools provided last year, through the Julia & Henry Koschitzky Fund and matching allocations.
- Supporting Supplementary & Special Needs Education - We will be maintaining and, hopefully, enhancing existing funding for special needs and supplementary education.
- A New Fund for Other Education Projects - We will be setting aside a substantial sum of money in reserve for Jewish education initiatives, depending on campaign revenue.
- Reducing Education Overhead Costs - The Mercaz, UJA Federation's education department, will be restructured with a streamlined professional staff, supplemented by other UJA Federation professionals when required. All staff members who will no longer be part of the new Mercaz are being treated generously and sensitively. By reducing overhead costs, we can enhance financial support for Jewish education to which we are deeply committed.
- Strengthening Our Day Schools - We will be strengthening the capacity of our affiliated day schools to provide direct education services, rather than receiving services supplied by the Mercaz. This philosophy, known as capacity building, meets the needs of contemporary, dynamic day school administrators and educators, who no longer require a central agency to supply services for them.
- Encouraging Innovative Educational Programs - We are going to work with all our affiliated schools in a spirit of true partnership to develop a list of required educational services and programs for the community, and then determine the best way to provide them. The process will be creative, collaborative, responsible and flexible, with the community's needs taking precedence.

These changes represent an exciting, innovative development. It will solidify Toronto's reputation as a world leader in Jewish education and expand our profound commitment to this critical cause, thanks to the support and generosity of our community.

We welcome your questions and suggestions. Please e-mail info@ujafed.org.

Gaza and surreal theatre

Last Monday, in the elaborate elegance and stunning luxury of the finest conference room in Egypt's resort town of Sharm el-Sheikh, the representatives of some 80 countries and international organizations met to discuss and pledge funds for the rebuilding of Gaza.

The Palestinian Authority had hoped to raise $2.78 billion (US). By the end of the day, however, they had received promises of donations totalling $5.2 billion. According to Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit, $4.48 billion of that total represented new pledges. The remainder comprised previous pledges that donors recommitted to giving. He described the figure as being "beyond our expectations."

Canada contributed $4 million.

In announcing the Canadian contribution, Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon said: "We stand firmly behind the direction set by President Mahmoud Abbas toward a well-governed, democratic and prosperous Palestinian state living side-by-side in peace with Israel. We believe just as firmly that it is not in the Palestinian people's interest for terrorist organizations such as Hamas to launch rocket attacks on Israeli civilians." (Our emphasis)

There, in pointed, elegant understatement, Cannon pointed to the very large white-black-green-and-red elephant not sitting in the luxurious conference room.

Gaza is ruled by a regime that has never shown any interest in building up or developing Gaza. It prefers to focus its energies on a policy of genocide toward its Jewish neighbour. Indeed, in the past, it has focused a great deal of energy on killing Fatah members as well.

Thus, the obvious question begs to be asked: to whom in Gaza are the billions of reconstruction funds to be given? Who will administer, manage and oversee the rebuilding of Gaza?

Two days before the statesmen and NGO officials gathered at the luxurious resort, a Qassam rocket slammed into a school in Ashkelon. The day before the meeting, three Qassam rockets struck southern Israel, one sparking a fire in Sderot. Last Thursday a Grad rocket struck a synagogue in Netivot. More rockets fell on the weekend. Since the mutually agreed upon cessation of hostilities in Gaza on Jan. 18, Palestinian terrorists have fired some 130 rockets and mortar shells into southern Israel. They show a particular penchant for targeting schools, nurseries and houses of worship.

The day after the conference, Israel's ambassador to the UN, Gabriela Shalev, filed a complaint with the Security Council concerning the unceasing rocket attacks by Hamas. "In response to these ongoing attacks… the government of Israel will continue to safeguard the security of its citizens and will ensure that the situation in southern Israel does not return to the status quo ante of December 2008. Israel will… respond accordingly to attacks against its citizens."

The combined posing for the cameras, the pledging of money and the lofty posturing at Sharm el Sheikh last week, in truth, was akin to an absurd play. If Hamas' rule does not end in Gaza, neither will the rocket fire into Israel. And then, there will be a need for even more reconstruction funds to be pledged by the players in the surrealist Gaza theatre.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir criticized Egypt for not returning its ambassador, who had been recalled during the 1982 Lebanon War, describing it as being against the spirit of the peace treaty between the two countries. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, however, said he had no intention of cancelling the treaty.

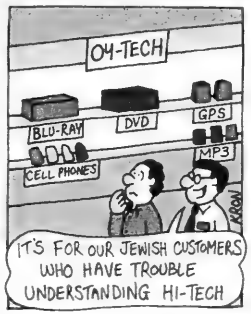
CUPE resolution protested in Windsor

The Jewish Defence League bused 50 of us to Windsor, Ont., from Toronto on Feb. 23 to protest as the Canadian Union of Public Employees Ontario voted on a resolution to boycott Israeli academic institutions. As we stood outside in front of the Windsor Hilton Hotel, inside, delegates representing the union's Ontario university workers deliberated and voted on the resolution.

We were joined by Windsor Jews and Christians, and we numbered over 100 strong as we came face to face with angry Palestinian supporters on the street outside the hotel. Women, men and children from the Windsor Arab community held up hand-lettered signs denouncing Israel and waved Palestinian and Hezbollah flags. Some of us waved Canadian and Israeli flags, while others held up signs that read "No to CUPE's attacks on Academic Freedom" or "Vote No to Anti-Israel Resolutions."



At one point, Arab counter-protesters, without provocation, crossed over toward us, yelling, "Death to Israel." The Windsor police intervened by blasting their patrol car sirens and driving their cruisers between us and them. But the most striking image for me was the sight of CUPE Ontario president Sid Ryan, who proposed the boycott of Israeli academics, as he made his way toward the string of Hezbollah flags and posters of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah. As we watched in disbelief, Ryan shook hands with many of the Arab counter-protesters and embraced them.

The mood was sombre as we got word that the delegates voted in favour of the boycott of Israeli universities. The passing of this discriminatory resolution sets a dangerous Canadian precedent by its singling out a single country.

Al-Jazeera's bias is subtle

Paul Michaels is correct to question the objectivity of Al-Jazeera English ("'Objective' reporting and Al-Jazeera," CJN, Feb. 26). Al-Jazeera English's bias is extremely subtle and easy to miss. It is manifested not so much in whom it interviews – given that it goes through the motions of interviewing Israeli government spokespeople – but in how it packages the interviews it delivers.

For example, an interview with Hillel Neuer of UN Watch permitted Neuer to make his points that planning for the upcoming "Durban II," the followup to the UN World Conference Against Racism conference of 2001, targets Israel exclusively while omitting mention of the human rights abuses of notorious offenders such as Sudan and China. But as Neuer spoke, Al-Jazeera projected videos of an anti-Zionist demonstration by completely unrepresentative Jews – the Neturei Karta – and of suffering Palestinian refugees, not of the Sudanese refugees to whom Neuer was referring. This is just one example of the subliminal message conveyed by this ultra-slick network.

What the CRTC needs to see is the hidden agenda of this splendidly packaged propaganda vehicle, staffed by attractive, highly paid, western-trained journalists. Like the propaganda films Leni Riefenstahl made for the Nazis, Al-Jazeera English's broadcasts are very professional, and they play well in the West's living rooms. Its journalists dress like us and speak with cultivated British accents, its graphics are top-notch, but inside the pretty package is a subtle and insidious anti-Israeli and anti-American message that is all the more dangerous because it is so hard to pin down. It is our job to drive this point home to the CRTC.

Jewish schools cast in bad light

A recent article in the general media featured a story that cast two local Jewish schools in a particularly bad light by highlighting the fact that they collectively owe more than $1 million in rental arrears to the Toronto District School Board. I have no doubt that these schools owe the outstanding lease payments to the board, but a careful examination of the underlying reasons for the mounting debt is surely warranted before aspersions are cast on them. These two Jewish schools (among several others) need to rent these otherwise vacant TDSB properties at great expense to their tax-paying parents because religious schools that are not of the Roman Catholic persuasion presently receive no government funding. Any anger, therefore, should be directed to the present inequity inherent in the education funding system and not at the schools whose parents have chosen a different religious path than the only one presently sanctioned by the Ontario government.

Netanyahu faces moment of truth

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Pressed to take a firm stand on the two-state solution, Benjamin Netanyahu's moment of truth may have come sooner than he wanted.

Despite strong international and domestic pressure, the Likud leader, who is trying to form a governing coalition, is refusing to come out in support of the idea of two states for two peoples, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace.

Ever since President George W. Bush outlined his vision of two states in June 2002, the two-state solution has been consensus international policy and the basis for Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Netanyahu's refusal to reaffirm Israel's commitment to the two-state principle leaves him out of step with the rest of the international community. It also is likely to cost him the chance of forming a more moderate coalition.

Already the main international players are ratcheting up pressure on Netanyahu to back the two-state idea.

In an interview in advance of her trip to the Middle East last week, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton told Voice of America radio on Feb. 27 that Washington would continue working "to create an independent, viable Palestinian state in both the West Bank and Gaza."

A few days earlier, European Union (EU) foreign ministers meeting in Brussels insisted that the two-state solution was "the only option."

"We hope that the new Israeli government will honour the obligations taken by Israel under the 'road map' [peace plan] and at Annapolis, and refrain from measures rendering a two-state solution impossible," said an official statement from the Czech EU presidency.

In Israel, Kadima party leader Tzipi Livni has made acceptance of the two-state idea a condition for joining Netanyahu's coalition.

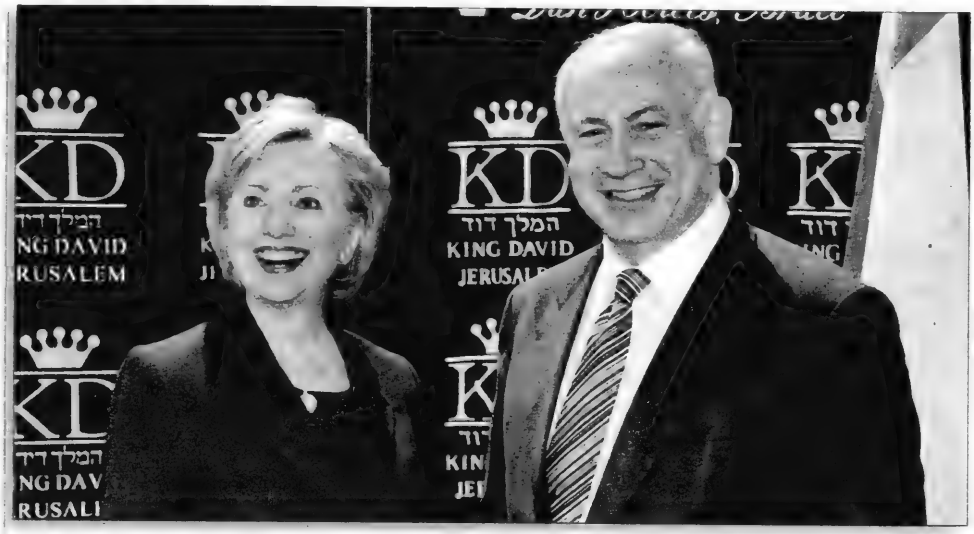
"Two states is not an empty slogan," she said. "It's the only way Israel can remain Jewish and fight terror."

Even though he very much wants to see Kadima in his government, Netanyahu has made only vague promises to continue peace talks. In messages to world leaders, he has pledged to honour commitments by previous Israeli governments, but has omitted any explicit references to Palestinian statehood.

Netanyahu has also been very careful in statements to the media. Asked specifically about the two-state solution in an interview with the Washington Post, he replied guardedly, "Substantively, I think there is broad agreement inside Israel and outside that the Palestinians should have the ability to govern their lives, but not to threaten ours."

In other words, yes to self-government, but not necessarily to statehood.

The obvious reason Netanyahu is treading so carefully is that he doesn't want to alienate his hard-line potential coalition partners before he has even a narrow, right-wing government in place.



Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu met with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton last week in Jerusalem. Clinton pledged to press hard for Palestinian statehood, putting Washington on a possible collision course with Netanyahu.

But his opposition to Palestinian statehood goes much deeper. In fact, Netanyahu is adopting very much the same position he did during his first term as prime minister, from 1996 to 1999. He argued then that in any agreement with Israel, the Palestinian entity would be so severely restricted that it would be less than a fully independent state. It would not be allowed to have control over its airspace, control border crossing points, raise an army or enter into military pacts with foreign powers.

Netanyahu still holds these positions, which he says are essential for Israel's security. Therefore, he will not to commit to full Palestinian statehood – a concept he fears might erode some or most of these restrictions.

> 'I think there is broad agreement inside Israel and outside that the Palestinians should have the ability to govern their lives, but not to threaten ours'

Please see According to Reports on page 22.

He also insists that for security reasons, Israel must retain nearly 50 per cent of the West Bank, including the Jordan Valley. This, too, runs counter to the international consensus notion of a "viable and contiguous" Palestinian state.

While all other Israeli prime ministers have dramatically changed their views on Palestinian statehood in the decade since Netanyahu was last prime minister, Netanyahu appears to remain unwavering in his opposition to the idea.

In early 2002, when then-prime minister Ariel Sharon, aware of Bush's impending "two-state vision" speech, announced his tentative acceptance of the two-state idea, Netanyahu hurriedly convened the Likud central committee to challenge Sharon. In the ensuing ballot, Sharon was humiliated. His proposal to defer the vote on a Netanyahu-backed resolution that "no Palestinian state will be established west of the Jordan" was defeated 696 to 465. As Sharon left the podium to loud booing, the Netanyahu measure was carried by a nearly unanimous show of hands.

The vote, however, had no impact. Sharon adopted the two-state solution, and his successor, Ehud Olmert, declared that without it Israel "was finished."

Ironically, at the time of the 2002 Likud ballot, Netanyahu joined forces with the hawkish Moshe Feiglin, whose far-right Jewish leadership movement advocates transfer of Israeli Arab citizens out of Israel. But in this year's election, Netanyahu pushed Feiglin down the party slate in a bid to give Likud a more moderate image.

Some Netanyahu watchers suggest that his position on Palestinian statehood may only be tactical, designed to earn Israel a better deal at the bazaar-like Middle East bargaining table. In Netanyahu's view, they say, statehood should come only at the end of a negotiating process, after being used as a lever to acquire concessions from the Palestinians, and not conceded up front as Sharon, Olmert and Livni have all done.

But it is almost certainly too late for such a gambit. Holding back on Palestinian statehood when it has been conceded by previous Israeli governments is unlikely to fly in an international climate where the two-state goal has long been taken for granted.

The stance could well bring Netanyahu into conflict with the United States and the European Union. Worse, it could lead to renewed confrontation with the Palestinians, with Israel in the untenable position of putting down a Palestinian uprising for a two-state solution Israel itself had previously accepted.

The same is true of Netanyahu's attempt to turn back the clock on the issue of West Bank territory. It's hard to see how Netanyahu could offer the Palestinians only 50 per cent of the West Bank when Olmert, Livni and Labor's Ehud Barak all have offered well over 90 per cent, with land swaps for whatever areas Israel annexes. This was also the U.S. position expressed in the December 2000 parameters set down by then-president Bill Clinton.

It is partly because he realizes the implications of his hard-line positions that Netanyahu so desperately wants Livni and/or Barak in his government.

If he doesn't back the two-state solution, they could serve as a fig leaf for his government. If he does, they could provide both the excuse he gives the right for making such a major concession and the political support to see them through.

First, however, Netanyahu would have to say the magic words and back two states for two peoples.

If he does, he might lose the hawks, though even Yisrael Beiteinu's Avigdor Lieberman supports a two-state solution. If he doesn't, he almost certainly will lose the doves.

Netanyahu is trapped, and in this moment of truth, there is nowhere for him to hide.

Opinions

Adding to our agenda

Rabbi Yitz Greenberg once declared that we can't afford to let our enemies set our agenda. They might add to it, but not control it. What do I mean?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

As anti-Israel activity on campuses across the country increase, we must act. We must support our students and communities with enough resources to combat this virulent form of anti-Semitism. (Don't tell me its not anti-Semitism when they shout "Death to the Jews!")

Additionally, as we involve ourselves maximally in the defence of Israel, there are many demands on our resources at home. The economy has taxed us to the limit. Our agencies and institutions need our help more now than ever before, but we have less access to funds.

Yet while we engage in these crises, we cannot forget our "ordinary" problems, many of which are exacerbated during times of emergency. Domestic violence traditionally increases as the economy goes south. Some men lose their jobs and their self-possession at the same time, it seems. Our task is to attend to the crisis at hand while we continue to work on the long list of Jewish communal needs. And we need help with issues such as Jewish domestic violence. It exists in our communities – across all our economic, religious and ethnic boundaries – and it's serious.

In Canada, we have some help, such as alternative short-term emergency housing for abused Jewish women and their children set up by Jewish Women International, as well as one remarkable kosher shelter and intake centre, Auberge Shalom in Montreal, and resources in other cities.

But it's not enough. Not nearly.

What can we do?

Primarily, we need to acknowledge the problem exists. Then we should listen to those suffering. I remember hearing one doctor talk of her experience of physical abuse. After years of hiding the scars, it was her mother-in-law (!) who helped her face the facts and get out. We need that kind of courage. We need sermons, columns and education. We can't turn away from domestic abuse of any kind.

For the past three years, friends and I have attended a JWI International conference on Jewish domestic abuse. Our particular interest has always been our uniquely Jewish form of divorce (get) abuse. But we learned about all other kinds. The fourth conference will be held next month in Virginia. Visit www.jwi.org to find out more. Try to go, or support someone who wants to go. Talk to your local group and see what you can do to help. Get involved.

Remember: it's not their shame. It's ours.

We need to embrace historical research

History – and Jewish history in particular – can be more than an academic exercise. It can be a tool for propaganda (e.g., the book Stalinist Russia), a theological minefield (Quest for the Historical Jesus) or even a blood sport.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Prof. Stanley Kutler, my undergraduate mentor, wrote the seminal book about former U.S. president Richard Nixon. Yet recently, a revisionist history of Nixon has begun to take shape among those who want to rehabilitate his reputation. To this end, they've published attacks on Kutler's analysis, leading to a battle of words in the media and on academic blogs. It ended with the New York Times retreating from its own articles by acknowledging the flimsy argument of the revisionists. That's history as a blood sport.

History as propaganda we learned from the manipulation of historical truths during the dark days of Stalin's U.S.S.R. To change the future, the Soviets changed the past. Other examples could be Austria's "Hitler made us do it" argument or Poland recreating Auschwitz as a Catholic shrine.

We like to call ourselves a historical people, but we often use history as a tool to advance a particular political, or even theological, agenda. Case in point: the 1984 book From Time Immemorial, a volume that puts the Jews in their land from, well, time immemorial, a position guaranteed to be used in ways that advance a particular political agenda.

We are all familiar with the politician's appeal to historical circumstance (always favourable to his point of view) that in turn dictates a particular course of action. This tendency is nowhere more visible than in Israel, where history can be used as a tool to beat up on your opponent.

Many years ago, a young history professor, Yeshiyahu Gafni of Hebrew University, was my teacher in Jerusalem. An Orthodox Jew, Gafni is a brilliant, stimulating and perhaps sometimes controversial history teacher whose specialty is the talmudic period. Recently, Gafni was a scholar in residence in Vancouver and I had a chance to once again listen to his perceptive analysis of Jewish historiography.

He argues that historians can extract valuable historical information from the Talmud, and that we can examine Jewish history from this perspective without challenging the halachic framework of Rabbinic Judaism. Indeed, he insists upon it.

In one unforgettable class in Jerusalem, we were studying the period of Yavneh, using the text "Give me Yavneh and her wise men" ("Ten li Yavneh v'hachameha"). This, it's reported in the Mishnah, was the request made by Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakai to the invading Romans in order that the scholarship of the Pharisees-cum-rabbis could continue.

Now Yavneh at the time was a wholly Hellenized city with – wait for it – no wise men of the Israelite persuasion. According to Gafni, using this and other texts, we can learn about the historical development of Rabbinic Judaism, as well as the historical period in which that development took place.

Pursuing this line of inquiry, we learned that in addition to the many layers of Halachah and aggadah that make up the Mishnah, historical context is critical to a full understanding of the text and the historical period.

Can we reinterpret the story of Yavneh and her mythical wise men without losing its essence? Gafni argues that we can extract historical information from the Talmud, indeed that this approach is critical to a true understanding of contemporary Rabbinic Judaism.

As Yosef Yerushalmi observes in his book Zakhor: Jewish History and Jewish Memory, professional Jewish historians are relatively new. He points out that while "memory of the past was always a central component of Jewish experience, the historian was not its primary custodian." Jewish historians such as Gafni and Yerushalmi – quite different in viewpoint, to be sure – are staking out new territory.

We shouldn't rely on a simplistic view of Jewish history. We need to accept historical research and be ready to re-examine how we use, and abuse, our own history. That won't make us bad Jews. It will make us even more committed, as Gafni is, to seeking out what really happened, as best we can, and treating our texts as guides.

Slur on interfaith harmony

Interfaith initiatives are important to ensure that all major faith communities not become insular and isolated from the broader community that we all share.

Consider, for example, the work of the Edmonton Interfaith Centre for Education and Action, which offers programs, seminars, educational displays and public gatherings that promote respect, friendship and harmony among people of all faiths.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

In addition, many faith groups in Edmonton sponsor their own programs that encourage understanding and a sharing of both unique and common experiences. In mid-March, the Ahymadiyya Muslim Women's Association of Edmonton is holding its annual interfaith symposium, featuring presentations by representatives of the local Jewish, Sikh, Christian and Islamic communities.

As vital and encouraging as these interfaith contacts are, we still cannot lose sight of the fact that there are prominent members of some faith communities who are intolerant, and even hateful, of others.

We are unfortunately reminded of this by the recent controversy concerning Catholic Bishop Richard Williamson, who headed a Buenos Aires seminary and who held distorted, anti-Semitic views. In a widely publicized interview on Swedish television, Bishop Williamson essentially denied the Holocaust or, at least, denied the extent of the horrors visited upon European Jewry. He claimed that 200,000 or 300,000 Jews were murdered and not six million, and he denied that any Jews were gassed.

The bishop was excommunicated by the Church, not because of his anti-Semitic denials, but because of the manner of his consecration as a bishop. The Vatican subsequently lifted his excommunication.

As a result of his Holocaust denials, the bishop was removed from the seminary in Argentina and was expelled to his native England by the Argentine government. Bishop Williamson subsequently apologized, referring to the harm and hurt his remarks caused, but did not in any way retract his Holocaust denial. This was unsatisfactory to the Vatican.

On his return to England, it was learned that Bishop Williamson had contacted and sought advice from David Irving, the disgraced British anti-Semitic and Holocaust-denying historian.

When Bishop Williamson was expelled from Argentina, the government announced that his hateful remarks had "deeply shocked Argentine society, the Jewish people and all of humanity."

This obviously reflects the new Argentina, a nation with a large, vibrant, and healthy Jewish community of more than 200,000. But it wasn't that long ago, in 1994, when the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires was bombed, killing 85 people and injuring more than 300. The subsequent investigation and prosecutions were widely criticized. Over the years, Iran and Hezbollah were implicated in the bombing.

However, the bombing reflects a long tradition of anti-Jewish sentiment in that country. This dates back to the period after World War II when Argentina was considered a safe haven for many Nazis fleeing prosecution, including probably the most infamous of all, Adolf Eichmann.

To this day, South America has experienced pockets of anti-Jewish sentiment. Currently, Venezuelan Jews are feeling the pressure of a government led by President Hugo Chavez. According to the U.S. Anti-Defamation League, a rise in anti-Semitism has been "fostered in large part by Chavez's own rhetoric and that of his government institutions." And, at the United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001, some of the worst anti-Semitic "literature" originated in Brazil.

On a positive note, the official statement of the Argentine government on the expulsion of Bishop Williamson included the notion that Holocaust denial deeply shocks "all of humanity." This represents a refreshing new message that will hopefully resound throughout that continent.

Perhaps the Williamson controversy represents somewhat of a failure of existing interfaith dialogue. However, as Canadian Jewish Congress Co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka recently wrote in the Ottawa Citizen, "Jew and non-Jew alike rejected [Bishop] Williamson and his views… there has been great progress in Christian-Jewish understanding to the point that there is profound amity between the two religions. The Williamson affair proved that this profound amity is simultaneously unshakable."

Clearly, such dialogue must continue. Interfaith co-operation fosters mutual respect and understanding among all faith communities and creates an atmosphere in which the aberrant voice of a Bishop Williamson will not be heard.

The Kirshner File

Schiff was first female publisher in New York

Dorothy (Dolly) Schiff, the scion of an assimilated German Jewish American family of conservative leanings, has the distinction of having been the first female publisher of a major New York daily newspaper. A socialite whose parents were listed in the snobbish Social Register and a liberal activist who may have been a lover of a president, Franklin D. Roosevelt, she was the proprietor of the New York Post, the oldest continuously published daily in the United States. Schiff, whose grandfather was the legendary banker Jacob Schiff, presided over the fortunes of the Post from 1939 until 1976, when she sold it to the Australian business tycoon Rupert Murdoch.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Under her direction, the Post – which was founded in 1801 and was one of Abraham Lincoln's earliest supporters – was the model of a crusading newspaper. It was the first to attack U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy, the paranoid red baiter. It supported the African-American civil rights movement. It opposed the Vietnam war. It broke the story of Richard Nixon's slush fund. It spoke up on behalf of Zionism at a time when many American Jews were dubious about Jewish statehood. It consistently lined up behind Israel in its struggle for survival and acceptance.

Schiff wanted to be taken seriously as an opinion maker and power broker, writes Marilyn Nissenson in The Lady Upstairs: Dorothy Schiff and the New York Post (St. Martin's Press), and indeed she was. In this absorbing biography, Nissenson, a journalist and seasoned reader of the Post, draws a nuanced portrait of a driven and intelligent woman who thrived in an era when women had to fight for rights taken for granted today.

She was born in Manhattan in 1903, her parents having been Mortimer and Adele Schiff, whose ancestors arrived in the United States in the 19th century. Few doors in the New York social scene were closed to Schiff, a slim, dark-haired, fair-skinned, blue-eyed debutante who often moved in circles generally off limits to Jews.

Not surprisingly, the first of her four husbands, Richard Hall, was a Christian from a fine, though impoverished, waspy family who was given to making anti-Semitic comments about Jews in general and Schiff in particular. They were married in 1923 in a Protestant ceremony at the Church of the Heavenly Rest. "There was something in it for each of them," writes Nissenson sardonically. "He got access to her money, and she got his name."

Despite her conversion to Christianity, she was an atheist and always considered herself a Jew. Yet, like some of her upper-class Jewish contemporaries, she was was not entirely comfortable in her Jewish skin, considering her Jewish heritage problematic, says Nissenson. Certainly, her brother, John, had no such problems. He married into New York's WASP establishment and raised his two children as Episcopalians.

A Democrat rather than a Republican, Schiff was drawn to the promise of Roosevelt's reformist New Deal. A social acquaintance of the president, she may well have known him in the biblical sense. When she reminisced about her relationship with him, Nissenson observes, she was coy about whether or not it had been a sexual one.

Schiff's foray into publishing occurred after her divorce and marriage to George Backer, a Jewish real estate mogul. With his encouragement, she bought the Post from a fellow Democrat, David Stern, who owned the Philadelphia Record as well. Stern and his wife convinced Schiff, whose net worth was a cool $10 million, that owning a newspaper was not just an investment but an opportunity for self-expression and a chance to become a personality in her own right.

With an average daily circulation of 250,000, the Post lagged behind rivals such as the New York Times and the World-Telegram. But the Post was blessed with an admirable editorial staff consisting of, among others, columnist Franklin Adams, financial writer Sylvia Porter, editorialist I.F. Stone and Hollywood correspondent Sidney Skolsky.

Three years after buying it, Schiff displaced her husband as president and publisher of the Post. As she discovered, it was a money pit. Having already sunk $1 million into the venture, she was forced to put up another $500,000 by the end of 1942. The losses continued to pile up after World War II, but by the 1960s, the paper was profitable, with circulation peaking at around 700,000.

Its readership being largely Jewish, the Post was pro-Zionist. As World War II wound down, Schiff told a German-language Jewish newspaper in New York that American Jews should pressure Britain to permit unlimited Jewish settlement in Palestine. "It is the land where, as my friends tell me, roses bloom in the desert and outstanding achievements have been accomplished," she said.

With Israel's declaration of independence in 1948 – Nissenson misstates the date as 1947 – the Post spared no space in giving it front-page coverage. "Stories about Israel were sometimes the only foreign news reported in the paper for days on end," she notes, adding that the speeches of Israel's representative at the United Nations, Abba Eban, were often reprinted in verbatim form. And when Israeli leaders visited the city, they were interviewed and profiled.

Dorothy (Dolly) Schiff in 1948

Schiff's fourth and final husband, Rudolf Sonneborn, a manufacturer of petroleum products, was a keen Zionist who travelled to Israel on business quite often. In 1951, prior to their marriage, she accompanied him on one of his trips and remained in Israel for two months.

Although Schiff was torn by anxiety about her Jewish identity, she was always eager to highlight successful Jews in the pages of the Post. In addition, she commissioned the sociologist Nathan Glazer to prepare a series on several ethnic and racial groups in New York, including Jews and Puerto Ricans.

Dissatisfied with the results, she dropped Glazer, who retained the rights to the material and proceeded to write the classic work, Beyond the Melting Pot, a critical and commercial success.

As a person, Schiff could be shy, remote, imperious, self-absorbed and unapproachable, notwithstanding her evaluation of herself as someone with a common touch. Nissenson elaborates: "She may have shared the ideals, interests and concerns of most of her readers and employees, but the cumulative heritage of her childhood – being undervalued by her parents while reaping the benefits of social privilege – almost guaranteed that she would fall back on an austere patrician style when she was ill at ease."

During the heyday of her reign, morale in the newsroom was high, with reporters taking pride in the perception that the Post was the best-written newspaper in town.

But as the 1960s wore on, morale plunged as reporters and editors were stymied by her parsimonious style. She would steam unused stamps off return envelopes and confront employees who used company phones for private calls. In editorial matters, she could be remarkably cheap. She refused to pay competitive salaries and tried to cut corners in the coverage of stories.

On balance, though, Schiff was a serious and fearless publisher who had noble instincts. "She was the only publisher in New York with balls," one of her editors said.

Having sold the Post for $31 million, she retired, spending her last years socializing, reading books, needlepointing and watching television.

Murdoch, the new owner, transformed the Post into a right-wing newspaper, resorting to his tried-and-tested formula of skin and scandal, which must have saddened Schiff before her death in 1989.

2008: Another Great Year at Romspen

Many investors now regret that they took on more risk than they realized by overweighting their portfolios with stock market investments. They are now waiting for these investments to recover. But is this really the best solution?

For a risk-averse investment strategy consider the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, a leading Canadian non-bank commercial mortgage lender. Since inception and including 2008, investors in the RMIF have earned about 10% per annum. That's not just a paper gain – it's cash paid to investors each and every month. Food drive needs donations, volunteers for deliveries

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Karen Fenwick and Debbie Wasserman, co-chairs of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section's 26th annual Passover food drive, are facing a dilemma.

They have more names on their list of recipients than last year, and their monetary donations are down.

They accept referrals from agencies, synagogues, schools, service groups and chaplaincy services, and the list includes people who are living in poverty, people with disabilities and inadequate financial resources, and recent immigrants in need.

Each food box contains many of the essentials needed for the seder and the week of Passover, including matzah and matzah meal, as well as Passover wine or grape juice, candles, soup and a side dish, gefilte fish and canned fruit.

"People are afraid to donate money, because they're worried about the economic situation, and food donations are down because they're shopping less. They don't know what's coming," Wasserman said.

The pair, along with their committee, buys 90 per cent of the food that gets delivered to recipients, and although they are able to purchase food at wholesale prices, their costs have risen 35 per cent over last year, because food prices are higher, Fenwick said.

"We've had to give agencies a quota on the number of recipients on their list. Our project runs on donations – what we get is what we spend," she said. "If we don't get enough, we'll have to reduce the content of the boxes. We'll have to decide what people need the most."

Karen Fenwick

Debbie Wasserman

On a positive note, people from outside the community are stepping up to help.

"A non-Jewish woman from Muskoka read about our organization in a newspaper and called us with a donation," Wasserman said.

"And a school in Scarborough that runs a food program for the hungry is collecting money for the drive. One of our mandates is to teach people about poverty, so we're [happy] to see that we've reached beyond our community."

Fenwick and Wasserman are also pleased with the number of volunteers who have come forward.

"We have one volunteer who has been a recipient of the drive, and one former volunteer who is now a social work student and wanted to work one of her placements with us," Fenwick said.

She said Rabbi Yossi Sapirman of Beth Torah Congregation brings a busload of students on delivery day – which this year is March 29 – "and they load the bus with boxes to be delivered by the students."

Volunteers willing to deliver boxes for one hour on delivery day – each car should have a driver and a helper – can show up at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St. at 8:30 a.m. Dollies and carts are helpful to bring. For information, call 416-633-5100.

13-year-old whiz is a natural in the cockpit

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Recent news about airplanes falling out of the sky is enough to turn anyone into a nervous flyer, but Michael Domb hasn't been deterred from achieving his dream of becoming a pilot.

Domb said he already has the required number of in flight hours to go solo – fly without an instructor – but he'll still have to wait a few months before he can.

Legally, you have to be 14 years old to fly by yourself with a student pilot licence, and Domb is just 13.

But by the summer, he expects to pass the test to get his student licence, which would also make him the youngest Canadian, and youngest Israeli, student pilot.

Domb, a Fieldstone Day School student who often travels to Israel to visit family, said aviation has always been part of his life.

"My dad was working for the U.S. for NASA for the Apollo missions. He's a rocket scientist. He also used to fly," Domb said, adding that his father, Uriel Domb, is president and CEO of Telespace Inc., a satellite consulting company.

He said his uncle is also a pilot who owns a small, single engine plane.

"I started flying when I was 12… We used to go up and have some fun in the air."

Domb said he started flying with an instructor last year and began going to a pilot ground school, where he learned aviation basics. After that, he was assigned to a unit and an instructor who taught him to fly.

He said it was a surprise to him and many others that flying came so naturally to him.

"Ever since I was little, I flew on computer simulators, but it came pretty quickly to me in the airplane. I did pretty well, and I progressed pretty fast," he said.

He said he's been learning to fly with Canadian Flyers, a pilot training firm, at the Markham Airport, where he learns on a Cessna 172.

"Markham has a really small runway. It is very narrow, so it makes flying different and hard. If you can learn to land there, you can land pretty much anywhere, because it's so small. And if you think about flying a plane at 130 kilometres an hour and coming to land on a seven-foot wide runway, it's pretty hard. When you have to factor in wind and snow, or rain on a slippery runway, it can get pretty complicated," Domb said.

With 15 hours of flying already under his belt – three more than the minimum requirement – Domb is counting down the days until his 14th birthday in June, when he is legally able to fly solo as a student.

He said his instructor evaluates him every time he flies and said he's ready to go it alone because he knows how to take off, fly and land.

"Part of the flight training is doing spins. You basically fly up to 6,000 feet, and then you stall the plane and it goes into a spin and you spin for a couple thousand feet and the plane is actually going pretty fast, but it only lasts for about three seconds. When you pull out, it's a lot of fun."

Although Domb enjoys the thrill of flying, he takes it very seriously, especially in light of recent plane crashes in Buffalo and Amsterdam.

"As we have recently seen with the Bombardier plane crash in Buffalo, flying can be quite dangerous. It is a lot of fun, and a great experience, but when people treat aircraft lightly, accidents happen," Domb said.

"Last year, when I worked as a flight dispatcher at Markham, people would rent airplanes and takeoff without doing any [safety] checks. Not only is this breaking the law, but it is extremely dangerous. These are aircraft, not cars."

Domb added that when he turns 16, he plans to take the written exam and flight test required to obtain a pilot's license, and then he'll be able to fly a plane on his own with passengers.

But his ambitions don't end there.

Domb said that when he turns 18, he plans to make aliyah and join the Israeli Air Force. He said part of the reason he wants to serve in Israel rather than Canada is because he feels more of a connection with the Jewish state, and he has a friend who died two years ago serving in the war in Lebanon.

But beneath it all, he simply loves to fly.

"I mean, it's complicated, and not every flight is the same – it's always different… I just love flying as a whole."

A LONG-TIME DREAM OF MINE WILL SOON BECOME A REALITY.

This summer, I will travel to Poland with 100 of the world's greatest cantors. Many of the original masters of chazzanut were from Poland and, as cantors, we're indebted to their efforts. After all, the greatest cantorial melodies were composed in Poland!

I have traveled to Poland many times before, and it was clear to me that a revival of Jewish life was in full swing. Each time I left, I came away thinking that I wanted to bring people back with me.

I invite you to join us to be part of a memorable experience. As a group of 100 strong, we will sing these traditional tunes in synagogues and on other sites where they were originally performed.

The overwhelming majority of American Jews can trace their roots back to Poland. I believe it is our duty to support the revival of the Polish Jewish community and to ensure we preserve and memorialize the 1,000 years of Jewish history there.

COME AND SEE POLAND FOR YOURSELF. NOW IS THE TIME.

THROW A BAR MITZVAH—OR BUSINESS LUNCH—THAT ROCKS!

Whether it's a bar mitzvah, bat mitzvah, "Bubbie's" birthday or a business banquet, you'll always be treated like a rock star at Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre (formerly the Skydome).

With a combined 27,000-square feet, including nightclubs and streetside patios, Hard Rock Cafe Toronto and Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre offer a vast array of configurations for a wide variety of events, from five to 500 people, breakfast through late-night.

Marcelo DeOliveira, sales and marketing manager for Hard Rock Cafe: "We've hosted countless bar mitzvahs, wedding receptions, product launches and press conferences. We've put on events for all types of companies, from Deloitte & Touche and The Toronto Star, to BMG Music. Guests love Hard Rock. It's a very unique environment."

As if to make his point, DeOliveira walks a visitor past some of the priceless rock memorabilia hanging on Hard Rock Cafe Toronto's walls, such as Bob Dylan's autographed guitar from the cover of a 1984 live album and a handmade mariachi suit he wore on tour. Guests will also see a pair of sketches by John Lennon, a fur-trimmed purple jacket that belonged to Prince and an outrageous pair of platform shoes from the closet of Stanley Eisen – better known as Paul Stanley of KISS – as well as a beautiful custom instrument once owned by Canadian guitar virtuoso, Alex Lifeson, of Rush.

And as a testament to the old adage, "rock 'n' roll never dies," Hard Rock Cafe at The Rogers Centre boasts dueling walls of The Rolling Stones' and The Beatles' memorabilia. So far, The Beatles are ahead with 23 pieces, including the hand-written lyrics to "Get Back." But if Brit Rock isn't your thing, you can check out some cool stuff from this side of the pond, like the guitar Jimi Hendrix used when recording "Little Wing," the jacket Buddy Holly wore on tour or Bo Diddley's guitar "Lucille." There is a tribute room to the "King" himself, where you can get a peek at Elvis's silk pajamas, among other things.

After the tour, DeOliveira explains that this is all part of the experience, that his staff will design exactly the experience a guest is looking for. "For instance, you can have a sit-down dinner or a buffet. We have great sound, great lighting and video monitors throughout the cafes. We can set up for dancing or karaoke. We can even put together really fun loot bags from our Rock Shop. Whatever you need. Because to us, you're a rock star."

Schools owe $1 million in rent to TDSB

Compiled by CJN Staff

Two boys' schools serving the haredi community reportedly owe almost $1 million in back rent to the Toronto District School Board.

John Campbell, TDSB chair, was quoted last week as saying that the board prefers not to evict tenants that provide a service to the community, but he did not rule out evicting organizations that don't pay their rent.

One school, Yeshiva Bnei Tzion of Bobov, reportedly owes $251,190 in rent on Champlain Public School, near Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue. The other, Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah, reportedly owes $701,700 rent on Glen Rush Public School near Bathurst and Lawrence Avenue.

Campbell said that about 10 years ago, the two schools reached a deal with the board that said they would pay off the back rent when they bought the buildings they are occupying, but neither school has been able to complete its purchase.

He was quoted as saying that if the two schools were to raise money to buy the buildings, the outstanding rent would be added to the purchase price.

Calls by The CJN to the board and to each school went unanswered, but in a statement to the media, the director of Yeshiva Bnei Torah, who refused to give his name, said that the school has trouble paying rent because donors like to give money to buy "bricks and mortars," not for operating costs.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Orthodoxy as heterodoxy

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH

Torah Jews are Jews who believe it's their God-given obligation to observe the Torah laws as explained and codified by Judaism's best and most dedicated scholars. That's the long and short of it.

It's why we don't drive on Shabbat, shave with razor blades or eat shellfish. It's why we observe the monthly mikvah rituals, wash our hands before eating bread and pray three times daily in separate-seating synagogues.

To some extent, it's also why we give charity, speak honestly, pay wages on time and avoid gossip.

As a community and as individuals, we can sometimes be inconsistent. We all have better and worse days, moments of strength and weakness, times when our personal practice falls short of our stated ideals, but we try our best to maintain our God-given ideals.

Although usually a Torah lifestyle can be pleasant, fun, and life-affirming, it is not always so. The Torah lifestyle is sometimes costly and demanding. It's sometimes, admittedly, inconvenient, contrary to common sense and complicated. If anything, it's idiosyncratic.

Rabbinic Reflections

That's just the way Torah is.

Therefore, it has become predictably upsetting to read the critical assessments by some who don't understand what Torah is and isn't. They portray anecdotal incident, community quirks and legitimate Torah particularity as all part of the same unflattering package.

Of course, women can play a new role in Jewish life, as can recognition of the State of Israel in our religious outlook, Holocaust memorializing in our liturgy, and scientific advances in our daily lives. But while it's true that the Torah community hasn't done enough work in these areas, those least educated in Torah should hardly be the ones aggressively advancing the most innovative ideas. They might mean well, but their thick, broad brushstrokes can often ruin a beautifully intricate pointillism.

The next time you hear complaints about "those religious types," recall the way you might listen to your well-meaning, non-Jewish Canadian co-workers who offer platitudinous opinions on the Middle East. You know where they're coming from and believe their heart to be in the right place, but you also know that they simply don't have a clue. They probably need to understand what they criticize before they aggressively go public with their opinions.

Rabbi Yechiel Goldreich is the rabbi of Congregation Bnai Torah in Toronto.

The Blessing of the Sun

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On April 8, Jews around the world will have the opportunity to do something they haven't done since 1981 and won't be able to do again until 2037 – make a blessing. Not just any blessing, but a blessing on the sun.

Birkat HaChamah or "The Blessing of the Sun" is recited every 28 years or once every 10,227 days when, according to Jewish tradition, the Sun returns to the position it occupied at the beginning of the fourth day of Creation. It's always a Wednesday (the fourth day of the week) and always on the vernal equinox (the first day of spring, when day and night are equal in length.) [tinyurl.com/chamah02]

The blessing itself is quite brief: "Blessed are You, Lord our God, King of the universe, who re-enacts the works of creation." For a relatively brief blessing that is recited so infrequently, there is a surprising amount of discussion and even controversy. First of all, doesn't Rosh Hashanah mark the creation of the world? And secondly, doesn't spring begin in March?

As for Rosh Hashanah, apparently there is a dispute in Jewish tradition about whether the New Year falls in Tishrei or six months earlier in Nisan. The Gemara concludes that although we count the years from Tishrei, when we calculate the moon and sun's cycles, the Halachah is that the world was created in Nisan. [tinyurl.com/chamah04] The Chabad site adds somewhat cryptically that "All agree that the world was created in Tishrei, but that God conceived the idea of creation in the month of Nisan." [tinyurl.com/chamah03]

Determining the first day of spring gets quite complicated, but that's largely due to the legacy of the switchover from the Julian to Gregorian calendars. [tinyurl.com/chamah10] To make matters even more interesting, this year's Birkat HaChamah falls on Erev Pesach, just hours before the first Seder. If you didn't have enough on your mind with cleaning the chametz and cooking, there's this, too.

This year's timing has created some buzz on the Internet, with claims that the final redemption (Geulah) is imminent, since this is only the third time in history that this blessing falls on the eve of Passover. Proponents say the only other times this has happened is when the Israelites left Egypt and in the time of events recorded in Megillat Esther. Unfortunately, this does not seem to be true. After performing some fancy calculations, the author of the Keitzmegueleh blog concludes, "The incidence of Birkat HaChamah with Erev Pesach is rare, but not unheard of. It last occurred only a few cycles ago in 5685 (1925). Persistence with a good Hebrew calendar program will show you that this has happened between 5 to 10 times in the last thousand years (sorry, it's been a while since I checked). We simply cannot say that the third time is the Geulah." [tinyurl.com/chamah09]

The Berachot.org site lists some of the Jewish laws associated with this special blessing:

- A minyan of 10 is not needed, but being part of a large group is preferable.
- A blind person should either hear the blessing from someone else and answer amen or say it by himself without saying God's name.
- The Shehechiyanu blessing is not recited. Some people have the custom to wear a new shirt and then say Shehechiyanu on the clothing. [tinyurl.com/chamah01]

And what happens if after 28 years of anticipation, you wake up to cloudy skies?

- If the sun is covered by clouds for the entire first three hours of the day, the blessing may still be said, so long as the sun's outline can been seen through the clouds or if any part of the sun is visible.
- If the sun is completely obscured by clouds, and one is not able to see it before three hours into the day, he may say the blessing without God's name.

If you prefer not to wait another 28 years to recite this blessing, you're in luck. It's also recited upon seeing lightning, very tall mountains or the Mediterranean Sea. [tinyurl.com/chamah07]

Next week, more on Birkat HaChamah and links for downloading the entire sun blessing ceremony.

Jewish Life

Endowments: the future is now

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Tzedakah has become big business. With the amazing amounts of wealth created in the postwar period – the recession notwithstanding, we are blessed to be the wealthiest Jewish community in history – thousands of organizations compete for billions of dollars in philanthropy.

Myriads of professionals advise individuals and organizations on how to best maximize the benefits of giving. People no longer just write cheques. We have donations of art, stocks and real estate. Estate planning and foundations allow us to give from the grave. Directors of development are key executives who help organize dinners, journals, concerts, speakers, slogans and marketing campaigns in this growth industry.

Despite the great efforts expended on fundraising, many needs are going unmet, presumably because of lack of funds. Day school tuition continues to rise beyond the means of many – in fact, the last number of years has witnessed many economic drop-outs and decreasing enrolment.

Yet at the same time, the Bernard Madoff Ponzi scandal in the United States has brought to light the staggering amounts sitting in endowment funds. Billions of dollars already earmarked and donated for charitable purposes were ostensibly wiped out overnight, and the losses even forced some Jewish charities to shut down. These losses compound the billions that organizations have lost in the stock markets.

Imagine the impact on Jewish life had these billions actually been spent. The charitable stimulus could have helped us fight an assimilation rate that hovers at around 50 per cent, or provided additional help to the one in six Jews living at or below the poverty line. It could have offered millions to our day schools for such things as teacher training and retention and programs for children with special needs, and it could have provided programming for university campuses. Such funds are desperately needed to help settle Jewish immigrants and to help battered woman, as well as for subsidized housing, at-risk children, security for our institutions, and the many programs in need of support in Israel.

In short, this money could have helped transform our community today, more so than the unspent – and now never-to-be-spent – lost billions ever could.

It's noteworthy that arguably the most successful Jewish initiative in recent years, Birthright Israel (offering free trips to Israel for young Jews aged 18 to 26), consciously decided not to set up an endowment fund. Rather, all of its resources have been used to send more youth to Israel today, an investment that will pay dividends for years to come.

Ironically, the great supposed benefits of endowments in providing a constant flow of income to an organization in good times or bad has proven illusory. That flow has been greatly reduced (and, at five to six per cent, it was never quite large enough to begin with). While governments the world over are pumping money into their economies, many large charities are looking to cut back, afraid of further depleting their shrinking endowments.

While some form of endowments may have their place, with so many needs right before our eyes, it seems hard to justify having millions and billions invested for the future. Jewish law is based on the premise that present needs must take priority over uncertain needs in the future. Can we afford to save for tomorrow when so many Jews are disappearing today? This is especially important to consider when investments run the risk of negative returns.

Spending down our endowments will generate enormous benefits today. It will also deny us the ability to rest on our laurels, forcing us to find new and creative ways to meet the unknown challenges that await us in the future.

Focusing on present needs may also reflect an important theological notion. Prophecy, the Talmud asserts, rests only with children and fools. The future plans of the Almighty are beyond human comprehension. We must not put off dealing with the challenges of today because of concern over an unknown and unknowable future.

All we wanted was to pray at the Kotel

Ideas on Identity

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I write this column from rainy Jerusalem, where tourists curse the rain but Jerusalemites bless it after the terrible drought they've had. I've had the privilege of participating, along with 300 others, in the 120th anniversary conference of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the umbrella professional organization of all Reform rabbis. (Sure there are Israeli, European and Canadian rabbis in the organization, but aren't we all American? Memo to the powers that be: time to change the name.) By the way, the umbrella organization of the Conservative rabbinate also had its conference in Jerusalem, ending the day before ours began. Is it just me, or did anyone else notice a giant missed opportunity for shared learning, collaborative politicking and the combined power of 600 non-Orthodox rabbis in the same room in Jerusalem?

The most powerful moment of the conference for me was not in plenary sessions or in planned excursions, although all of those were good. The most powerful moment was being screamed at on the women's side of the Kotel by the shomeret, the female guard whose job it is to keep the women's side of the Western Wall clean, orderly and appropriately "holy."

As many of you no doubt read in the news, a group of about 75 female rabbis went to the Kotel on Rosh Chodesh Adar at 6:30 a.m. to pray. I was part of that group. We didn't have a Torah like on the men's side. We didn't have an obvious prayer leader who proudly stood in the front at a table, leading the service in a voice we could all hear.

Instead, we adhered to the Kotel's notion of "modesty" and prayed quietly, daring to raise our voices ever so slightly only at Hallel. Some of us also dared to wear our tallitot over our coats and not under them, and that's when a riot almost ensued.

The female guard decided that she couldn't tolerate this breach. Never mind that she brought over two male police officers to the women's side to quiet us down, and never mind that there were scores of beggars aggressively pushing for alms right behind her under a clearly posted sign stating that "It is forbidden to beg at the Kotel." Never mind that pious men spent the whole time yelling at us from way across the mechitzah instead of davening their morning prayers (where it's doubtful they could have heard us unless they were trying really hard to). And never mind that one of my male colleagues got his camera ripped from his arm and thrown down on the stone plaza from one of these pious men when he attempted to photograph the event.

The press appeared, and almost 100 web postings proliferated after a small article was carried by Ha'aretz. Comments on Ha'aretz's website included everything from "American provokers go home!" to "Hasidim go back to Poland!" Yikes. It seems that despite the economic downturn, the security situation, the sorry state of education, recent elections and just about everything else, nothing can inflame Israeli passions like a bunch of sincere women davening shacharit at a very early hour at the back of the women's side of Judaism's holiest site – the site where any Jewish man, no matter how ignorant or non-observant or insincere, can daven in full voice and with full security.

Now that's power.

Reena event to feature auction of clients' artwork

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The co-chairs of Not Just Another Saturday Night, in its fifth year, are gearing up to raise money for Reena, an Ontario-based organization for people with developmental disabilities.

Over the past four years, the event – conceived by Reena's new leadership division, a volunteer group of young professionals – has raised more than $100,000 for services such as after-school programs, summer programs and respite care.

The fifth annual Not Just Another Saturday Night is being held March 21 at the Academy of Spherical Arts in downtown Toronto.

This year, in addition to a cocktail reception, live entertainment, music, a raffle and an art show during which local artists can display their work, Reena clients will also be auctioning off their own artwork.

Sheri Becker, one of the six co-chairs, said that late last month, Reena held an event called Painting with the Stars.

"We got Reena clients to paint and we're going to auction the pieces off at the event," Becker said.

Carrie Fisher, a local Toronto artist, teamed up with Reena's new leadership division to raise funds for the organization in a program that was meant to provide "kids with the opportunity to develop their artistic potential by using creativity and imagination," Reena said on its website.

Becker said that Painting with the Stars gave some of Reena's clients an opportunity to be part of the event.

"It was so amazing to see the committee getting involved, the clients getting involved, the Reena staff were involved and it was just so nice that everyone was on the same page and at the same level."

Sheri Becker, right, a co-chair of Reena's Not Just Another Saturday Night fundraiser, helped Rebecca, a Reena client, with her painting that will be auctioned off at the event.

She said that last year's Not Just Another Saturday Night managed to raise about $40,000, but her goal for this year is a little more conservative because of the recession.

"We're expecting 500 people… and we hope to raise about $30,000," she said.

Anti-racism program marks milestone

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Representatives of Fighting Antisemitism Together (FAST) and Canadian Jewish Congress' charities committee joined some 200 students at Toronto's Lord Lansdowne Public School last week to celebrate a milestone in the life of "Choose Your Voice," (CYJ) the anti-racism and anti-Semitism program for Grade 6, 7 and 8 students launched by the two groups in 2005.

The event was held to mark the announcement that the program – founded by Tony Comper, immediate past president and CEO of BMO Financial Group, and his wife Elizabeth, a former teacher – has reached almost half a million Canadian elementary school students.

School principal Angela Marsh said the event "at its heart celebrates our country's diversity."

Student Sakinna Gairey read a poem titled Unity.

On a video prepared for the occasion, students at the multicultural school commented on the program. "It taught me to be nice to people that are different," said one.

"I don't laugh at racist jokes any more," said another.

Ontario Education Minister Kathleen Wynne, said that "hearing the kids speak… takes my breath away," and she called CYJ "an exceptional resource."

"One of Ontario's greatest assets is that we have such a diverse population," she said, adding that the public education system "teaches society how to get along. All the people who use our schools in Ontario deserve a place that's free of… discrimination, and respects and honours diversity."

Megan Tran, a Grade 8 student at the school and co-MC for the afternoon, said, "We will use our voices to ensure that mistakes of the past are not repeated in the future."

The event showcased student artwork and performances, including Stand Together, a song composed by music teachers Laurence Gilman and Edward Hayes, and performed by the "Choose Your Voice Ensemble."

Elizabeth Comper, who spoke along with her husband, read a letter from a teacher who had used the program. Among her students were bullies who wrote that they didn't realize what they were doing was harmful.

Other outcomes included students befriending others from different ethnic backgrounds, the teacher wrote.

"I can't be more proud of you," Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, told the students.

Keeping active strengthens memory, research shows

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Keeping active physically, intellectually and socially will help offset the inevitable losses of memory that come with aging, says Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute senior scientist Dr. Fergus Craik.

Internationally recognized for his studies on human memory processes, Craik was recently elected a fellow of the Royal Society, the national science academy in Britain, and is co-editor of the Oxford Handbook of Memory.

He recently spoke about age-related memory loss as part of Baycrest's Aging, Innovation and the Mind speaker series. Host for the program was CTV Canada AM's health and medical contributor, Dr. Marla Shapiro.

Stressing that he was not speaking about those with dementia or Alzheimer's disease, Craik said that some kinds of memory do hold up – primary memory, such as remembering phone numbers or long-term facts; and procedural memory, such as how to play the piano or a sport.

What does fall off, he said, are episodic memory (what did I have for dinner last night?), prospective memory (I have to call the doctor tomorrow and book an appointment – and then remember to do it) and memory for details such as names.

"It doesn't matter if you can't find your keys," he said. "What does matter is not remembering what the keys are for."

Craik suggested making it a policy to, for instance, always keep your keys in the same place.

The more meaningful a memory is for you, the easier it is to remember it, he said. He told the story of a woman having trouble remembering the password for something. The password was "DJ," and she finally linked it to her son's bar mitzvah party, where there was a DJ.

Another change in memory over time is that people have less ability to focus on several things at the same time. For instance, he said, teenagers have no problem studying and retaining what they studied while listening to music. "As we get older, we are less able to block off outside information, and that becomes progressively harder."

In that case, he said, adjust your environment when you are trying to learn, do or listen to something – "turn off the TV and tell people to stop talking around you."

Your environment gives you cues to remembering things. "That's why when a senior moves to a different apartment where everything is different, memory seems to worsen, at least for a time."

It is easier, Craik said, to remember general information than to recall exact details. For instance, when "trying to remember where you parked the car in a parking lot, remembering that you parked on the red level is easier than remembering that you parked in section D7."

He emphasized that physical activity helps maintain not only a healthy body, but also healthy brain function. He quoted an old saying: "What's good for the heart, is good for the brain."

Members of the audience asked about factors they had heard can affect the brain – for example that being bilingual all your life may have a positive effect, chemotherapy may interfere with memory, and genetics can play a role one way or the other. Craik suggested that perhaps all these factors, along with diet and lifestyle, may combine in the process.

Clinical psychologist Kelly Murphy joined Craik and Shapiro for the question period. "Look for ways to spend your leisure time, especially after you retire," Murphy said. "Choose activities that you feel are enjoyable and challenging," such as doing crossword puzzles, playing sports and talking to your friends.

Food, Scrumptious Food

When our kids discover the kitchen…

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Although my three sons are quite grown-up now – two are in local universities and one is in high school, they still sometimes fight like 10-year-olds.

The fighting has abated in the last five or six years, but I'm still refereeing far more physical bouts than I should be at this stage of the boys' lives.

This year, we experienced some curtailment of the altercations. But I discovered that keeping the peace on the home front had its price.

Sometime in December, my middle son, Evan, told me that he had serious concerns about his big brother.

"Leigh used to like to fight," Evan said. "Now all he wants to do is cook. He'd rather make honey balls."

Matthew, my youngest son – he was within earshot of this discussion – was quite pleased with this development. "Leigh's cooking is the best!" he said.

It was hard to miss Leigh's new-found passion for the culinary arts. He was an exceptionally untidy cook. After he made a batch of honey balls, our shoes would stick to the floor.

I used to buy this traditional Greek dessert from time to time in our old neighbourhood. But the deep-fried sugary dish had become a rare treat once we moved away.

Leigh's foray into cooking began when he discovered a recipe for honey balls on the Internet. When he realized he could make them himself, there was no stopping him.

Night after night, he would try different recipes to perfect these dishes. One day, a sauce would be too sweet or too tart, or it would be too runny or too sticky. Then he went on to tackle brownies.

Leigh mixing up his dough

I was torn about what to do about this culinary output. It was messy and unhealthy, but I worried that if I set limits, I might stymie my son's creative aspirations.

Fast forward to my conversation about Leigh's cooking with my younger sons. During this discussion, Matthew admonished his middle brother: "Evan, what are you complaining about? Does Mom bake honey balls or brownies? She would never make us lemon chicken. She only makes healthy stuff."

I could tell by the pensive expression on Evan's face, that he was not convinced all this so-called "good food" was a suitable substitute for a good fight.

Not long ago, I, too, began having my doubts about this tradeoff. It was the morning after a culinary double header – lemon chicken and brownies. The kitchen was a disaster.

Standing in the doorway and surveying the mess, I realized that when it comes to peace in the home, there are worse things than shoving matches in the family room.

I had managed to live with the fighting all these years, but there was no way I could possibly endure the endless upheaval in the kitchen. I decided right then and there to shelve Leigh Cuisine – indefinitely.

I got out the cleaning supplies, and as I began scrubbing chocolate off the wall, an old adage came to mind: "Be careful what you wish for."

HONEY BALLS
(Loukoumades)

Batter
2 packages active dry yeast
4 oz. warm water (105 to 115° F)
8 oz. warm milk (105 to 115°F)
1/4 cup sugar
1 tsp. salt
2 eggs, lightly beaten
1/2 cup unsalted butter, melted and cooled
3 cups flour, sifted vegetable oil, for deep-frying ground cinnamon, to taste

In a small bowl, sprinkle yeast over the warm water and let stand to soften (about 5 minutes). Meanwhile, pour milk into a large bowl and add sugar and salt.

Stir yeast mixture and eggs into milk mixture; add butter and beat well. Slowly add flour, beating continuously until batter is smooth, sticky and thick.

Add more flour as needed to arrive at correct consistency for handling. Cover bowl with a tea towel and let dough rise in a warm place until doubled in bulk (2 to 3 hours).

In a medium saucepan pour oil to a depth of 3 or 4 in. and heat to 360. Stir batter well. Drop batter from a tablespoon into hot oil and cook, turning spoonfuls in oil, until batter puffs and is golden brown on all sides (about 2 minutes).

Remove balls with a slotted utensil to paper towels to drain briefly, then arrange a layer of balls on a platter.

Honey Syrup
1 tbsp. lemon juice, freshly squeezed
1 tsp. grated lemon zest
2 tsp. ground cinnamon, to taste
1 cup honey
1/2 cup water
1/4 cup sugar

Place honey, sugar and water in a small saucepan, mix to combine and bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat to low and simmer, stirring occasionally, until sugar is completely dissolved. Stir in lemon juice and lemon zest and simmer until lightly thickened. Remove from heat and keep warm.

Drizzle the balls with warm honey syrup, dust with cinnamon, and top with a second layer of balls. Continue in this manner until all the balls are layered and dressed. Serve at once.

The truth about Netanyahu? It's complicated

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Overwhelmingly, journalists describe Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu, whom Israeli President Shimon Peres has asked to form a governing coalition, as opposing statehood for the Palestinians. However, Netanyahu actually holds a more nuanced view that's not being accurately portrayed in most media accounts.

For example, in "Israel's big stick" (Maclean's, Feb. 25) Michael Petrou wrote: "Likud, led by one-time prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, has a party platform that flatly rejects the establishment of a Palestinian state 'west of the Jordan River' (i.e., in the West Bank or Gaza)."

While this was once Likud's official position, the party amended its platform in October 2006, omitting the section that expressly ruled out Palestinian statehood. However, the full platform is available only in Hebrew and is, therefore, not accessible to many journalists. And while its rival, the Kadima party, openly endorses a two-state solution, Likud does not, leaving vague its preferred outcome of final-status negotiations.

During the recent election campaign, Netanyahu articulated his party's position on national security issues facing Israel, including Palestinian statehood. It's available online at http://en.netanyahu.org.il/themes-of/security/.

Some highlights include:

• "Likud is prepared to make concessions in exchange for peace, such as [former prime minister] Menachem Begin did in the peace treaty with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat – concessions in exchange for a true and reliable peace agreement."

• There will be no more unilateral withdrawals, such as the 2005 withdrawal from Gaza.

• While helping the Palestinians "rapidly develop their economy" and improve their day-to-day lives "will not resolve the conflict," it can "create an environment" in which "a final settlement negotiation" can succeed.

• UN Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 are the basis for ensuring Israel's security.

This position allows room for accepting eventual Palestinian statehood. In fact, in "Don't make the same mistake" (National Post, Mar. 2), Tom Gross wrote that Netanyahu "has been wrongly vilified as being against a two-state solution. In fact, he is open to the creation of a Palestinian state – but only if it is one that will live in peace with Israel."

On the other hand, in "Netanyahu: Clinton and I found common ground" (Ha'aretz, March 3), Barak Ravid wrote: "Netanyahu has spoken of Palestinian self-government, but has shied away from saying he would back a two-state solution to the Middle East conflict."

So where does the truth lie?

Many Israeli analysts say that the left-right divide in Israeli politics is not nearly as pronounced as it used to be, and that Netanyahu, like former prime minister Ariel Sharon, is at bottom more pragmatic than ideological. If there were a final status agreement that recognizes Israel as a Jewish state and provides for its security, while also creating a Palestinian state, Likud, as well as the Kadima and the Labor parties, would arguably support it.

While a majority of Israelis would like to see this outcome (since it would preserve Israel as both a Jewish and democratic state), most know that current conditions don't allow for it. Even if Israel today were willing to make all manner of territorial concessions, there could be no peace due to the wide split within the Palestinian leadership, with a weak Fatah faction holding sway in the West Bank and the rejectionist Hamas controlling Gaza.

Israelis have grown skeptical and realistic in the short term, even as they remain hopeful for a solution in the long term. Thus, it's important for the media to avoid black-and-white characterizations of Israeli politics as deeply divided between "hardliners" and "peaceniks." The truth is far more complicated than that.

In a July 6 (2008) Toronto Sun column on relations between the United States, Iran and Israel, Eric Margolis made the following claim: "According to Israel's media, President [George W.] Bush even told Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that he could not trust America's intelligence community and preferred to rely on Israeli intelligence."

On Feb. 14, the Toronto Sun issued a "Clarification," admitting that Bush "did not specifically say he could not trust [his intelligence community's] reports."

In what should have appeared as a "Correction," the Sun should have added both that Bush did not tell Olmert that he preferred to rely on Israeli intelligence, and also that "Israel's media" reported no such statements from Bush to Olmert.

How did Margolis manage to get so many basic "facts" so wrong? Did he just make them up?

Jewish students face incidents at U of T, Queen's

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) came and went last week, but not without incidents at Queen's University and the University of Toronto.

At U of T, there was a physical altercation involving a Jewish U of T alumnus at an IAW lecture, and at Queen's University, students in one course were forced to go through a mock security checkpoint set up by IAW organizers on their way into class.

On March 3, U of T alumnus Isaac Apter attended an IAW lecture with some friends. A friend sitting next to him asked one of the speakers to address problems with Hamas' charter. Apter said that when the speaker dodged the question, he and others began to shout, "Answer the question."

Apter said a man that he assumes was acting as an usher for Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) "grabbed and squeezed the back of my neck and growled at me from about 10 inches in front of my face, 'You shut the f--- up!'"

Apter said the man was wearing a bulletproof vest and a leather jacket.

"It may sound like I'm trying to exaggerate, but these guys were very, very intimidating-looking," he said.

"When someone might have raised their voice out of turn, for example to shout, 'Answer the question,' they would lean over to you and say, 'This is your first warning.'" Apter added.

"When the guy actually grabbed my neck, one of the other event organizers pulled him away from me," he said.

"When I waved the [U of T] police to come in and I was pointing at the guy, saying, 'That's the guy,' they sort of ran into a corner to talk about it and they looked really nervous."

Apter said he formally reported the incident to a U of T special constable who was on the scene.

U of T spokesperson Robert Steiner said that while the university has a policy that encourages room bookers to have their own ushers to help maintain order in the room, "the policy very specifically states that any security matters, including physical restraint, which you can read as even touching someone, is absolutely not within the realm of an usher and is only for U of T police."

When Steiner spoke to The CJN last week, he said he was still gathering information about the incident, but he added that "if it turns out that this did happen the way that [Apter] is describing… there will be some significant implications for a group that is allowing this to happen."

Steiner said that U of T administrators met with SAIA the following day "to send a clear message that whatever may have happened… whether it did happen last night or not, can't happen. It just cannot happen."

Steiner added that while plainclothes U of T police officers were at the event, he couldn't imagine that the man who grabbed Apter was one of them, because that's not how U of T police operate.

"They are very experienced in crowd control. The normal policy in the event of a disruption is [that] they would call for the event to be delayed for a moment to deal with the disruption if it's serious enough, or they might ask an individual, before it got to that point, politely to leave," he said. "But they don't grab someone by the neck and say, 'Shut the f--- up.'"

Apter agreed with Steiner's assessment. "I'm absolutely certain this guy wasn't U of T police.'.. The police don't do that. They just keep an eye out."

Apter said he would follow up with Sam D'Angelo, the U of T police operations manager. D'Angelo did not respond to a request for an interview.

Meanwhile, Josh Zelikovitz, president of Hillel at Queen's, said he is communicating with his school's administration about students' complaints.

"An issue we've been having is with professors setting up fake checkpoints outside of their classrooms at the request of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights [SPHR] and forcing the students to go through these. We've been speaking to the university about this," Zelikovitz said.

He said that in one instance, students didn't have the option of not going to their Gender and Diversity class, because there was an assignment due that day.

"Once inside, students had a 25-minute presentation from SPHR, a slide show that was obviously completely one-sided and the professor discussed it for a while after."

Finally, Healthcare You Can Count On.

Crowded waiting rooms. Perpetual line ups. Overworked staff. Magazines older than you are. Regrettably, too many of the cliches about healthcare still ring true. But that's about to change...

Introducing Healthcare on Demand by MD Direct, Toronto's pioneering new executive health program, designed to fit your lifestyle. Between work, family, community involvement, travel and the countless other demands on your time, you can't afford to wait for medical care. You need a doctor who will wait on you for a change!

Consider for a moment how much time and aggravation you could save if you didn't have to trek to the doctor with every minor health problem. With Healthcare on Demand, you'll be able to communicate directly with your doctor by phone or email any time of day or night. When medical problems crop up after hours, help is only seconds away in the form of timely advice from your trusted physician. Your doctor will even make house calls!

If that isn't reason enough to call us, consider some of the other benefits of our one-of-a-kind program: comprehensive executive health assessments; same-day office visits; in-house specialists; supportive care in hospital; medical advocacy; nutrition, fitness and wellness consultations; global travel advice; portable electronic health records; and more.

Try us out and we think you'll agree that MD Direct offers a degree of comfort, convenience, access, and peace of mind that you simply won't find elsewhere. But don't take our word for it. Read what some of our clients had to say:

"In a short time, my personal physician at MD Direct discovered three separate and unrelated cancers that my previous doctor had missed. Dr. Ceresne expedited referrals to top-notch specialists and has provided outstanding support throughout my treatment. Signing up with MD Direct is the best investment I've ever made."

~ Donald G., Attorney, Toronto

"...This opens up a line of communication that I had not experienced before with any physician. Having access to your doctor this readily gives one a great sense of security... I really feel that the personal attention that I receive from Dr. Litner through MD Direct is well worth it."

~ Lynda M., Interior Designer, Toronto

Enrolment in MD Direct's Healthcare on Demand program is limited. Call us before March 31st to take advantage of our introductory pricing!

Please Note:
The Healthcare on Demand program includes both OHIP and non-OHIP services. Payment options are available. Please contact us for further details.

Profs, students counter Israeli Apartheid Week

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As Israeli Apartheid Week was being held on a number of Canadian campuses last week, university administrations across the country were being urged by Jewish students and faculty to put a stop to the intimidation and hostility that pro-Israel students are facing.

Shalom Lappin, a professor of computational linguistics at King's College in London, England, and a visiting professor at the University of Toronto, said he was invited to give a talk at York University on March 25 but declined "in light of the York administration's handling of the attack on Jewish students that took place on the afternoon of Feb. 11."

Lappin was referring to an incident involving a group of some 100 anti-Israel protesters who barricaded Jewish students in York's Hillel lounge and shouted anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs. In a letter to York President Mamdouh Shoukri on Feb. 25, Lappin said he was upset there was "no public statement by any university official on this incident, beyond the expression of an intention to investigate it…

"The fact that the university has not taken up this assault with the students who launched it, nor acted to reassure the students who they targeted indicates a severe failure on the part of the administration to fulfil its responsibility to sustain a campus free of physical violence and harassment," Lappin wrote.

Speaking to The CJN more than a week after he sent the letter and three weeks after the Feb. 11 incident, Lappin said he had not received a response from the administration.

"Even-handed comments that have come out from the administration are laudable, but none of them address the issue at hand," he said.

He added that Shoukri's address to the university's senate on Feb. 26 "indicates that there is a serious failure of moral courage on the part of the administration and their unwillingness to deal with the situation on campus."

Noah Kochman

Lappin, who said he has frequently spoken out publicly against the policies of the Israeli government, added that "it's fine to criticize Israel and it's fine to criticize any other government… as long as it's done in a civil and courteous way, and this wasn't the case."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Hillel of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canadian Jewish Congress, Hasbara Fellowships and the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism (CCIA) joined Lappin in criticizing York's response to the ongoing hostilities on campus.

In a statement, the groups urged the university to take disciplinary measures against the people who barricaded students in York's Hillel lounge on Feb. 11.

The groups also said they hope to beef up student security by working closely with Toronto police, providing training sessions for Jewish students, garnering public support from elected representatives, and putting pressure on York donors to urge the administration to act on behalf of students.

The statement went on to call on the administration to "waive a requirement that affected students must first file a formal complaint. York is significantly behind in processing complaints."

On March 5, York released a statement that referred to the "incident in the student centre" on Feb. 11.

Vice-president of students Robert Tiffin said that "given the very serious allegations of intimidation that have been received by the university, three separate investigations are underway against the individuals identified in three complaints. These investigations are being conducted through a local adjudicator under the processes identified in the Student Code of Conduct."

Daniel Ferman, Hillel at York president, said that "while the York acknowledgement of an investigation provides us with a measure of satisfaction, we are dismayed that it took the administration this long to acknowledge the incident. The statement also falls short by not recognizing that Jewish students were specifically targeted."

Another professor, Edward Vrscay, of the University of Waterloo's applied mathematics department, protested Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), which ran from March 1 to 8, by refusing to give a talk to Ryerson University's math department on March 19.

In a letter to Ryerson's mathematics chair, Sebastian Fernando, Vrscay wrote that while he was not boycotting Ryerson – one of the campuses that allows IAW events – and while the math department at Ryerson is "removed" from the week-long lecture series, "enough is enough as far as… Israel-bashing is concerned."

In an effort to counter negative and sometimes untrue messages being disseminated on Canadian campuses, pro-Israel students have started a campaign called Peace on Campus, said Noah Kochman, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students' Israel affairs chair.

Jewish students involved with groups such as Hillel, Hasbara, CCIA, and Zionists at U of T are behind a website, Peaceoncampus.ca, that posts videos showing examples of the hostility that pro-Israel students face on campus.

"But this isn't a Jewish issue… this is an issue that can spread to the targeting of any ethnicity," Kochman said.

York fines pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian groups

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

York University handed down fines and suspensions last week to Jewish, Tamil and pro-Palestinian campus groups for their involvement in rallies that the university said disrupted classes adjacent to the Vari Hall rotunda on Feb. 11 and 12.

The four campus organizations and their respective penalties are Hasbara Fellowship, which was fined a total of $1,250 and had its operations suspended for 30 days; Students Against Israeli Apartheid, suspended for 30 days and fined $1,250; the Tamil Students Association, suspended for 15 days and fined $650, and Hillel, which was fined $650 but not suspended.

"One of the key agreements these clubs made was not to disrupt classes with their activities. In recent weeks, all of the clubs named have gone back on those agreements," said Robert Tiffin, York's vice-president of students, in a statement last week. "York's 50,000 students have a right to learn without their classes being interrupted by the activities of other students."

Suspended clubs won't be permitted to book university facilities during their suspension period, the university said.

In response to the sanctions, Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel at York, said the fines were handed down "arbitrarily and unfairly."

Aaron Rosenberg, Hasbara at York's co-president, added that the university's "inability" to enforce its student code of conduct is the cause of "the current climate" on campus.

"To fine students for taking a stand against intimidation and harassment while ignoring the larger issues on campus is unacceptable," he said.

'Must be no impediment to free access'

Patrick Deane, Queen's vice-principal academic, said "students have the right to attend class without restraints, and they also have the right to choose whether or not they take part in any political debate, presentation, or enactment.

"It has been stressed to all faculty that there must be no coercion and no impediment to free access. We have clearly stated that it must be made clear to all that this is an illustration, and students must not feel that that they are obliged to pass through a 'checkpoint' if they do not wish to do so."

Deane added that, for the most part, the rules were followed last week, but "faculty officials" are addressing the incidents that violated those guidelines.

Zelikovitz spoke about a related incident at Queen's. He said a Jewish campus group called Israel on Campus put together a campaign to bring in pro-Israel speakers and distribute pro-Israel material to debunk claims being made by IAW organizers.

"One of the things they distributed was a National Post article deconstructing the myths and lies of the allegations of apartheid," he said.

A student found that on one of the sheets, someone had written, "Don't support the Israeli government," and had drawn swastikas all over it.

"In my opinion, this is just an isolated incident… I don't think it's coming from the upper echelons of the organizations running the [IAW] events, but I do think it is a symptom of the toxic environment that Israeli Apartheid Week creates on campus," he said.

'IAW singles out one state'

The first video was posted on March 3, and within 72 hours, it had been viewed more than 12,000 times. Another video was posted March 5.

Kochman said he hopes the videos will open people's eyes and will push administrators to work to end all forms of racism. He said students have also been distributing printed material countering IAW claims, and some have attended workshops by Jewish community groups to prepare themselves to counter anti-Israel speakers.

Pro-Israel speakers have also been invited by CIJA's National Jewish Campus Life group and its university outreach committee to speak to students.

The situation has caught the attention of Liberal party leader Michael Ignatieff, who met with B'nai Brith's national president Joe Bogoroch last week to discuss the issue.

In a March 5 column in the National Post, Ignatieff also added his voice to those condemning IAW. He wrote that IAW "betrays the values of mutual respect that Canada has always promoted" and that calling Israel an apartheid state is a deliberate attempt to undermine the legitimacy of the Jewish state.

"IAW singles out one state, its citizens and its supporters for condemnation and exclusion, and it targets institutions and individuals because of what and who they are – Israeli and Jewish… It leaves Jewish and Israeli students wary of expressing their opinions, for fear of intimidation."

Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney said he was saddened by the "divisiveness" of IAW events and urged students "to reflect on whether these activities are beneficial or are simply an effort to cloak hatred and intolerance in an outward appearance of 'intellectual inquiry.'"

Quebec court fines comedian $75,000 for defamation

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Controversial French comedian Dieudonné was ordered by a Quebec court to pay $75,000 to French-Jewish singer and actor Patrick Bruel for making damaging statements about him.

During an interview shown on Télé-Québec in 2006, Dieudonné alleged that Bruel is such a strong supporter of the Israeli army that its killing of Palestinian children in the 2006 war in southern Lebanon was "normal" for him and that he is an "ultra-Zionist" with a "superiority complex."

In 2007, Bruel (whose real last name is Benguigui) sued Dieudonné (whose full name is Dieudonné M'Bala M'Bala) for defamation and sought $175,000 in damages, citing repeated attacks against him by Dieudonné that have hurt his reputation.

Dieudonné never responded to the lawsuit, filed in Quebec Superior Court, and was found liable by default.

Judge Danièle Besner, however, reduced the damages, citing the fact that the show was aired only once on Nov. 29, 2006, on the program Francs-tireurs on Télé-Québec, the provincially owned broadcaster.

The producer decided not to repeat it, but the episode was posted online on YouTube and has received tens of thousands of hits.

In the Francs-tireurs interview, conducted by Richard Martineau in Paris, Dieudonné said that Bruel "actively supports" the Israeli army, including financially. He added that Bruel is "practically an Israeli soldier. So when they bomb southern Lebanon and they kill Palestinian children, for him, it's normal."

Elsewhere, Dieudonné described Bruel as "a product of this ultra-Zionist political system, he's a super-militant... He has the superiority complex of certain Israelis."

Noting that Bruel is also a champion poker player, Dieudonné described him as a "liar who always lies to his public."

Dieudonné has been criminally charged several times in France for his remarks about Jews and the Holocaust, although he has been acquitted on appeal in each case.

Despite his notoriety, Dieudonné nevertheless remains a popular entertainer in Quebec and has presented several stand-up comedy shows here in the past few years.

Dieudonné's remarks on Télé-Québec were made soon after Bruel appeared on the Radio-Canada TV program Tout le monde en parle, where he said he did not understand why Quebecers like Dieudonné so much, given the multiple times he has been sued for anti-Semitic remarks in France.

Bruel has said he would turn over any damages he received in this suit to charity.

Cotler calls Bashir arrest warrant 'historic'

Compiled by CJN Staff

OTTAWA — Liberal MP Irwin Cotler called the International Criminal Court's (ICC) decision last week to issue an arrest warrant for Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir as "a historic judgment."

"The ICC's decision demonstrates that there will be no immunity – even for a sitting head of state – for the commission of horrific war crimes and crimes against humanity, including in this instance murder, torture, rape, extermination, forcible transfer and the pillaging of villages," said Cotler, a former justice minister who is the Liberals' special counsel on human rights and international justice.

"The ICC has struck a blow against the culture of impunity that has been reigning in Darfur since the killing fields began six years ago. Its decision to call President al-Bashir to account affords justice and vindication for the victims."

Cotler, who is also chair of the Save Darfur Parliamentary Coalition, underscored the importance of enforcing the court's order now that the arrest warrant has been issued.

"What is important now is for the international community to ensure that this arrest warrant is in fact enforced through joint support and action by the United Nations Security Council – which originally referred the matter to the ICC – and the co-operation of the African Union and member states of the international community," he said.

"Moreover, members within the ruling National Congress Party must finally distance themselves from President al-Bashir, surrender him to the court, and pursue a peace process both with respect to Darfur and with respect to the North-South comprehensive peace agreement."

Canada, he added, as one of the founders of the ICC treaty and the architect of the Responsibility to Protect doctrine – which includes the responsibility to prosecute – has an important role to promote respect for the court's decision, to ensure that al-Bashir is brought to justice, and to take a stand against impunity.

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

"הם רוצים שאתחיל לעבוד ביום שני הבא! זה נס!" אני קוראת בהתרגשות לעבר מאיר, כשאני מנתקת את שיחת הטלפון המרגשת. "אני הולכת ללמד בני-נוער עיתונות. איך לראיין, לכתוב, וגם איך לאייר קומיקס!"

אני כל כך נירגשת. מאיר נירגש לא פחות ממני. "ברצינות?" הוא מחבק אותי בחום. "סוף סוף יכנס משהו לחשבון הבנק!" הוא קורא בחדווה. "מה?" אני שואלת עדיין מהובקת. "הם דיברו איתך על משכורת, לא?" הוא שואל. אני מתרחקת מעט מחיבוקו. "זה אה...בחינם. כלומר בהתנדבות. לא ישלמו לי." אני מבאירה. הוא ממשיך לחבק אותי, ייאמר לזכותו.

מאיר חוזר לטגן צ'יפסים בקדרות מה. "ואיפה מתחולל ה...נס הזה?" שואל. "בדאון טאון. אתה תסיע אותי נכון?" מתברר שלא נכון.

אני קצת מודאגת. אצטרך להיעזר בסאב-ווי ובאוטובוסים. "אל תדאגי." מאיר מניח על הצלחת שלי מנה יפה ומסוננת. "את בסך הכל צריכה ללמוד מסלול הלוך וחזור אחד. זה הכל. את תסתדרי."

הקהדים התת קרקעים הם זן דומם. כולם עם אוזניות.

אחרי מספר תחנות, אני מבחינה שאף אחד מהשמות של התחנות לא מוכר מהפתק שמאיר רשם לי. אפריקני אחד בלי מוסיקה, מורה לי בלי שום סנטימנטים לרדת מיד מהרכבת, ולעלות על הרכבת לכיוון הנגדי. מבוישת מאוד, אני יורדת.

חמשת אלפים איש על הרציף, ואני מרגישה לבד לגמרי.

אני שוב שואלת, הפעם הדית נירוטית שמצביעה על כיוון כלשהו, ואומרת לי דברים לא ברורים. אני עולה כמה קומות ועוברת שער מסתובב ליציאה.

מה קורה? איפה אני? מי אני? למה אני?

כרטיסן מנומס אבל עצבני, מסביר לי שצריך לשלם עוד פעם.

המעסיק כבר ממתין לי במשרד. "הסטודנטים מחכים לך, נינה." הוא אומר ומושיט לעברי פתק מודפס. "כאן רשומות כל הכתובות אליהן תגיעי. בכל יום את מתנדבת במקום אחר. אבל תוכלי להגיע לכל מקום בסאב-וי או באוטובוסים, כך שאת מסודרת. נכון יופי!" אני מודה לו בדמעות. בהמון דמעות.

'Thoughts and prayers with the family'

"We [continue to] advise Canadians to exercise security measures when travelling to tourist areas, and be as careful as they would in any large city," he told The CJN.

In a press release, Alina Ianson, executive director of CHW in Montreal, said that the organization's "leadership and staff are focused on Terry's speedy recovery. Our thoughts and prayers are with her family at this time."

She said that in the interim, according to CHW's national constitution, Marla Dan, first vice-president, has assumed the role of acting national president of CHW.

Immediate past president Sandy Martin called Schwarzfeld, a past executive director of Ottawa's Agudath Israel Synagogue who became Hadassah president in November, a visionary and a people person. "She is well-respected from coast to coast and in Israel. She is a positive person, and I have faith that God will be on her side."

Toby Yan, an honorary national vice-president of CHW, said the whole community is shocked and upset about the incident. "Terry has a wide circle of friends who care about her, and about 30 women attended an [impromptu] prayer service when she arrived back in Ottawa."

Sharon Sattin, a past national officer of CHW, said that Schwarzfeld is a dedicated leader "who has done so much, and still has so much potential. Because of her strength, I think she will come out of this."

Canadian Jewish Congress co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka, senior rabbi at Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, condemned the attack and said that "Terry is a cherished member of the Ottawa Jewish community and a life-long activist for human rights and human dignity for all.

"We pray for her speedy and complete recovery and extend our deepest support and best wishes to Terry's family and our sisters at Hadassah-WIZO at this trying time. We call on Barbadian authorities to investigate this cowardly crime with all due speed and resources, and bring the perpetrator to justice."

PASSOVER FOOD FOR CUBA: Len Rudner, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional director and Leanne Campbell, a campaign associate with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, load Passover supplies to be shipped to Cuba, which has a Jewish population of more than 540 Jewish families, as part of the organizations' Maot Chittin Program.

Shul arranges to send Purim baskets to IDF soldiers

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue brought a taste of Purim to soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) by providing mishloach manot baskets for them.

On Feb. 25 and 26, children from both the synagogue and Ohr Hatorah Day School decorated cards and wrote notes of encouragement and appreciation to accompany the mishloach manot baskets that will be sent to the IDF soldiers through an Israeli organization called Connections Israel.

"To order a basket only costs $15 dollars, and our members have been calling in to order them. So far [two weeks before Purim], we've received 23 orders. Connections Israel will prepare and deliver the baskets to the IDF on Purim," said Rabbi Ari Ellis, whose synagogue has a membership of about 100 families.

"Although I never served in the IDF myself, I have a lot of friends that have served in the army, so I thought this would be a nice thing to do, especially after the latest war in Gaza. I'm sure the soldiers appreciate this gesture of goodwill," said Rabbi Ellis, who lived in Efrat in Israel before coming to Winnipeg in 2008.

"I can just imagine an IDF soldier getting a package and a card from someone in Winnipeg and thinking to himself: Where is this Winnipeg?" he added with a smile.

Tikvah Ellis, the rabbi's wife, said, "It's a great way to let soldiers know that we are thinking about them, and it's also a way of injecting a little money into the Israeli economy."

Synagogue member Rose Aziman said her two granddaughters were eager to make the cards, and this was "a good way to encourage them to feel personally involved with the soldiers."

After the Purim baskets are distributed, Connections Israel will send the synagogue a special commendation from the Israeli army and a picture of the IDF unit that received the gift baskets. The photo will be displayed in the synagogue.

Connections Israel was founded in 1998 as an independent, educational, not-for-profit organization that strengthens Jewish identity while unifying the Jewish People. It provides educational, hands-on projects to Jewish communities, schools, synagogues and camps around the world that enable participants to show support for various populations and places in Israel. This year marks its 11th annual Purim drive.

"The organization has also done a lot of things in the Israeli border town of Sderot," Rabbi Ellis noted. "The staff are volunteers or work there part time, and 90 per cent of the donations go to people, not to overhead."

"It's possible that next year we can do this program together with some other organizations in the community here, so more people will know about it. We can build on the program," Tikvah Ellis said.

"Anyone who didn't place their order on time with us can go onto the Internet at www.connectionsisrael.com and order the Purim baskets directly," Rabbi Ellis said.

Jerusalem world music band's T.O. appearance dedicated to Gilad Schalit

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

If you're in the mood for some live music this weekend, and you're into African, reggae, Moroccan, Israeli-style, upbeat klezmer funk, you're in luck because Aharit Hayamim, a Jerusalem-based band, is on tour and set to make its Toronto debut on Sunday night.

Aharit Hayamim, roughly translated from Hebrew to "end of days," – a biblical reference to Jacob's conversation with his sons about the end of days – will perform on March 15 at Six Degrees Nightclub, in uptown Toronto, to help local Jewish groups, including Hillel of Greater Toronto, the Association for the Soldiers of Israel and The House, raise awareness and push for the release of Gilad Schalit, an Israeli soldier who was kidnapped by Hamas in 2006.

The band, which has often been referred to as a "grassroots movement," is best known in Israel for its impromptu street performances around the country, the Aharit Hayamim music festival out of which the band was born, and the message of "redemption and light" the band members promote.

The festival was founded in 1994 by Yehuda Leuchter, Aharit Hayamim's leader, as a tribute to his late father, Emil.

"The festival started in honour of my father who passed away 15 or 16 years ago and he was a musician himself," Leuchter said.

Emil was an American-born musician who played with Shlomo Carlebach and the Diaspora Yeshiva Band.

"The festival basically started in my mom's backyard. We started it the year before he passed away. All of his musician friends came and had a party for him and then he passed away. A year later, everyone showed up again, and it just grew," he said, adding that today, the two-day festival attracts thousands of chassidic, secular, hippie and artsy music lovers to Gush Etzion in Yesha to see some of Israel's most popular musicians, such as Ehud Banai.

But this weekend, Torontonians have an opportunity to experience a band that has already garnered a loyal following in Israel.

"At the end of the shows, people come up to us and tell us it was great and they get high from it," Leuchter, 30, said as he prepared at his Jerusalem home for his North American tour.

Aharit Hayamim band leader Yehuda Leuchter, second from right, said he wants to "spread the light of Jerusalem in every home" during the band's visit to Toronto.

Aharit Hayamim achieves a unique, eclectic sound by reflecting the diverse backgrounds of each band member.

"I get high, also, but I'm onstage so I don't know about the high that they get. I get high myself – without smoking or anything."

Leuchter said the band, which is influenced by the 18th-century chassidic Rabbi Nachman of Breslov, who started a movement by combining Kabbalah study with Torah study, has a simple message: "We believe in Israel and we believe in God... We try to bring the light. We come from Jerusalem and Jerusalem is the light. We don't have to say so much, we just have to be."

Leuchter's free-spirited nature is reflected in the way the band manages itself.

"We do street performances, we play pubs, we play weddings, we play everything... We only know the day before where we're going to be at night. We just travel, you know," he said.

"We play in the streets and people like it. We're giving it to the people, we're not just playing on stages and selling tickets. They like it. It's real."

Just as interesting as Aharit Hayamim's philosophy is the diversity of the band members themselves, which contributes to the group's eclectic sound.

"Most of the band is from the Diaspora. I was born in Jerusalem. The drummer is the father of the guitarist, and they come from Reunion Island near Madagascar. The bassist's sister is married to the guitarist, and he comes from the [United] States. The saxophonist is from France," Leuchter said, adding that they all now reside in Jerusalem.

"Basically, the music is very unique. I can't really describe it. It's great, though."

Some of the instruments that they use to achieve their unique sound are shofars, Irish flutes and African drums.

"Because each band member comes from a different place, we play African, reggae, Moroccan, Israeli-style, upbeat klezmer funk."

Leuchter said that he has a couple of goals for his visit to Toronto, where Aharit Hayamim will perform a show dedicated to raising awareness about Schalit, who has been held captive for more than two years.

"I hope when we come back, he's going to be home already. I think it is a mitzvah to do anything you can to bring [soldiers] back, so even though it is not our main mission, it is still our mission," Leuchter said.

"My goal is to come into each and every home [in Toronto] and say, 'Hi from Jerusalem.' I want to come with my music and spread the light of Jerusalem in every home."

Dead Sea spa treatments good for body and soul

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

EIN BOKEK, Israel — Years ago in my student backpacking days, I visited Masada and the Dead Sea on a budget.

I stayed in an un-airconditioned youth hostel, which does not exist anymore, and I recall making a room selection based on the absence of scorpions under the bed. I climbed the snake path that wound its way up to the Herodian fortress, and I floated in the Dead Sea – proving that even a sinker like myself could bob around on the surface given the water's 33 per cent saline content (the oceans have three per cent). I even recall barely concealing a condescending chuckle when I saw two otherworldly figures, caked in mud, waddle down to the Salt Sea to take the therapeutic waters.

That was then. My salad days behind me, during a recent visit to the same corner of the Dead Sea as a guest of the Israel Government Tourism Office, it was – gasp! – me who resembled that freakish mud-caked apparition I witnessed back in my younger days. During a late February visit to the Dead Sea, I signed up for the mud-pack treatment at the Daniel Dead Sea Resort & Spa, one of several high-end hotels that together make up a Palm Springs-like community along the western shore of the Dead Sea, at 1,200 feet below sea level, the lowest point on the surface of the earth.

Magnesium-rich mud provides relief for skin ailments.

With a bewildering variety of treatments available to choose from, I selected the mud wrap with seaweed – the latter to draw out the nasty energies we keep inside us, according to the attendant who booked my appointment. I could have selected a reflexology treatment, a medical pedicure, hot-stone treatment, aromatherapy, milk bath, hot-seaweed wrap or an anti-stress body-peeling treatment, among other options. Klaudio was the Argentine oleh who provided the treatment.

The hotel was a real smorgasbord of international talent. The kippah-clad doorman/security guy was originally from Mumbai, India; one of the front-desk people was a young black girl whose parents were originally from Chicago. Almost all of them ride the buses from Arad or Dimona to work each day.

Visitors come from all around the world to the Dead Sea for treatments, mostly in the spring and fall, Klaudio said. The area's mineral-rich mud, loaded with magnesium, is renowned for its healing properties, particularly for skin diseases such as psoriasis. Guests spend weeks, even months, at the spa, and some countries subsidize the visits as a legitimate medical expense.

After providing me with a boy bikini that folded to the size of a peanut, Klaudio retired to heat the mud. He returned with a metal bucket that could have held paving mix, but instead was full of the gooey concoction that has made the region famous. He first applied the mud to my back, and after an initial jolt from the heat, it quickly became pleasantly warm. As I lay back, he ladled more mud on my chest, stomach and legs and shmeared it around.

After covering me from neck to toe in mud, he placed big globs of the stuff under my palms and then wrapped me in plastic that left me looking, I imagine, like a chocolatey Vietnamese salad roll.

After turning down the light and adjusting the volume of the electronic relaxation music, Klaudio left, with the advice to relax.

The mud felt surprisingly pleasant on my skin, the music was soothing, and I nodded in and out of consciousness.

At the end of the treatment, I showered in the treatment room – anywhere else would leave a muddy mess everywhere – donned a new tiny boy bikini and bathrobe and headed to another room for a 30-minute Swedish massage. (I'd have gone for the full hour, but I wasn't sure my boss would accept it as a legitimate expense.)

Aaahh. Feel the tension of being on an all-expense-paid junket fade to the background.

Ooooh. Let go of those difficult decisions of whether to choose fish or meat tonight.

Yeaaah. See those nasty energies the attendant warned me about evaporate at the tip of the massage therapist's expert fingers.

Yes, a massage can do wonders for tired muscles and knots.

The spa treatment over, guests can continue to relax in one of the Daniel's many pools. One is filled with warm water from the Dead Sea. Another smaller pool features bath-temperature water with a strong waterfall in one corner, a third is a good-sized whirlpool. There's also a sulphur pool, apparently good for those suffering joint ailments, as well as a cold water pool.

Nearby are a Turkish bath, wet steamroom and a dry sauna, and showers to rinse off.

As if the man-made treatments aren't beneficial enough, according to the U.S. National Psoriasis Foundation, high levels of bromine in the air at the Dead Sea "seem to add to a patient's sense of well-being."

True enough. But will my boss sign off on the mud pack and massage treatment expenses? Oh, the tension, the knots in my shoulders. Better head back to the Daniel for one more treatment before I go.

No real peace before Palestinian situation resolved: Assad

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syrian President Bashar Assad told a Gulf newspaper on Monday that Damascus will negotiate with any Israeli government irrespective of its political orientation, adding that there is little difference between the political left and the right.

"One is bad and the other is awful," the Syrian leader told the United Arab Emirates daily Al Khaleej, adding that Arab states should not hang their hopes on the ideological makeup of the Israeli cabinet.

"The right-wing is right-wing, and the left-wing is right-wing," Assad said. "The right kills Arabs and the left kills Arabs. There is no value to all of these hopes."

He said that a peace deal with Israel was possible, but that normal relations would be possible only if Israel ended its conflict with the Palestinians.

"There will perhaps be an embassy and formalities, but if you want peace, then it has to be comprehensive. We give them the choice between comprehensive peace and a peace agreement, which does not have any real value on the ground," Assad said.

"There is a difference between a peace agreement and peace itself. A peace agreement is a piece of paper you sign. This does not mean trade and normal relations, or borders, or otherwise.

"Our people will not accept that, especially since there are half a million Palestinians in our country whose position remains unresolved. It is impossible under these terms to have peace in the natural sense."

Syria and Israel held indirect talks last year under Turkish mediation. Talks focused on the Golan Heights, which Israel captured in a 1967 Middle East war and on Syria's relationship with Iran, Hamas and the Lebanese Hezbollah group.

Syria is demanding that Israel commit to a withdrawal of Israeli troops from the Golan. The indirect talks, put on hold due to the resignation of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert last September, were disrupted further after the recent Israeli war in Gaza.

U.S. Senator John Kerry, chairman of the U.S. Senate foreign relations committee, said after a meeting with Assad in Damascus last month that Syria was prepared to resume the talks but wanted U.S. participation.

Assad said that it was in the Palestinians' interests to co-ordinate with Damascus over its peace talks with Israel, to avoid Israel putting off a resolution with the Palestinians.

"We believe that if Israel signs [a peace agreement] with Syria, Israel will put away the Palestinian question."

Egypt was the first Arab country to sign a peace treaty with Israel, but it is often described as a cold peace since relations extend little beyond official government contacts.

Iran capable of nukes: Israel

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's military intelligence chief said that Iran is now capable of creating an atomic bomb.

Iranian state-run television reported Sunday that the military had test-fired a long-range missile, though the Fars News Agency said it was an anti-ship air-to-surface missile.

Amos Yadlin told Israel's cabinet Sunday that "Iran has crossed the technological threshold. Reaching a military-grade nuclear capability is a question of synchronizing its strategy with the production of a nuclear bomb."

Yadlin said that Iran is showing an interest in talking with the West to buy time to produce a nuclear weapon.

Mohammad Ali Jafari, the commander-in-chief of Iran's Revolutionary Guards, said that Iranian missiles can target Israeli nuclear sites.

'We will stay until Gilad's return'

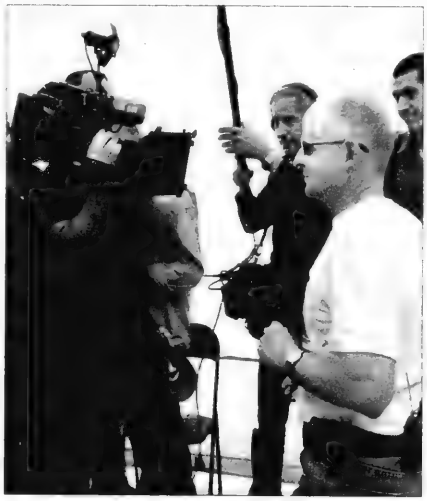
Gilad Schalit was abducted by Gaza militants in a 2006 cross-border raid. In return for his release, Hamas, which rules in the Gaza Strip, has demanded the release of hundreds of Palestinians held in Israeli prisons.

"We will stay in the [protest] tent until the end of Olmert's term, or until Gilad returns," Noam Schalit said on Sunday in an interview with Army Radio from the protest tent in Jerusalem.

Last weekend, Olmert criticized the public demonstrations urging Schalit's release, claiming that the advocacy campaign is encouraging Hamas to harden its position in negotiations.

Schalit's father addressed remarks made previously by Olmert, who insisted that mass protests for Gilad Schalit were undermining efforts to secure his release, saying that "the prime minister mainly tells us what we can't do, but we don't see him doing anything that yields any kind of result."



Noam Schalit speaks to the media in the protest tent outside the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem.

He added that he is examining the situation using the "results test," and the outcome is that Gilad is still exactly where he was in 2006.

"It's not reasonable that the State of Israel, with all its resources and its long arm, can't manage to bring back an abducted Israeli soldier," Schalit said.

"We're not telling the government to do this or that," he continued. "I don't give advice over the radio, nor do I give recipes to the prime minister– let him do what he must. But we're here, and we're not moving from here."

Third bulldozer attack

A bulldozer driver overturned a police car and rammed a bus in Jerusalem in an apparent terrorist attack before being shot. Two police officers were slightly injured in the attack last Thursday, Israel Police said. Police and a cab driver shot the bulldozer driver, who was identified by Israeli media as a 26-year-old Palestinian resident of eastern Jerusalem. He died of his wounds. The driver also reportedly tried to flip over cars near the Malha Mall. Last July, a Palestinian from eastern Jerusalem used a bulldozer in downtown Jerusalem to kill three and injure dozens. Two weeks later, 24 people were injured in a similar attack.

Examining Pope Pius' record

Yad Vashem will co-operate with a Catholic study institute to evaluate research on Pope Pius XII's role during the Holocaust. Scholars from Yad Vashem's International Institute for Holocaust Research were to have met this week with scholars from the Jerusalem-based Studium Theologicum Salesianum to evaluate the controversial pope's wartime record. The meeting was being held "to understand the present state of research on the man and the topic, and is an opportunity for an exchange of updated knowledge and a sharing of scholarly opinions," a statement from Yad Vashem said. Many historians have accused Pius of turning a blind eye to Jewish suffering during the Holocaust, while the Vatican and other historians assert that Pius worked behind the scenes to save Jews. Yad Vashem in particular has come under criticism for an exhibit caption that ascribes "silence and the absence of guidelines" during the Holocaust to Pius. The meeting comes amid preparations for a visit to Israel in May by Pope Benedict XVI that will include a stop at Yad Vashem. It also comes amid an ongoing process promoting the beatification of Pius and after a report last week that the Vatican produced a 1943 document to bolster its assertion that Pope Pius XII worked behind the scenes to save Jews during World War II.

U.K. cancels embassy move

The British Embassy in Israel called off a move to new offices in Tel Aviv because the building's owner is involved in West Bank construction. The building is partly owned by the Africa-Israel Investments Ltd. real estate company; a subsidiary of the firm owned by Israeli billionaire Lev Leviev that has built homes in three West Bank communities. Leviev recently settled in Britain. The British Embassy received documents from Africa-Israel Investments a week ago detailing its activities in the West Bank. Based on that information, the embassy decided not to rent the property. A lease had not been signed. The planned move was announced a year ago. After media coverage of the move, as well as the activities of the company, pro-Palestinian groups began protesting the British foreign office.

Britain's new Hezbollah policy

The British government said it will re-establish contact with Hezbollah. Britain had halted all contact with the Lebanese Shiite militia four years ago. Canada, the United States and Israel consider it a terrorist group. The British government announced it would resume contacts with Hezbollah's political wing. The announcement came on the heels of a visit by British Prime Minister Gordon Brown to Washington, D.C., and British officials said the move was discussed in advance with the Obama administration. A statement from the British Foreign Ministry said the government had "reconsidered our position on no contact with Hezbollah in light of more positive recent political developments in Lebanon" – notably, the participation of Hezbollah in the formation of a national unity government in Lebanon.

Mauritania expels envoy

The Foreign Ministry said it had closed its embassy in Mauritania after the government of this overwhelmingly Muslim West African nation asked the Israeli ambassador and his staff to leave. The move came after Mauritania's military junta recalled its own ambassador from Israel last month due to the campaign against Hamas in Gaza.

Rabbinical court ombudsman rebukes judge's ruling

By CNAAN LIPSHSITZ
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem's rabbinic court erred and overstepped its authority last year when it retroactively declared that the converted, Canadian-Israeli son of prominent Jewish philosopher Emil Fackenheim is a non-Jew, the court's ombudsman ruled earlier this month.

Eliezer Goldberg, the former Supreme Court justice and state comptroller who monitors rabbinic court activity, rejected the ruling made in August 2008 by Jerusalem rabbinic judge Yissachar Dov Hagar regarding Yossi Fackenheim, the 30-year-old son of the late Holocaust survivor, esteemed theologian and Reform rabbi.

Hagar – who was reviewing Yossi Fackenheim's divorce from his former wife; Iris, unexpectedly declared that he "was not and had never been Jewish," despite the man's haredi conversion in Canada at the age of two. Therefore, the judge concluded, there was no need for a formal get, or divorce document.

The couple married in 2001 in Jerusalem in a ceremony conducted by Israel's Chief Rabbinate, which years earlier had approved the conversion he underwent with his mother in Toronto, prior to the family immigrating to Israel in 1984.

In his complaint to Goldberg, Fackenheim – who has no children – said a simple divorce had "unnecessarily turned into a humiliating expulsion" from the Jewish people. "The judge also made derogatory remarks about my profession," Fackenheim – an actor studying for his master's degree at London University – told Ha'aretz. "I came completely unprepared and didn't think for one minute I'd walk out with a document expelling me from my people."

Rabbi Hagar nullified the conversion after learning that Fackenheim did not go to synagogue often or observe Halachah, the Jewish religious code. The rabbinic court administration later defended the ruling as justified.

In his letter of rebuke, obtained by Anglo File, Goldberg wrote: "These are offensive and rude statements that do not befit the status of a rabbinic judge or a judicial institution of the state." He added he would have taken disciplinary action against the judge in question if it were not for the man's imminent retirement.

"Goldberg's rebuke is a positive development," Fackenheim said, "but I'm not sure how much it will help me in my struggle with the religious establishment to have that judge's ruling reversed."

In parallel to lodging the complaint against Hagar with Goldberg, Fackenheim is also fighting to have Hagar's retroactive decision overturned with the help of the Israel Religious Action Center, the legal arm of the Reform movement in Israel, whose leadership defines the case as both "crucial and alarming."

Einat Horowitz, the attorney the action centre has appointed to handle the case, said that "rabbinic judges may consider Goldberg's rebuke, but are not bound to it." She added that she would file a petition to the High Court of Justice on Fackenheim's behalf within a few weeks. "Yossi Fackenheim's status is not clear right now," she said. "He has one document from a rabbinic judge saying he's not Jewish. If he wishes to get married again, no rabbi will be able to wed him."

After the Holocaust, Yossi Fackenheim's father, Emil Fackenheim, who served in Canada as a Reform rabbi, spoke of the "614th commandment," a concept alleging that "to despair of the God of Israel is to continue Adolf Hitler's work."

Emil Fackenheim, who died in 2003, believed Jews had an obligation to observe their faith and frustrate Hitler's goal of eliminating Judaism.

> 'Case highlights the current chaos within the rabbinic court system on the issue of conversions'

The Yossi Fackenheim case is unique in two aspects, according to U.S.-born Rabbi Seth Farber, head of ITIM, a non-profit organization that helps Israelis navigate the Chief Rabbinate bureaucracy. "We often handle cases in which the Israeli Rabbinate's conversions tribunal fails to recognize conversions performed abroad," he said. "This case is different and unprecedented in that the rabbinic court nullified a conversion the court itself had already approved."

The second aspect, according to Farber, is the judge's questioning Fackenheim's Jewishness without being asked, is contrary to past practice. "This case, which began as a simple divorce, highlights the current chaos within the rabbinic court system on the issue of conversions," he said.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, the leader of the U.S. Jewish Reform movement, said that Fackenheim's case "has sent shock waves in the Reform community."

David Ellenson, the president of Hebrew Union College, recalled the retroactive nullification last year of thousands of conversions performed by the state-sponsored Conversion Authority headed by Rabbi Haim Druckman. "That Jewish identity can be revoked means an erosion of the certainty that each of us can have in our faith," he said.

Hod Hasharon's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Reuven Hiller – who is an outspoken critic of the Reform movement – also voiced harsh opposition to retroactive nullification of conversions. "I wholeheartedly object to such rulings," he said. "This is an extreme view that has no place in Judaism, and its recent emergence is very regrettable. In the past, the hardline haredi establishment fought against the nullifying conversions at all price. Now we see a complete reversal, which shouldn't be allowed to happen."

Jewish Studies is pleased to present

THE FOUNDATION FOR BETTER COMMUNITIES LECTURE ON:

The Arts of Passover from Antiquity to Today

The Passover story of the exodus from Egypt has inspired Jewish artistic responses for nearly two millennia. From images on ancient synagogue walls to illustrated books used at the medieval Seder, from early modern canvases to today's matzo boxes, visual representations of Passover often contain hidden messages among their straightforward narratives. This talk explores some of the beautiful and powerful works of art produced in connection with this central event in Jewish history.

Meyer Family Lecture Series — Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Chair — Allan Kerbel Memorial Lecture Series

Series explores how religion shapes current affairs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian broadcast journalist Martin Himel, based in Israel since the 1980s, has produced an ambitious 13-part Vision TV documentary series on religious faith.

Twist of Faith focuses on how religion shapes current events and how current events affect belief.

Three of the segments deal directly with Judaism and Israel, while a fourth touches on the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Religion and Conflict, scheduled to be broadcast on March 16 at 10 p.m., turns, in part, on the Palestinian town of Bethlehem and its historic Church of Nativity.

Although Bethlehem, the birthplace of Jesus, is supposed to be a symbol of peace, it is caught in the pincers of Israel's struggle with the Palestinians.

Due to a spate of suicide bombings that took place in neighbouring Jerusalem during the second intifadah, Israel sealed off Bethlehem with a high concrete wall. Himel briefly examines the suffocating effect it has had on Bethlehem and interviews an Israeli police officer who lost his legs in such a bombing.

His most effective interview is with a Palestinian shopkeeper, who says wearily, "We have to remember we're all human beings."

In this episode, Himel also examines the conflict between Christians and Muslims in Kosovo and Shiite-Sunni tensions since the flight of 750,000 Iraqi refugees to Jordan.

The Future of Judaism, to be televised on April 13 at 10 p.m., unfolds in Israel, New York City and Toronto.

In Israel, Himel profiles a strictly Orthodox American immigrant family that gathers strength and direction from the certainty and continuity of Orthodoxy.

He contrasts their restrictive lifestyle with that of Israeli secular Jews, but spends far too little time fleshing out this important theme.

Moving on to the United States, Himel talks to a rabbi on the Lower East Side who says that Israel does not fortify Jewish identity, to the owner of a famous delicatessen who makes the case that traditional Jewish delicacies bring Jews closer to Judaism, and to a fashion designer whose garments are influenced by Torah scrolls.

He then turns his attention to an interfaith family in Toronto, saying that such unions are becoming increasingly common.

Himel's conclusion is that Judaism, Orthodoxy aside, is evolving in response to an ever-changing world.

In Marriage and Divorce, to be broadcast on May 4 at 10 p.m., he profiles an observant Israeli Jewish women who feel oppressed by the inordinate power of the rabbinate, which controls marriage and divorce in the Jewish state.

He talks to two young women in Jerusalem who cannot obtain a Jewish divorce, a get, because the rabbinic court has sided with their husbands. Both women think they are the victims of a glaring injustice.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, an Orthodox rabbi who empathizes with their situation, argues that rabbinic courts lack sensitivity and are out of touch with modern realities. Women, he says, should be able to extricate themselves from this intolerable impasse.

The Temple Mount Controversy, the last in Himel's series, to be televised on June 1 at 10 p.m., turns on a pivotal holy site in the heart of Jerusalem, known as the Temple Mount to Jews and the Noble Sanctuary to Muslims. Himel claims that, unless they share it, there will never be peace in the region.

If he is right, both sides are doomed to perpetual conflict.

Jews differ on a lot of issues, he observes, but they agree that the Temple Mount, the locale of the ancient temple, is Judaism's most holy site.

The Temple Mount in Jerusalem

For Muslims, the Noble Sanctuary is associated with the prophet Mohammed's journey to Jerusalem and two buildings bound up with Islam – the Dome of the Rock and the Al Aqsa mosque.

Judging by Himel's interviews, Muslim clerics are particularly adamant over the ownership of the site. The mufti of Jerusalem, a perfect example of unreasonableness, rejects Jewish rights to the Temple Mount and adds that if Jews want peace, they should stay away from it.

He and others claim, without the slightest shred of evidence, that Israeli archeological excavations are damaging the foundations of the Noble Sanctuary.

In closing, Himel interviews a group of high-minded Jews and Arabs who believe that the Temple Mount should be shared. But, as he suggests, they are definitely in a minority.

Charming Israeli film explores love and hate

Dan Katzir's charming made-in-Israel movie, Out for Love, Be Back Shortly, turns on two diametrically opposed forces, love and hate.

Scheduled to be screened by the Jewish Film Society on March 15 at the Al Green Theatre at 4 and 7:30 p.m., the 55-minute film unfolds against the backdrop of a host of events – Israel's peace treaty with Jordan, a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, a demonstration in protest over former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's pro-peace policies and Rabin's assassination.

The director, who doubles as the narrator, is an earnest young man in search of companionship and love.

The film opens with a grainy home movie of Katzir's post-bar mitzvah festivities and fades into graphic scenes of Palestinian boys throwing rocks during the first intifadah.

As these brief sequences disappear, Katzir, a former paratrooper, shows up at Dizengoff Square, which, to him, symbolizes freedom.

Katzir, who narrates the film in English, meets a fetching young woman there. Her name is Iris Arieh, and he will meet her again and again.

Returning from his accidental meeting with Iris, Katzir talks to his grandmother. She is busy baking a pie and talking about her late husband, Aaron, a renowned scientist who was killed in a 1972 terrorist attack at Ben-Gurion Airport.

As she grieves for him, she hears on the radio that a bus has been blown up near her apartment in Tel Aviv. She is concerned that her granddaughter, Katzir's sister, may have been on the bus.

"We pay a high price to live in this country," she says solemnly.

After running into Iris again, Katzir wonders when he will have a chance to kiss her. But his romantic longings are soon drowned out by Rabin's murder and his anger over his assassination.

Eventually, Katzir comes to terms with life and learns how to express his emotions, much to Iris' delight.

Out for Love is a delightful confection brimming with youthful romance and the play of current events.

An accompanying Israeli short, The Red Toy, by Dani Rosenberg, charts the fate of a clattering, flashing toy found by a Palestinian boy in a Jerusalem garbage dump.

The toy, tracked by surveillance cameras in the city, gets passed from one hand to another until it lands in the dump yet again.

The exact meaning of The Red Toy is debatable, but it may have something to do with the randomness of life.

In any event, it is certainly a most unusual film.

Debut novel set in lingerie shop in Boro Park

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Sima's Undergarments for Women unfolds like the relationship between two lovers; from the initial chance encounter to the giddy delights of flirtation and to the heartbreaking trauma of the final goodbye.

But Ilana Stanger-Ross' debut novel is not your ordinary love story. It's about the relationship between a woman in her mid-60s and an Israeli in her 20s.

And it's set in a bra shop.

Sima Goldner owns a lingerie shop in the basement of the home she shares with her husband of 46 years, Lev. It is tucked deep in the Orthodox neighbourhood of Boro Park in Brooklyn, where mothers walk down the street with an army of children in tow.

Sometimes these mothers stop into the shop with their daughters to buy them their first bra, perhaps, or, when they're older, underclothes for their wedding dress.

Sometimes they just drop by to gossip or exchange recipes.

That's pretty much Sima's life up to now, and she's been running her business for so long, she can tell a woman's bra size just with a casual glance. But something is missing. Her marriage is loveless and she has no children of her own.

But Sima's life is transformed overnight when Timna, a beautiful young Israeli woman, walks into her store seemingly to buy underwear but is really looking for work. Seduced by her youth and charm, Sima makes Timna her new seamstress and assistant.

Sima admires Timna's beauty and perfect body, wishing she admired her own body more when she was young. She envies everything about Timna, and we get the impression there is much regret in Sima's life.

Sima quickly becomes enamoured of Timna. Her days at the shop become richer and more joyful. She loves to hear Timna talk about her boyfriend in Israel, Alon, and the way her face lights up when she mentions him.

Like a teenage girl smitten by a boy, Sima talks about Timna non-stop to her best friend, Connie. And like a jilted lover, she becomes possessive over her, frustrated that Timna consumes her whole world, while she is only a small piece of Timna's life. Soon Sima starts to follow Timna after work to find out what she does outside the shop, and she also starts to interfere directly in her life.

The story, told in an easy, conversational style, segues nicely from the present to Sima's past, and we learn that Sima underwent fertility tests shortly after her wedding to determine why she couldn't have children.

Timna becomes the daughter Sima never could have. Like a mother, Sima worries about her all the time and always suspects the worst has happened to her.

The story is told from Sima's point of view, and there is much about Timna we don't know. And some of the things we do know are only conjecture and suspicion on Sima's part. Is she cheating on Alon, for instance? We never do find out. There is a mystery to Timna that the book unfortunately never fully resolves.

But this is Sima's story after all. We are meant to sympathize with her. She wanted nothing more, when she was younger, than to bear children and instead finds herself in a loveless marriage and carrying a secret inside her for 46 years.

But Sima is not without fault, either. She is meddlesome, suffocating even, at times.

Like Sima, Stanger-Ross' debut novel, published by Overlook Press, is not without fault, but there is much to enjoy as well. Because it is set in a women's undergarment store, I am trying really hard to avoid calling this book uplifting.

But it is that and much more.

Ballerinas are rehearsing in Tel Aviv.
Chefs are preparing dinner in Jerusalem.
Visitors are strolling the gardens of Haifa.
Musicians are preparing for a concert in ancient Beit She'an.
Archeologists are digging on Masada.
TODAY in ISRAEL
Children are playing, people are smiling, and visitors from around the world are enjoying the restaurants, the hotels, the ancient sites, and the endless wonders of today's Israel. In other words – today is another beautiful day in Israel, where everyone always has a warm and friendly "Shalom" for you. Today is a perfect day for you to plan your trip to Israel.

A CAPPELLA CHOIR VARSITY JEWS TO SING AT HOLY BLOSSOM

The Varsity Jews, a Jewish a cappella choir at the University of Toronto, is continuing a five-year tradition by performing an upcoming concert for charity – in this case for Te-Amim, a Toronto-based theatre group focusing on tolerance education through the arts.

Te-Amim is the only company in Canada using theatre to look at the history and legacy of the Holocaust as a route to addressing all forms of racism.

The choir boasts 20 members and performs at many events throughout the year. Its repertoire consists of Israeli folk songs and classic rock with a Jewish flavour. Over the past three years, the group has raised a total of $23,000 for charity.

The concert, Shticks and Tones, is being performed in the main sanctuary of Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St., Sunday, March 29, 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $8 to $20 and may be purchased by phone (416-913-2424), at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life (36 Harbord St.) or at the door. Reserved "sponsor" tickets are available for $72 for two seats. www.varsityjews.com

Net worth at separation dictates division of assets

Question: I understand that if I was to marry and then divorce, the equity in my present house could be split 50/50 with my wife without a marriage contract. If I were to sell the house before marrying, bank the money, buy a house together with my wife and then divorce, would my wife be entitled to the money in my bank account or only to the house that we bought together?

Answer: The house you bought together is primarily what would be divided. However, depending on her own net worth when you separate, the increase in the value of the money in the bank account — not its value as of the date of marriage — would also be subject to division. If you had $100,000 in the bank and through wise investment it became $200,000 by the time you separated, then the value of the increase could be subject to division — not the original $100,000.

Question: I just found out that I am not the biological father of my 10 year old. The father earns over 150K. The mother was his secretary. The mother also continued to work for him while visibly pregnant and went on maternity leave while still employed by him. Also, my son was born with a heart defect and has to be checked yearly by a specialist and will need an operation before he reaches the age of 30. Can I claim back support against the biological father and the mother for the 10 years the biological father and the mother deceived me?

Answer: No, sorry. Under those circumstances you cannot recoup your fatherly support.

Film explores discharged Israeli soldiers' drug abuse in India

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Israeli director Yoav Shamir's trek to India was not easy. His film Flipping Out took him to India's Himalayas and Goa beaches, where he documented young Israeli military veterans escaping the memories of their army service by turning to drugs.

"The Himalayas were difficult to get to – it's almost impossible to get there by plane and if there's a flight, it's only a 10-seater which hardly flies there – it's very remote," the award-winning filmmaker said from his Tel Aviv home.

To interview his subjects, Shamir travelled 24 hours by bus from Delhi, five hours by jeep and another three hours on foot, a trip he made four times in the two years it took to film the documentary.

The film explores the phenomenon known as "flipping out," which affects about 2,000 former Israeli soldiers yearly who end up needing psychological help when they experience psychotic breakdowns as a result of their drug abuse.

After their compulsory military service, many soldiers see travelling as a rite of passage. They often meet in India at guest houses and resorts where they experience LSD, ecstasy and other hallucinogenic drugs and attend huge all-night raves – parties where drug use is common.

Although the Israeli youths interviewed by Shamir seemed troubled by their military experiences, they laughed it off as the time of their lives. Still, many became drug dependent and vulnerable and ended up needing help.

"In India there are so many Jewish travellers, so Chabad has about 10 houses wherever there is a concentration of Israeli backpackers, providing a place to pray, keep kosher and for Shabbat," Shamir said.

Guy Sahar Russo, a former Israeli elite combat soldier, has been living for the past six years in India.

"Since Chabad is very integrated into travellers' lives and Indian life, when someone gets into trouble with drugs, a lot of the time they [Chabad] will be the first to hear if somebody is in a bad mental condition and they will help out."

But when the Israeli government became aware that Chabad was taking advantage of these young men and trying to have them become more religious, Shamir said the Israeli anti-drug authority established secular "warm houses" to help the young people.

In addition, parents concerned about their child's drug dependency hired former Mossad agent Helik Magnus to "rescue" delusional or dysfunctional youths with dramatic drug interventions. Magnus has returned hundreds of Israelis to their families, including one youth featured in Shamir's film.

Yoav Shamir

After his own military service, Shamir recalls, "I went travelling for three years to South America and India, but I never saw people flipping out from drugs."

Nevertheless, when producer Michael Sharfshtein came to him with the concept for the movie he was intrigued.

"Back in 2005, when my film Five Days was being screened at Toronto's Hot Docs film festival, I pitched the idea of Flipping Out, and the National Film Board was very interested." (The NFB's Kent Martin co-produced Flipping Out.)

Shamir received international acclaim for his award-winning Five Days, which documented the dismantling of Israeli settlements in Gaza, and for Checkpoint, which explored Israeli-Palestinian conflicts at border crossings.

Now that he has completed Flipping Out, Shamir has turned his attention to his latest documentary, Defamation, which explores anti-Semitism.

Defamation premiered last month at the Berlin International Film Festival, and Shamir has plans for its Canadian premiere at the Hot Docs 2009 festival, which begins April 30.

Flipping Out is available on DVD in mid-March at the NFB online store www.nfb.ca. For information on Defamation, visit www.defamation-thefilm.com

Publisher brings Judaism to the 'public square of discussion'

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

When Stuart Matlins, founder of Jewish Lights Publishing (JLP), was recognized for American Jewish Distinguished Service, he invoked the iconic James Cagney.

Standing on the podium nearly three years ago to accept the award from Hebrew Union College, Matlins reached back more than half a century to a line of Cagney dialogue: "Sometimes I believe more in dreams than in statistics."

Stuart Matlins

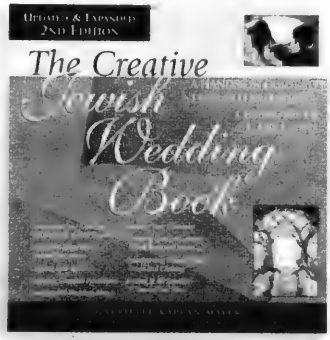
Not long afterward, in 2007, somewhere in the world, someone who speaks English, Italian or one of the numerous languages among JLP's translated editions, bought its two millionth book. That number was no dream.

In describing how and why he founded a niche Jewish publishing house in the bucolic hills of Vermont – with such diverse titles as to satisfy a spiritual hunger for rabbinic wisdom or a craving for Jewish aliens in outer space – Matlins could well have drawn inspiration from the title of that 1948 Cagney film, The Time of Your Life.

Indeed, this transplant from New York to Woodstock, Vt. (population 3,232), is having the time of his life nourishing readers with Jewish food for body and soul, be it yoga and the aleph bet or the modern man's Torah commentary.

It's a mission for him, publishing as "outreach" to other Jews, those who go to bookstores, not to shuls, "to share with them the relevance of Judaism to their lives."

Making a midlife move to a village and operating Jewish Lights from a converted dairy barn might suggest that the 68-year-old entrepreneur has come full circle, returning to the Polish shtetl roots that his family left in 1902 to cross the ocean to America.



And as in the shtetl, parnassah (business) and kavanah (intent when we pray) aren't far from each other. Step out the front door of Jewish Lights and it's just three or so miles to the country shul that Matlins and his wife, Antoinette, founded 25 years ago, when they traded Manhattan's go-go for the Green Mountain State's slow-mo.

But Matlins didn't settle in Woodstock to publish books. The former managing partner for the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton was still seeing clients when he took a successful stab at refreshing and reissuing a book on gemstones that his wife had authored.

Then, as these stories go, Matlins happened to be attending a Jewish summer study retreat when an acquaintance put a bug in his ear. That bug concerned the out-of-print books of Lawrence Kushner, an American rabbi known for his writings on spirituality and mysticism. Would Matlins consider adopting the orphaned titles that could still attract readership?

Initially, he brushed off the suggestion. But the prospect soon took shape as Matlins became convinced of the books' potential market – Conservative, Reform and non-affiliated Jews he felt were underserved in publishing circles.

His target audience, particularly those with ID tags from the consciousness-raising 1960s, were increasingly curious about Judaism's approach to the issues of poverty and social justice. And their interests dovetailed with the growing tikkun olam (repair the world) movement that was inspiring many to greater involvement in Jewish community life.

"No one [outside of publishing targeted at the Orthodox] was focusing on creating a body of inspirational literature and resources based on the Jewish wisdom tradition to help people lead a Jewish life," Matlins said in a telephone interview.

And the difficulty of staying connected Jewishly in a small town had its own unexpected benefit. "Had we not moved to Woodstock, we never would have understood the need for the kinds of books we publish."

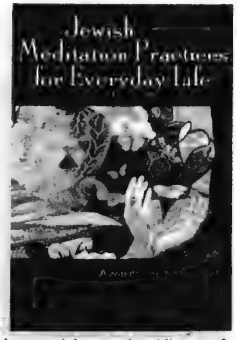
What began in 1990 as a modest venture headquartered in the guest house on his property quickly outstripped its space and staff. Within two years, Jewish Lights had moved to offices in a converted old dairy barn in town, and has since added 8,000 square feet of warehouse in nearby Windsor, Vt.

That "town square" location suits a company that aims to bring Judaism, as Matlins puts it, into the "public square of discussion" on contemporary issues.

To that end, one can find among JLP's 260 titles Jewish ethics and social justice, Judaism and ecology, even spirituality in the workplace. With theology as its guide, the publisher can go just about anywhere in the Jewish galaxy of life-cycle events and tradition, from texts on baby-naming to restoring spiritual meaning to the bar mitzvah.

While it's mostly Jews who buy the books, about one-third of readers are Christian or of other faiths, drawn to themes both Jewish and non-denominational, such as the illustrated God's Paintbrush for young children. And while Matlins is a regular at Jewish book fairs, he can also be found at the annual trade show of Christian religious booksellers in the United States.

That cross-cultural interest is reflected globally, too: more than a dozen languages, including Hindi, Portuguese and French, are represented among the JLP texts in translation. One that's made it into 14 languages, including Korean, is The Empty Chair, a compendium of aphorisms from the long-dead Rabbi Nachman of Breslov.



(How Empty Chair found its way to Woodstock is a story with twists and turns that Matlins relishes recounting: initially, he turned down a chassidic group's request to distribute its books, but subsequently, a chance encounter with a haunting Breslover melody while on a trip to Jerusalem kindled his interest.)

Although Jewish Lights releases mostly non-fiction, it does have a playful side. Under its imprint, one can find two first-rate short story anthologies of Jewish-themed crime fiction, Mystery Midrash and Criminal Kabbalah. For readers who like to orbit the fantasy-science fiction shelves, there are two compendiums of the genre, Wandering Stars and More Wandering Stars, while graphic novel enthusiasts can enjoy the Rabbi Harvey adventure series set in the Wild West. (Harvey is especially popular in France.)

Matlins will keep expanding JLP's range. Because in accepting the award from Hebrew Union College, he not only spoke of dreams and statistics, he also quoted from Ecclesiastes 12:12: "Of making many books there is no end…"

Israel & the Jewish World

Our missiles can hit Israel: Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iranian missiles can reach Israeli nuclear sites, a top Iranian military commander said last week, amid persistent speculation that Israel could target facilities involved in Iran's atomic work.

"All the nuclear facilities in different parts of the land under the occupation of the Zionist regime are in the reach of Iran's missile defences," the commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary Guards, Mohammad Ali Jafari, said, according to Iran's ISNA news agency.

Iranian officials often refer to Israel's government, which Tehran does not recognize, as the "Zionist regime."

Last month, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said that Iran would welcome talks with the United States – but only if there was mutual respect. Iranian officials have said that means the United States has to stop accusing Iran of seeking to build nuclear weapons and supporting terrorism, charges Tehran has denied.

Ahmadinejad recently urged the United States to change its "satanic" ways if it is serious about wanting change.

"Change means giving up your satanic, coercive and aggressive ways and instead adopting more human morals… If you accept this invitation, it will be to the benefit of yourself and your nation," Ahmadinejad told a crowd in northwestern Iran. He did not mention Barack Obama by name but was clearly referring to the new U.S. president's administration.

Those demands could help explain why U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in a visit to Jerusalem that Obama's attempts to reach out to Iran have so far been unsuccessful. She reassured her Israeli hosts that U.S. diplomacy should not be confused with softness, saying Washington remained committed to preventing Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons and funding terrorism.

Meanwhile last week, Iran's top authority said that Obama was pursuing the same "wrong path" as former U.S. president George W. Bush in supporting Israel, which he called a "cancerous tumour."

The comments by Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who has the final say on policy in the Islamic Republic, are likely to disappoint the new U.S. administration, which wants to engage Iran but has called on Tehran to "unclench its fist."

"Even the new president of America, who has come to power with slogans about changing Bush's policies, is defending state terrorism by talking about unconditional commitment to Israel's security," Khamenei said.

Iran is one of the most important political and financial supporters of Hamas, which the United States and many European countries consider a terrorist group.

Hamas' most powerful official in Gaza, Mahmoud Zahar, attended a recent conference in Tehran, and Iranian state television said Tehran would focus on how to provide assistance to the Palestinians.

The United States has long called on Iran to end its opposition to peace-making in the Middle East and to stop supporting organizations such as Lebanon's Hezbollah and the Palestinian Hamas group that Washington considers terrorists.

Iran says these groups are fighting an illegal occupation on Palestinian land and does not recognize Israel's right to exist.

One Iranian analyst said Khamenei may be restating Iran's tough line to make clear Tehran would not easily give up regional policies that could be bargaining chips in any talks.

"He is saying, 'You also have to change if you want us to change,'" said the analyst, who asked not be named. "Iran cannot afford letting go of its regional policies. It cannot happen that easily."

Breaking with Bush, Obama's administration has talked of engaging with Iran on a range of issues, including its disputed nuclear ambitions. But a senior U.S. official said last week that it is doubtful Iran will respond to any offers of engagement when they are made.

Ultimately, any decision will depend on Khamenei, who has so far not directly addressed the issue of Obama's overtures, but has in the past said U.S. governments could not be trusted.

"Another big mistake is to say that the only way to save the Palestinian nation is by negotiations," Khamenei said.

"Negotiations with whom? With an occupying and bullying regime, who does not believe in any other principle other than force?… Or negotiations with America and Britain, who committed the biggest sin in creating and supporting this cancerous tumor… ?" he added.

"The way to salvation [for Palestinians] is standing firm and resisting," the supreme leader said.

Khamenei also said the Holocaust, in which six million Jews died at the hands of the Nazis, was used to "usurp" Palestinian land and said the West and Israel show the weakness of their cause by not allowing anyone to question the Holocaust.

Jewish ballplayers tune up at spring training

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Spring is a time of renewal – especially for the aspiring ballplayers who recently reported to 16 spring training sites in Florida and another 14 in Arizona. Among them you can find enough Jewish players to at least form a minyan.

Boston Red Sox first sacker Kevin Youkilis enjoyed a banner season in 2008, and in January, management showed their appreciation by giving the Cincinnati native, who turns 30 this month, a four-year, $41-million (all figures US) contract extension.

The 6'1, 220-pound slugger batted .312, whacked 29 homers and drove in 115 runs last year. He added 43 doubles, and as a result of his stellar performance, Youkilis won the American League Hank Aaron Award for best offensive performance of the year.

And he can field, too. He holds the major league record of 238 straight games at first base without an error, a streak that ended last June.

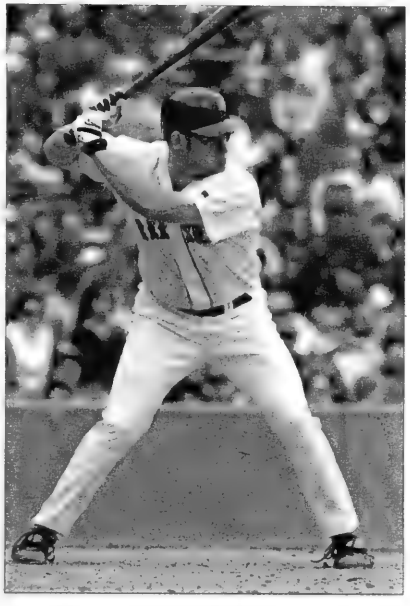
Ryan Braun of the Brewers, the son of an Israeli father, chosen the fifth player overall in the 2005 Major League baseball draft, is in the second year of an eight-year pact with Milwaukee. Small wonder his club locked him up for so long a stretch, since he has helped turn the franchise around.

Described as a future perennial all star, Braun, 25, who was 2007 rookie of the year in the National League, batted .285 in 2008, hit 37 homers and drove in 106 runs. Due to his defensive shortcomings, Braun was switched from third base to the outfield last season and adapted well to his new position.

Texas Rangers' second sacker Ian Kinsler, 26, excelled in 2008, hitting .319 along with 18 homers and 71 RBIs to go along with 41 doubles. He also stole 26 bases and was voted to the Major League all-star team. The son of a Jewish father played his last game on Aug. 17, when an MRI revealed a sports hernia injury that required surgery.

In early January, the Colorado Rockies added depth to their rotation, acquiring durable right-hander Jason Marquis, 30, from the Chicago Cubs. The former Brave and Cardinal had an 11-9 record with a 4.53 ERA in 2008. The Jewish hurler, described as a workhorse, has had double-digit wins in each of the last five seasons, surpassing 190 innings four times. An added bonus is that for a pitcher he's a more-than-decent hitter, managing five homers and 40 RBIs in his nine-year career. The almost $10-million-a-year athlete is on occasion summoned as a pinch hitter.

Solid reserve outfielder, Gabe Kapler, 33, has found a new home. In 2007 the fitness buff retired and took a managerial job in the minors. Deciding that he could still play at the major league level, he signed a one-year pact with Milwaukee in 2008. Coming off the bench – in only 229 at bats – he hit .301, with eight homers and 38 RBIs.



Boston's Kevin Youkilis

Kapler's season ended in September when he tore a muscle in his right shoulder after making a hard throw to the plate. Again in demand as a spare part, Kapler, a lifetime .273 hitter, signed a one-year pact for $1 million with the Tampa Bay Rays in January.

Also on the move is veteran catcher Brad Ausmus, who turns 40 in April. He has caught more than 1,800 games in the majors and will act as a backup receiver and mentor this year for the Los Angeles Dodgers, who signed him as a free agent to a one-year pact.

Last season, Ausmus completed his 10th year with the Houston Astros. A .251 lifetime hitter, Ausmus hit .218 to go along with three homers and 24 RBIs. His strength is his ability to call a game and handle pitchers well. There are few ball clubs who won't offer Ausmus a coaching job when he retires.

Relief pitcher Josh Grabow, 30, enjoyed a banner season in 2008 with a poor Pittsburgh Pirates team. The left-hander had an impressive 6-3 record and an ERA of 2.84 in 74 appearances. The Arcadia, Calif. native, who stands 6'2 and weighs 250 pounds, is heading into his eighth season. He has a fastball in the low 90s, a strong change-up and curve, and works well with runners in scoring position.

Hawaii-born pitcher Scott Feldman, 26, of the Texas Rangers can start or relieve. Last season, he went 6-8 with an inflated ERA of 5.29 in 25 starts. In 151 innings, he managed only 74 strikeouts and walked too many batters. At 6'5 and 210 pounds, he is a formidable figure on the mound and gives right-handed batters fits due to his unorthodox delivery.

Left-handed reliever Craig Breslow, 28, already has the label of a journeyman hurler. Now with the Minnesota Twins after being claimed off waivers last May from Cleveland, he has also played with Boston and San Diego. Last year he fashioned a 0-2 record but with a sparkling ERA of 1.91 in 49 appearances. Craig is a decent strikeout artist, but sometimes gets himself into difficulty with an occasional lack of control. The New Haven, Conn., hurler is especially tough on left-handed batters.

Watch also for 26-year-old Brian Horwitz, an outfielder in camp with the San Francisco Giants, who hit .277 with seven homers and 29 RBI s in only 264 at bats with AAA Fresno, as well as Colorado Rockies right hander Jason Hirsh, 27, who was out most of last year with a strained right shoulder, and right-handed relief pitcher Mike Koplove, 32, who was signed by the Phillies and invited to spring training.

Straight talk about feeding tubes

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

It started with a phone call. "I need your advice about whether or not we should put a feeding tube into my father." It was the mother of one of our children's friends.

"He had a very bad stroke and has recovered and is an acute-care hospital awaiting placement. He can't eat and we have had two conflicting opinions about putting in the tube, and my brother and I don't know what to do."

It is a common scenario, played out in hospitals all over world. Depending on the jurisdiction and the ethno-cultural perspectives or religious views of those involved, the issue can be tilted one way or the other.

For those who subscribe to religions that espouse the sanctity of life, it is almost deemed obligatory to put in a feeding tube (usually called a gastrostomy tube or G-Tube) with the procedure called a percutaneous endoscopic gastrostomy or PEG.

For those who espouse the quality-of-life perspective, the procedure might be rejected if, in the opinion of the potential recipient or their surrogate, it does not add anything substantially to the patient's quality of life.

There are many individuals who have no fixed personal, religious or cultural dominant view and who are open to considering any medical procedures as long as they know and understand the implications of the proposed treatment.

There are some health-care professionals who have interpreted the medical literature on the subject as an indication that feeding tubes have very little long-term benefit. There are others who contend that although this method of feeding does not achieve its goals in all circumstances, it does maintain life in many who would otherwise succumb to inanition.

I am frequently consulted by families and health-care staff if there is a conflict about inserting a feeding tube when someone can no longer eat, or eat safely, and there is a great deal of reluctance on everyone's part to attempt feeding, even a modified and "safer" diet.

An approach that I take regarding artificial feeding (another term often used for tube feeding) follows along a train of thought that takes into account clinical, personal, cultural, religious and family views.

The clinical question is important, as some conditions are such that there will be progressive deterioration and the feeding tube is merely a stopgap in the process and may not really change the actual course of the disease. In other conditions, the disease could stabilize, and artificial feeding might prolong life for an undefined and sometimes extensive period.

The next issue I consider is what the family believes the person would have wanted if he/she was able to give his/her views on the matter. Often family members who are substitute decision-makers forget or do not understand that their role in decision-making is to reflect what they, in good conscience, believe their loved one would have wanted if he/she could make the decision themselves. The personal view of the decision-maker should not be what governs the decision.

If religious views are held by the patient, they must be interpreted by the surrogate, sometimes with the assistance of religious advisers, to determine what is right in that religion's view.

At the end, a decision has to be made, but it is important to remember that in Canada, decisions such as these can be legally reversed and artificial feeding discontinued if there is reason to believe that it's not the best and most appropriate choice after it is tried for a period of time.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

MISO CHICKEN

CHICKEN:
4 x 4 oz. boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1 tsp canola oil

MARINADE:
2 tbls miso paste (buy at grocery store)
1 1/2 tsp light sesame oil
1 1/2 tsp chopped ginger
1 1/2 tsp chopped garlic
1/4 tsp red pepper flakes

Place chicken in a shallow dish. Combine marinade ingredients with 1 tablespoon water; pour over meat. Chill, covered, 1-2 hours. Remove chicken from marinade; drain excess. Heat canola oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Cook chicken until no longer pink in the center, about 4 min. per side.

Our schools are 'magnet schools'

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

"You shall not mistreat any widow or orphan. If you do mistreat them, I will heed their outcry." (Exodus 22:21-22)

"Justice, justice shall you pursue, that you may thrive." (Deuteronomy 16:20)

The Toronto District School Board has just announced the opening next September of some new alternative, theme-based schools. These are called magnet schools in other jurisdictions, in that they attract a particular segment of parents who are interested in a specific theme. In fact, there have always been thematic schools in the TDSB based on a special interest in arts, sports or a comfort zone for homosexual youth. Soon after the africentric school was announced, another parent group requested a school based on social justice. As my readers might remember, my reaction to the former was that all schools should be "gaia-centric" – that is, all aspects of our cosmos should be treated with equal respect and equal depth.

Now we can jokingly assume that other TDSB schools do not teach social justice, since a special school needs to be established for that purpose. But is it really a joke?

The irony here is that our spiritual tradition first taught the world about the life-critical need to care for the vulnerable, as quoted in Exodus above. It was our spiritual fore-parents who taught us to double the word "justice" so that the entire world would learn how justice alone must be the guiding principle of our daily behaviour.

These are the lessons that our schools teach. These are the reasons our schools are so magnetic that they attract thousands of parents to pay very high tuition fees for a special environment where the richness of our spiritual heritage can be fostered and passed from one generation to the next.

These faith-based schools can't be considered alternative and thematic solely because they are considered private. There is nothing private about the words of the Hebrew Bible. They have been public since first disseminated by the Jewish People. In a province that funds a religious stream that learned its first lessons in social justice from our teachings, it's a shame that other faith-based magnet schools are not part of the public domain.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

We can all fight anti-Semitism

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

You're back, strident and hostile anti-Semitism. Damn you! Leave us alone! But you won't.

What has lain in the hearts of millions over the centuries is once again being vomited out of the mucky place it lives in. Anti-Semitism hangs like a sword of Damocles over our heads. For those who have never seen anti-Semitism like this before, watch closely. It ignites. Then it spreads like a forest fire travelling at immense speed.

Anti-Semitism, our survivors, God bless them, told us all about you. They were right. Man, you are ugly.

Much is being done to fight anti-Semitism – often called "the longest hatred" – at a senior organizational and government level. Our Jewish student organizations were prepared for Israeli Apartheid Week; B'nai Brith and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto have met with senior administration at York University to argue our case following hooliganism against our Jewish students; CUPE Canada and the Liberal party have come out against the CUPE Ontario ban on Israeli academics' speaking in Ontario. No doubt some inside work was done to help this process along.

Internationally, a conference on anti-Semitism was held in the Houses of Parliament and at Lancaster House in England to devise ways of combating this hatred. Attendees and speakers included MP Irwin Cotler, members of the U.S. Congress and British Foreign Office Minister Lord Malloch Brown.

These are sound strategies – many facets of anti-Semitism need to be fought by governments and through major organizations.

There is, however, a level where anti-Semitism froths and requires a response from individuals, communities and smaller organizations – at the grassroots level, an area we rarely invest in.

For some reason, our leadership has failed to wrap our organizational genius around the development of a solid, multi-tiered, well-financed, broad-based community mobilization strategy ensuring survivors, seamstresses, lawyers, Birthright and March of the Living participants, doctors, truck drivers, rabbis, mothers, teens and professors, are all involved in fighting anti-Semitism.

The only organization offering Jews from every corner of the city a way to battle this haranguing bully as a community "on the ground" is the Jewish Defense League (JDL). It holds regular strategy meetings, has bused Jewish community members to Windsor where CUPE voted, and held a rally during Israel Apartheid Week. The JDL, however, is viewed as controversial by many. The bottom line is that our community and every Jewish neighbourhood around the world desperately need to come together in homes, offices and community centres to give us the chance to talk about our fears, help organize our own personal defence, understand the issues regarding Israel and Judaism, create tools to befriend our non-Jewish allies and more. Let's do so.

Approach our leadership and tell them we need to construct a community mobilization plan, with buy-in from all segments of the community, drawing upon skills from senior and junior members and securing funding for its planning and implementation. Alternatively, e-mail me if you are interested in being part of a grassroots movement.

Jewish communities have rarely developed a community mobilization plan. Leaders of old, such as revisionist Zionist Ze'ev Jabotinsky, yelled for this, but people rarely listened.

My fellow Jews, once again, you and I are not prepared to fight anti-Semitism. It is sui generis, unique to the Jewish people, something only we can understand; therefore, it is you and I who need to battle it. I implore us to do so.

Romans, Greeks, Haman, Ferdinand II and Isabella of Castile, Nazis – this is where anti-Semitism stops. We challenge you.

Harper renews call to defeat anti-Semitism

Compiled by CJN staff

OTTAWA — Anti-Semitism is a "a pernicious evil" that must be defeated, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said last week at a Parliament Hill ceremony organized by Chabad Lubavitch to honour Jewish victims of last November's terrorist attacks in Mumbai.

Harper expressed condolences for the murder at the Chabad centre in Mumbai of Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife Rivka, who were among six people in the building killed during the attacks. Their two-year-old son and his nanny escaped.

The killings were "affronts to the values that unite all civilized people," Harper said, adding that anti-Semitism "is a pernicious evil that must be exposed, that must be confronted, that must be repudiated, whenever and wherever it appears. Fuelled by lies and paranoia, we have learned from history, it is an evil so profound, indeed as we saw in Mumbai, that it is ultimately a threat to us all.

"Under our government, Canada will remain an unyielding defender of Jewish religious freedom, a forceful opponent of anti-Semitism in all of its forms and a staunch supporter of a secure and democratic State of Israel," he said to applause.

Harper described the quick instalment of a new rabbi at the Chabad centre in Mumbai as a signal that the Jewish People will "never bow to violence and hatred. When it comes to standing against hate and intolerance, none have persevered, none have been as resolute as the Jewish People," he said.

Netanyahu, Lieberman, sign deal

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Yisrael Beiteinu leader Avigdor Lieberman, whose policies have raised Arab ire and international concern, was designated as foreign minister on Monday in a coalition agreement with Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, who is working to form a governing majority in the Knesset.

The deal with Yisrael Beiteinu, still left Likud short of the majority needed. It also stated that Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu favour the creation of a wide coalition, leaving the door open for centrists to join, and raised the possibility that someone else may become foreign minister if other parties join the coalition.

Likud officials have said a unity government including the middle-of-the-road Kadima party led by the current foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, could help avoid friction with U.S. President Barack Obama, who has pledged to pursue Palestinian statehood.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Lieberman, a native of the former Soviet republic of Moldova, has stirred controversy by advocating the trading of land where many of Israel's 1.5 million Arab citizens live, for settlements in the West Bank in a peace deal with the Palestinians.

Avigdor Lieberman

His agreement with Likud could allow for stripping Israelis of citizenship rights over involvement in what Israel sees as terrorism or espionage.

The News in Brief

Canada

Campaign Falls Short

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver said its 2008 campaign raised $7.2 million, $800,000 short of its goal and $300,000 less than the previous year. Federation CEO Mark Gurvis blamed the economic climate, saying the number of pledges, 3,574, was down from 3,702 in 2007, when $7.5 million was raised. Allocations to beneficiary agencies won't change, and the federation has reduced its operating costs and will look for "additional budget reductions," Gurvis said. The 2008 campaign result marks an end to six straight years of growth, starting in 2002.

Graffiti At York U

TORONTO — Jewish groups at York University say anti-Semitic graffiti found March 11 in a men's washroom in York's student centre shows the campus atmosphere for Jews is "toxic." One message read: "Boycott Israeli Apartheid." Another replied, "Why? So you can help prove that Jews really can get away with whatever they want?" A complaint was filed with security. Hasbara at York president Aaron Rosenberg said there is a "toxic environment" at York for Jewish students, who face regular intimidation and hostility. Hasbarah and Hillel want York president Mamdouh Shoukri to publicly denounce all forms of anti-Semitism on campus.

Complaint Dismissed

WINNIPEG — A human rights complaint against B'nai Brith Canada that grew out of a 2003 conference it hosted in Winnipeg for emergency responders about terrorism has been dismissed by the Manitoba Human Rights Commission after a five-year investigation. The complaint against B'nai Brith was filed by Shahina Siddiqui, executive director of the Islamic Social Service Association of the United States and Canada. It alleged comments made at the meeting were biased against Muslims. Siddiqui didn't attend the conference but relied on reports from unnamed sources.

Hacker In Court

CALGARY — An Israeli computer whiz known as the Analyzer who once hacked into the Pentagon's computers and is now alleged to be part of a multimillion-dollar global hacker ring faces extradition to the United States May 7. Ehud Tanenbaum, 29, was arrested Aug. 28 in Montreal and brought to Calgary to face charges related to a $1.8-million theft from a local financial institution. U.S. authorities allege he's also involved in thefts from hundreds of financial institutions in Europe and elsewhere, a bail hearing heard this month. In 1998, he was sentenced to 15 months in jail in Israel for the Pentagon incident.

Arrest Warrant Issued For Demjanjuk

MUNICH — A Munich court has issued an arrest warrant for alleged Nazi war criminal Ivan Demjanjuk.

After months of investigations, Munich city prosecutors announced March 11 that Demjanjuk, 88, is charged with having been a guard at the Sobibor extermination camp in Poland from March to September 1943, and having been involved in the murder of at least 29,000 Jews.

The prosecutors said a trial would be held in the city's highest court immediately after the retired autoworker's impending extradition to Germany from the United States, where the Ukraine native has lived in suburban Cleveland since 1952. With the U.S. Supreme Court's refusal last summer to bar his extradition, there appears to be no legal obstacle to the elder Demjanjuk standing trial in Germany.

Demjanjuk's son says his father isn't well enough for another trial. He was accused in the early 1980s of being the notorious guard "Ivan the Terrible" at the Treblinka death camp, but he was released from jail in Israel after seven years when, during the appeals process, he could not be identified as "Ivan" beyond a reasonable doubt.

The U.S. Justice Department later said Demjanjuk had been a guard at Sobibor and could be deported because he lied about his Nazi past to obtain U.S. citizenship.

New Republic Sold

WINNIPEG — Facing a debt payment deadline, Canwest Global Communications, controlled by Winnipeg's Asper family, said last week that it has sold the New Republic magazine back to the editor it bought it from in 2007. Terms of the deals weren't disclosed, but analysts say Canwest bought the U.S. political magazine from a group led by editor-in-chief Martin Peretz for $7 million in 2007. Canwest recently sold off its stake in the Score sports channel and hopes to sell five TV stations to raise money.

World

Kidnapping Alleged

BUENOS AIRES — A former prosecutor of the 1994 terrorist bombing of Argentina's AMIA Jewish community centre said he was kidnapped and tortured. Claudio Lifschitz, whose accusations in front of the Argentine Congress about alleged irregularities in the probe eventually led to its collapse, said he was kidnapped March 7 in Buenos Aires. His captors cut and burned the word AMIA on his back and the case number on his arm, he said. On March 5, Lifschitz added a new accusation against an intelligence service official and other former government officials. Lifschitz said the kidnappers said they belonged to Argentina's intelligence agency. Eighty-five people were killed in the attack, allegedly with involvement by Hezbollah, backed by Iran.

Federation Cuts Staff

NEW YORK — America's largest Jewish federation became the latest major organization to downsize in the face of the recession. UJA-Federation of New York, which raised $153 million in its annual campaign last year, said March 11 that it's cutting 52 employees, or about 11 per cent of its staff. The layoffs, along with the elimination of 20 unfilled staff positions and other administrative cuts, will save the federation $7.4 million, it said. So far in 2009, the federation is 10 per cent behind in fundraising pledges and 12 per cent behind on collections. Its $675-million endowment is also 25 per cent smaller.

Iran not a 'black and white' issue, prof says

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

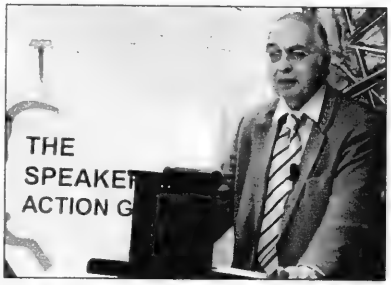
The western world needs to recognize that there's a deepening schism in Iran between its hardline, nuclear-power-obsessed, Islamist theocracy and a burgeoning, liberal, youthful civil society.

So says professor David Menashri, director of the Center for Iranian Studies at Tel Aviv University and one of the world's leading authorities on Iran.

In Toronto last week as part of a speaking tour, Menashri, an Iranian Jew, addressed about 100 people at a luncheon lecture organized by the Speakers Action Group and sponsored by Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association, at downtown law firm Fogler, Rubinoff LLP.

Asked whether Iranians understand the negative image that their country projects onto the world stage through President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Menashri said "yes."

"People look at Iran in black and white. It's neither. They have young student movements, a cinema industry, newspapers, Internet. The youth of Iran don't necessarily agree with the government," he told The CJN. "But the problem is both they and [opposition] politicians don't have the power to dictate policy. This is in the hands of the conservative, extremist clerics."



Israeli professor David Menashri, an expert on Iran, speaks to an audience in Toronto last week.

He added that civil society in Iran is making progress, but not fast enough to effect a change in government policy to deter it from its nuclear ambitions and steer it toward more moderate rule.

He said the world needs to be "woken up" to Iran and begin "critical" diplomacy and talks with the state as a preliminary move to isolating it on the world stage, and to help its civil society discover a unified voice so that change can start from within.

"The youth in Iran should be asking themselves if what they see today reflects the goals of their parents during the [Iranian] revolution," Menashri said, adding that moderate-leaning Iranians have, over the past century, "fought to gain two major things... social welfare and freedom. They have not yet achieved either."

But what the West sees of Iran through the "apocalyptical" rantings of Ahmadinejad and the tacit support for the president by Supreme Leader Ali Hoseini-Khameini doesn't reflect the true nature of the country, he said.

"What we see in Iran today... is the bringing into power an extremist [body] that was on the fringes when Ayatollah Khomeini came to power 30 years ago," he said. "There are many political factions in Iran, [and] Iranian youth are well-educated, active and unhappy with this regime."

Despite this, there's little the forces of moderation can do inside Iran, because while many academics, intellectuals and students speak out routinely against the government, these same individuals often end up jailed because the military won't hesitate to crack down on dissenters, he said.

"There's a constant struggle between Iranian intellectuals and the regime," he said, but he lamented the lack of a unified opposition leadership to "confront" Ahmadinejad and the ruling clerics.

Of rights and incongruities

From the editor's desk...

It is hard for many of us to reconcile the low station of the United Nations today with the very high and idealistic hopes that were the midwife of its birth.

In retrospect, it is clear that the birth of the organization and the broad multilateral agreement regarding its charter occurred in an anomalous moment of modern history – a window of time and hopeful purpose that was quickly tightly shuttered by the hands holding fast to ethnic hatreds, dogmatic ideologies and contentious superpowers.

The charter of the UN was signed on June 26, 1945. Article 1 sets out the four purposes of the organization:

"1. To maintain international peace and security…;

2. To develop friendly relations among nations… and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;

3. To achieve international co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character…; and

4. To be a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends."

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted by the General Assembly on Dec. 10, 1948. It was humanity's collective aspiration, if not its promise, too, that nations would never again tolerate the hideous barbarities and atrocities of World War II.

Even a small sampling of the sections in the preamble provide a sense of the loftiness of the declaration: "Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world…

"Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom…"

Seldom has a document shone so brightly into a dark world.

Seldom has a light been so quickly extinguished.

The important, life-affirming provisions of the charter and the declaration have been consistently trumped by the overarching imperatives of avarice, tribalism, intolerance, triumphalism, geopolitics, power politics and immovable ideologies.

In addition, and most determinant of all, we see clearly today, that the founding ethos of the UN is based on traditions and frameworks of values that spring primarily, though not exclusively, in the cumulative layerings through time of the universalist teachings of the West. These teachings do not generally reflect or mesh with the traditions or value systems from other cultures and societies on earth. In some cases, sadly, these teachings are mutually incongruous, even at odds with one another. For example, there is only minimal common ground, if even that, between theocratic Muslim society and liberal, secular, western society.

At the first session of the General Assembly in 1946, after the grotesque ruin of World War II, 51 member states participated. Six decades and three years later, some 192 states sit in the General Assembly, the majority from what we consider the developing or Third World. Twenty-two of the 192 states are Arab League members; 57 states belong to the Organization of the Islamic Conference.

Thus, in the high-ceilinged, marble- and wood-finished, palatial chamber of the General Assembly, Israel does not stand a chance.

As has been well chronicled by scholars and experts, the UN is the chief fountain spewing hateful, anti-Israel rhetoric. It is not an accident of scheduling that the "Durban II" conference is meeting in Geneva during Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah – a further demonstration of unwithering contempt for Jews and the Jewish state. Durban II is the followup to the 2001 UN World Conference Against Racism, which Arab countries and the Palestinians turned into a forum for an all-out assault on Israel.

Sometimes we dismiss the UN and its agencies as lacking any practical weight or significance. But this is a false notion. Throughout the many far-flung, impoverished, drought-stricken, starved, oppressed, medically underserved parts of the Third World, the imprimatur of the UN does carry weight even as its trucks bring food, medical supplies and humanitarian aid to the outstretched hands of weary needy populations.

Thus, rather than dismiss the UN, we must try to fight the corruption and the moral inversion as embodied in Durban II. And we must also remember that the fight is not that of Jews or Israel's alone. The government of Canada has proved that. So, too, has the American administration. Of late, the European Union has also inveighed against the transparent aims of the conference.

Last week, a day after Miguel d'Escoto Brockmann from Nicaragua, president of the General Assembly, criticized the United States on a trip to Iran where he met with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other top Iranian leaders, the Obama administration rebuked him for his strident, partisan criticism of the United States and Israel.

Alejandro Wolff, the second-highest ranking U.S. diplomat at the UN, said Brockmann "has repeatedly abused his position to pursue his personal agenda, and in doing so he diminishes the office and harms the General Assembly."

Brockmann has accused Israel of "crucifying our Palestinian brothers and sisters" and has labelled Israel an "apartheid state." He has also called for a boycott of the Jewish state. Such is the rostrum of the UN. Any calumny can be spoken there.

But all of them must be answered.

– MBD

Recession fails to hinder young entrepreneurs

'We Give Back' campaign aids community

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Canadian economy might be in a downward spiral, but two young Jewish businessmen are adamant about giving back to the community, and to do so, they're allocating a portion of their companies' profit to causes they hold dear.

Aaron Kaufman and Jared Golberg of 5th Element Events, a corporate event company, launched the "We Give Back" campaign last month to benefit Centre Camp, which operates out the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, and the Sunnybrook Foundation's Grant a Wish program for war veterans.

As of last month, the company has been putting aside two per cent of its profits from this year in a separate account. At the end of the year, Kaufman and Golberg will personally match the funds they raised and split the money between Centre Camp and the Sunnybrook Foundation.

Golberg, 5th Element's 30-year-old marketing manager, is a Centre Camp alumnus who spent 12 years building specialty programs for campers of all ages, and he said he doesn't want to stop now.

The camp, which provides specialty programs in dramatic arts and sports for more than 1,200 campers each year, has a scholarship fund to give less fortunate kids an opportunity to experience a summer at camp.

Aaron Kaufman

"When I was there, we created the scholarship fund to help children in need go to camp, so I wanted to give back to that scholarship fund," Golberg said.

Kaufman, 31, who owns 5th Element, chose to contribute to the Sunnybrook Foundation because he wanted to improve the quality of life of war veterans through the Grant a Wish program.

Jared Golberg

He also said he has a personal connection to the organization.

"Both of my wife's grandfathers are war veterans. One is still living. The Jewish chapel at Sunnybrook is called the Harvey Lister Chapel, and it was named in honour of my wife's grandfather," Kaufman said.

"This is the kind of place where people and veterans deserve to be given something back. People fought for a good portion of their lives for us."

Golberg added that both he and Kaufman wanted to make a point of giving back in spite of the economic situation.

"We thought of something we wanted to do in 2009 that focused on the community, and as most people can see with what's going on in the news, what's going on financially across the globe, we wanted to show that we're a company that gives back, even in a time of uncertainty."

Under the umbrella of the 5th Element Group, Kaufman launched another company called Vintage Entertainment, which provides entertainment for functions such as bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings.

"With Vintage, we will also be giving back by planting a tree in Israel for every family who books our service. We want to stay connected to Israel and its rich heritage by giving back as a company and in the name of our clients," he said.

Sanctions urged against anti-Israel group at York

University president chatted with suspended group, students say

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups at York University are urging the administration to enforce its own sanctions against an anti-Israel student group after York president Mamdouh Shoukri was spotted chatting with its members at a table it set up despite being suspended from campus.

According to a joint statement released last week by Hillel at York, Hasbara at York and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Students Against Israel Apartheid (SAIA) continues to operate openly on campus, despite a 30-day suspension it received earlier this month in connection with a Feb. 12 anti-Israel rally in the Vari Hall rotunda that disturbed classes.

Hillel and Hasbara were fined for taking part in a counter-rally the same day, and Hasbara was also given a 30-day suspension.

Kaley Ames, a York student and a pro-Israel activist on campus, said she saw York President Mamdouh Shoukri speaking with members of SAIA who had set up an information table and a mock "apartheid wall" on March 11.

Ames reported the incident to UJA Federation and signed an affidavit saying she witnessed Shoukri at the SAIA table.

"Shoukri is well aware that SAIA is tabling and they are violating their terms of suspension… [and he] didn't do anything about it," Ames told The CJN.

Ames said SAIA was tabling in a hallway linking Vari Hall with York's student centre.

She said that while she was campaigning for candidates in the upcoming York Federation of Students' election, she saw Shoukri speaking to YFS' current vice-president of equity, Krisna Saravanamuttu.

"I watched in horror as the president walked from Krisna to the SAIA table, engaging Hammam Farah, the person who was manning the SAIA table," Ames said.

"I could have gone up to the president and started questioning him, but I wanted to see what his motives were, why he was going up to the table… It was clear that he didn't go up to tell them 'I've put you on suspension.' He was smiling, he was nodding his head."

Ames said she couldn't say for sure what Shoukri was saying, but she was upset that the president didn't do anything about a group that was operating on campus despite having been suspended.

"Time and time again, York University administration issues press releases and statements and suspensions, and they fall back on their word," she said.

Hillel at York president Daniel Ferman said it's "outrageous for York University to issue a news release announcing disciplinary actions while refusing to take action itself against a suspended group operating contrary to the sanctions against it."

Hasbara at York president Aaron Rosenberg added that the incident with Shoukri and SAIA is just another example of the "smoke and mirrors tactics" the York administration uses to portray that "everything is under control when rules are arbitrarily, selectively and unfairly enforced."

In a statement to The CJN, Rob Tiffin, York's vice-president of students, said that "there are still students and an alumnus setting up a table in Vari Hall where they are promoting the views held by SAIA."

He added: "Members of SAIA are not permitted to book space on campus, with the exception of the separately incorporated and owned Student Centre. No space reservations have been approved for SAIA since the imposition of sanctions. Members of SAIA have not been present at the table in Vari Hall."

Tiffin said that Shoukri "frequently passes through Vari Hall and takes note of all activity as it is a major crossroads for the university. I also know that he is engaged frequently by students and others."

The silent conscience of the anti-Israel activist

Earlier this month the International Criminal Court in The Hague issued a warrant for the arrest of President Omar Hassan Ahmad al-Bashir of Sudan. He was indicted for crimes that the court says he committed against the people of Darfur, for war crimes and crimes against humanity. The press release issued by the court was quite to-the-point in explaining the reason for the indictment: "He [al-Bashir] is suspected of being criminally responsible, as an indirect (co-)perpetrator, for intentionally directing attacks against an important part of the civilian population of Darfur, Sudan, murdering, exterminating, raping, torturing and forcibly transferring large numbers of civilians, and pillaging their property."

It was the first warrant of arrest ever issued for a sitting head of state by the court. In response to the indictment, al-Bashir defiantly and disparagingly expelled 13 humanitarian aid organizations from Darfur.

As has been well documented by the United Nations itself, more than 300,000 people have been killed in the past five years in Darfur; uncounted thousands have been harmed and abused through every vile form of atrocity, and an estimated 2.5 million people have been forced from their homes.

Many observers doubt al-Bashir will ever be brought to justice. But they contend that the indictment is at least an unambiguous moral clarion has been sounded that the world is outraged by and abhors what has been done to the victims of Darfur. Moreover and especially, they add, the world abhors that what was done in Darfur was done deliberately, with prior planning and evil intention; hence, the indictment.

But wait. Not everyone has been outraged by "the murdering, exterminating, raping, torturing, forcibly transferring large numbers of civilians and pillaging."

The Arab League has never once condemned or expressed disapproval of the actions of the al-Bashir government.

Last week, in an act of inter-terrorist solidarity, Iran, Hamas and Syria sent top officials to Khartoum to denounce the warrant for Bashir's arrest. Iran's parliamentary speaker, Ali Larijani; Hamas' second-in-command in its Damascus political office, Moussa Abu Marzouk; Syria's parliamentary speaker, Mahmoud al-Abrash and various representatives of other Palestinian militant factions joined Sudanese dignitaries after prayers on Friday to shout their opprobrium at the West for deigning to consider "murdering, exterminating, raping, torturing," etcetera, worthy of indictment.

The irony is too painful, and the hypocrisy is too blatant to ignore: Israel defends itself against unceasing terrorism from the Iranian- and Syrian-backed regime of Hamas. Western activists pillory Israel for doing so. Yet these same activists cannot find the conscience, let alone the words, to rebuke, reprove or reprimand Iran, Syria or Hamas for standing alongside the criminally indicted tyrant in Sudan.

Secularist MK Shulamit Aloni slammed legislation proposed by Israel's religious affairs ministry that would settle the "Who is a Jew" question according to Orthodox rules. She claimed it would deepen tensions between religious and secular Israelis. The proposed law dealt with litigation about marriage, divorce, alimony, child custody and property rights.

York can learn a lesson from Concordia

Amid all the concern over the situation at York University, it's useful to consider an example of a university that did it right. It was September 2002 at Concordia University, and anti-Israel activists were preparing to prevent then-Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking.

Anti-Israel protesters were successful in silencing Netanyahu by smashing furniture, breaking windows, allegedly assaulting pro-Israel students and clashing with police. Realizing that they were unable to secure the lecture hall, police cancelled the event. In a report released months after the incident, Concordia admitted that it was "not adequately prepared for the events of that day."

Concordia strengthened and enforced its code of conduct. Several individuals were subject to disciplinary hearings, and some were suspended or expelled. Recognizing that most students just want to go to class without being accosted by ideologues, the administration sought to "take back" its space by centralizing space bookings and by upholding the space-booking rules. Concordia's principled stance has gone a long way toward calming tensions and encouraging respectful dialogue. Concordia learned a lesson that York administrators should examine today.

York's situation is considerably more challenging than the one at Concordia, as Jewish students are afraid to be Jewish on campus ("Students under 'siege' at York U," CJN, Feb. 19). But unlike Concordia, instead of strengthening its space-booking policies, York has consistently relaxed them. Instead of consistently prosecuting code of conduct violators, York has chosen to turn a blind eye to the problem until recently, when it imposed inequitable sanctions against Jewish groups for joining a counter-rally. Instead of empowering its security officers, York has chosen to limit their authority, making them incapable of enforcing whatever limited rules exist.

Community-at-large's somnolence

As the costs of Jewish education have been skyrocketing beyond the rate of inflation for years, imposing significant financial strain upon the non-wealthy segments of the community and creating numerous "economic refugees" from the Jewish day school system, the community-at-large stands by and watches. When a serious proposal to redress the long-standing inequities in educational funding was brought forth by a political party during the last election, and the government of the day waged war tooth and nail against the concept of faith-based education, the response of the Ontario Jewish community was tepid at best. Recently, we have read that the centralized governing body of Jewish education in Toronto has engaged in a major downsizing exercise ("Federation downsizes Mercaz, cuts 10 jobs," CJN, March 12), while several schools are having trouble meeting their rental obligations. There is no surer guarantee of the Jewish future than a Jewishly well-educated younger generation. Perhaps now, the community-at-large will arise from its somnolence.

Hamilton's Jewish Arab Muslim Dialogue

I must add my perspective to Lawrence Hart's view that the Hamilton Jewish Arab Muslim Dialogue "turned out to be no more than a cynical public relations exercise that has fomented distrust, divided our community and made a mockery of civil discourse" ("Hamilton dialogue collapses," CJN, March 5).

As a former Hamilton broadcaster, I frequently invited dialogue members to participate in my issues-oriented news talk program, and at the most sensitive of times. I certainly witnessed differences of opinion and philosophy, yet dialogue members invariably, openly and with care addressed the most challenging of Jewish, Muslim, Arab and greater Canadian community issues. My experience with the committee during the years it participated in my broadcasts was invariably positive.

The committee's outreach to the greater Hamilton community was not insignificant. A case in point: in 2006, it sponsored a successful public presentation of interfaith dialogue with UCLA professor Judea Pearl, father of slain journalist Daniel Pearl, and Akbar Ahmed, who teaches Islamic studies at American University.

Offended by term 'Shabbat Itanu'

As a parent of a child with challenges, I am truly offended by the term Shabbat Itanu in "Jewish Toronto gears up for Inclusive Action Week" and the accompanying advertisement (Jewish Toronto, by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, CJN, Feb. 5). By definition, itanu translates as "with us" and implies a division between us – the mainstream of the Jewish community – and them, people with special needs. This is exactly the attitude we, as parents, wish to change.

Perspectives

Truth and hope

By ARI SHAVIT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In all his election campaigns, Benjamin Netanyahu has told the truth. He was right three years after the 1993 Oslo accords when he argued that the accords had failed, and he was right in 1999 when he claimed Ehud Barak would divide Jerusalem.

Netanyahu was right in 2006 when he warned that the previous year's disengagement from Gaza would bring Katyusha rockets to Ashkelon, and he was right in 2009 when he claimed that both Israel's security and its economy were under threat. But two things were missing from all of Netanyahu's election campaigns: organization and vision.

Netanyahu always told his voters the truth, but never offered them hope and leadership. Morose pessimism and negligent conduct clouded his command.

This was also the case when Netanyahu was prime minister from June 1996 to July 1999. Contrary to popular belief, he scored quite a few successes during his three years in power. He repaired the economy, quashed inflation and advanced economic liberalism. He reduced terror, conducted negotiations with Syria and signed the Wye River accord that dealt with territorial concessions in the West Bank. During his tenure, war did not break out and fewer Palestinians were killed than during the terms of Ariel Sharon, Barak or Ehud Olmert.

But although Netanyahu acted responsibly and judiciously, he failed to provide the people with a clear vision and a worthy administration. Blundering conduct and a constant confrontational attitude marred his term as prime minister.

Leaders of stature know the nature of their world. Franklin Delano Roosevelt knew that the relevant world in his time was the Great Depression. Harry S. Truman knew that for him, it was the Cold War. Bill Clinton knew his relevant world was the economy, as does Barack Obama. In this sense, Netanyahu is the most promising of Israel's leaders. His macro perception is superb and he thoroughly understands political and economic processes.

Unlike his rivals, Netanyahu knows that the relevant world of today is one of radical Islam and economic crisis. Being both statesman and economist, Netanyahu has the qualifications needed to deal with this challenging world. But inferior micromanagement and the inability to give hope could thwart his efforts again and again if he becomes prime minister. Where there is no vision, the people cast off restraint, and without quality management, any government would be lost.

Benjamin Netanyahu campaigned as being "strong on security and strong on the economy."
[Israel Sun photo]

Netanyahu's starting point is difficult. The dependence on Yisrael Beiteinu, Shas and the National Union does not leave him much room to manoeuvre. And yet, even in the pressure cooker in which he must operate, Netanyahu could have done much more than he did. He should not have placed the rule of law in the hands of Yisrael Beiteinu leader Avigdor Lieberman and Minister of Justice Daniel Friedmann. He should not have abandoned Likud moderates Silvan Shalom and Dan Meridor. He should not have created a feeling that there is insufficient excellence at the top, and he should not have formed a right-wing government whose fate has already been set and which offers no new ideas.

It's not too late. Netanyahu can still demand of his partners to prove that their patriotism is expressed in deeds as well as in words. Even if a broad government cannot be formed, Netanyahu and Lieberman have the ability to put together a fine cabinet. For example: Uriel Reichman as education minister instead of Friedmann as justice minister; a finance minister from outside politics, chosen for his or her professional abilities. He could appoint national councils for economic, foreign and education affairs – and a government of brilliant, talented people rather than small-minded extremists.

Netanyahu was raised and educated in the United States. No American president would dare enter the Oval Office with the people surrounding Netanyahu. No American president would attempt to govern without a great concept, without the ability to manage and without a top-rate team.

Israel is not America, but Israel is no shtetl, either. Israel has a great deal of talent. Israel's human capital is its greatest hope. If Netanyahu wants to succeed, he must enlist this capital and harness it to true vision.

Only with governmental excellence and a clear vision does Netanyahu have a chance of realizing his leadership potential. If he cannot deal with his weaknesses, Netanyahu will not be up to the tremendous task facing him.

Israel must address flawed electoral system

By IZAK PARVIZ NAZARIAN
JTA

The predicament created by Israel's recent Knesset elections does not reveal any new problems in the country's electoral system; it simply underscores the problems everyone already knows are there.

The problems have created a dire situation. Clearly, the Israeli electoral system has failed again, and the underlying problems of why it happened need to be addressed immediately.

The new political map shows the immense difficulty of establishing a coalition government, especially one that will be able to lead the country through these challenging times. Even worse, the Knesset represents so many fragmented groups that it is extremely difficult to legislate effectively.

Politicians on the campaign trail often promise electoral reform, but those promises have gone unfulfilled.

If the current Knesset does not make government and electoral reform a top national priority, a shaky coalition will push Israelis into yet another election in less than two or three years, and again it will be impossible to establish a stable government.

Various solutions to Israel's problems of government instability have already been proposed.

In 2005, then-president Moshe Katsav's Commission for the Examination of the Structure of Governance in Israel was created to propose recommendations to remedy the problem. The commission, headed by Prof. Menachem Magidor of the Hebrew University, spent 15 months researching alternatives to Israel's current system.

In its final report, the commission recommended that regional elections be held to elect half of the Knesset's members. The idea is that if 50 per cent of Knesset members are elected in regional elections, there will be a stronger tie between representatives and voters, and the Knesset members will be directly accountable to their constituents.

Some Israeli officials have proposed transitioning to a presidential system. Politicians and scholars, however, are deterred by the risk of concentrating too much power in the hands of a single person.

Increasing the threshold necessary for Knesset representation to five per cent of the popular vote is a middle-of-the-road reform that would reduce the number of smaller parties in the Knesset and thus promote and strengthen bigger parties. Another worthwhile reform would be to create a perennial budget to eliminate the "circus of extortion" that plagues Israeli coalition negotiations.

During a meeting with the members of the Economic Forum for Government Stability of the Citizens' Empowerment Center in Israel, Kadima chair Tzipi Livni said she does not reject the transition to a presidential system. However, she cautioned that Israel would need to make sure the appropriate checks and balances were in place and that there would be the possibility of forcing the president to step down, in extreme situations, before the conclusion of his or her four-year term.

Whatever solutions are implemented, Israel needs to reform the electoral system and stabilize the government as soon as possible. The only way to do this is for the larger parties to agree to work together in creating new legislation to secure government stability.

Izak Parviz Nazarian is the founder of The Citizens' Empowerment Center in Israel.

Shul business isn't for rabbis

When liberal rabbis in Germany were expected to obtain a general education in addition to their Jewish studies, some Orthodox opponents would say that when rabbis became doctors, Judaism became sick. They feared that secular education would take precious time away from Torah study.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

They may have been quite unrealistic, but perhaps not entirely wrong. Nowadays, when rabbis (other than haredi ones) have a secular education, they're expected to spend a lot of time away from their Jewish studies. Thus, for example, if you call a rabbi only to be told that she or he can't come to the phone because she or he is engaged in the study of a particularly difficult Talmud passage, you're likely to be incensed at the lack of pastoral care. But if you're told that she or he is in a committee meeting, you'll feel reassured that the person is doing good work.

That's behind my reservations about a program in management education for rabbis and synagogue administrators that I recently read about in this paper. The purpose, as I understand it, is to better equip "clergy" to manage shul business.

Priests in their clergy roles are often expected to be responsible for the general management of their churches. Rabbis, on the other hand, are teachers. After mastering the Torah of balance sheets and fundraising techniques, will they still have the time and the inclination to study and teach Torah?

Of course, rabbis shouldn't be kept out of synagogue management. Yet I'm worried about the kind of Judaism that may emerge as a result of the ever-growing emphasis on the business aspect. I firmly believe that a rabbi's greatest contribution to Jewish life is to study and articulate Judaism, not dabble in management.

The pressure to learn about administration reflects the current trend to turn teachers into fundraisers. Every head of a university department will tell you about it. As things are now, many synagogues of all stripes – especially in the United States, but by no means only there – judge their spiritual leaders by their worldly achievements. Jews rarely brag about the erudition of their rabbis. They're more likely to tell you about how much money they've raised for the new building.

Major contributors usually expect special concessions. Will the management courses also teach how to minister to the rich? And what will this do to the other congregants?

In the current financial meltdown, synagogues, like other institutions, are in such dire straits that cutting corners to obtain funds is understandable, and at times perhaps even justified. Nevertheless, there's a lingering suspicion that when rabbis become fundraisers, Judaism goes bankrupt.

A poor display on Canadian campuses

Universities across Canada have never been particularly hospitable toward Israel, but they take it a step further with Israeli Apartheid Week, which took place earlier this month. The annual event has proven to be a frightful time for Jewish students, who find themselves faced with anti-Semitism on their campuses.

Justin Dahan in Ottawa

Although this week is widely known as being anti-Israel, it's hardly the only time that anti-Jewish and anti-Zionist ideas have been evident on campus. Perhaps one of the most prominent examples occurred on Feb. 11 at York University when pro-Palestinian protesters gathered in front of the York Hillel offices to voice their opinions against Israel (under the guise of protesting efforts to impeach the student council).

It got to a point where those inside were blocked from exiting the Hillel office, and the entire atrium was crowded with people chanting anti-Israel and anti-Jewish slogans, going so far as to call Israel a "Nazi state." Police were called to the scene, but no arrests were made. Fortunately, nobody was hurt, but Jewish students' security and safety on campus was certainly diminished.

Sadly, this is an obstacle that many Jewish students must face, and it leaves many of them frightened. Considering that Toronto has a large Jewish population, both living in the city and attending school from out of town, this means that a large percentage of students are uncomfortable on campus.

Campuses have gone from being relatively one-dimensional academic fora to being the backdrop of many political protests – a trend that dates back to at least the 1960s, to the widely publicized anti-war protests during the U.S. war in Vietnam. The danger with these latest protests is in how they affect Jewish students, and even deter them, by intimidation, from their studies, which, of course, is what universities are meant for.

At my school, the University of Ottawa, flyers depicting an Israeli helicopter gunship shooting at a Palestinian child labelled "Gaza" were displayed on campus to raise awareness for Israeli Apartheid Week. The school ultimately banned the poster from appearing on campus, but it could be found elsewhere nearby, and the damage had already been done by the time the posters were taken down. If this poster had been displayed off campus, such as at a place of employment, workers would be allowed to file a complaint that it was offensive and creates a poisoned work environment, and everyone is entitled to a safe working environment and place of study.

Freedom of speech is important and a part of every Canadian citizen's rights, but in the past, courts have set clear precedents in creating safe environments for work and study for everyone. Having this shamefully misleading poster appear at and around the University of Ottawa places the school under a dark cloud, overshadowing its many positive attributes and accentuating the negative ones.

Amidst the anti-Israel sentiment that echoed throughout Ottawa and Canada during Israeli Apartheid Week, there were a few glimmering lights of hope. Jewish groups on Ottawa campuses did their best to provide a safe haven for Jewish students and an alternative to constant Israel-bashing.

Chabad, in particular, has stepped up and provided a great environment for Jewish students. Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky, along with a plethora of youthful helpers, including Chabad student president Adam Berktin, have helped provide a place for Jewish students from out of town to gather on Shabbat for traditional prayers and food. Rabbi Boyarsky, and his wife, Yocheved, have also provided students with chances to gather and discuss theology, as well as life, in an open environment.

How did they react to the Israeli Apartheid Week protests on a campus that they're so familiar with? They just kept on spreading Jewish cheer by setting up a booth in the midst of the hostility to assist students with putting on tfillin and preparing for Purim festivities. They sent a strong message that we stand together as Jews and will not be intimidated.

What we can learn from the Israeli tennis team

The Israel-Sweden Davis Cup tennis match that took place March 8 was probably not the most watched of all time. The most anticipated match of the tournament was probably the one in which world No. 1 Rafael Nadal faced world No. 3 Novak Djokovic.

Joseph Juda in Toronto

The Israel-Sweden match didn't have the best players. In fact, its highest-ranked player was Dudi Sela, the world No. 63, who has yet to win an ATP title. And yet, despite this, Israel's victory was one of the greatest triumphs of the tournament and could teach all Jewish students a lesson.

Within the past few weeks, both Shahar Pe'er, the top-ranked Israeli woman, and the Israeli Davis Cup team have been singled out because they're from Israel. Peer wasn't allowed to play in a tournament in Dubai after the United Arab Emirates would not grant her a visa due to "safety concerns." A week later, the UAE only begrudgingly granted Israeli Andy Ram a visa to play after the ATP threatened to punish the tournament for Pe'er not having been granted a visa to enter the country.

Pe'er could only watch from Israel as her peers played in the lucrative Dubai tournament. Yet despite this, she maintained her dignity and only expressed her regret that the UAE mixed sports and politics and could not put differences aside for the sake of the sport.

Shortly thereafter, the Swedish city of Malmo announced that because of fears for the Israeli team's safety, fans would not be allowed to watch the Israel-Sweden Davis Cup match. Due to the heavy Muslim population in Malmo, the city council feared that there would be riots. On March 8, the Israeli team faced the Swedish team without any fans in the arena, while violent demonstrations took place outside.

Few people believe that Sweden could not actually guarantee the safety of the Israeli tennis players. The arena that the matches were played in, Baltic Hall, only holds 4,077 people, which is hardly a large audience for a major tennis event. Even if this ludicrous claim was true, the event could have been moved to a different area in Sweden with a smaller Muslim population. Instead, it's more likely that whoever was in charge of this event wanted Israel to look bad, with the streets full of demonstrators and an embarrassed Israeli team forced to play in an empty arena.

No doubt the Israeli team felt unwanted. It can't be comfortable to play in such an environment. And yet, in a thrilling five-set match, Harel Levy prevailed over Andreas Vinciguerra shortly after Dudi Sela beat Thomas Johansson, the former Australian Open champion.

The Israelis beat Sweden 3-2 and showed the world that they would not be scared by a violent crowd and allow themselves to be defeated, even if they were unwanted. What was meant to make the Israeli team look bad ended up being to Sweden's disadvantage, as they had no fans to cheer them on in the final few sets.

The Israeli team didn't allow the intimidation to make them feel uncomfortable. They were proud of their country and chose not to walk away.

March 1 to 8 was Israeli Apartheid Week on many university campuses. Jewish students everywhere undoubtedly felt uncomfortable. Many times they were intimidated for no other reason than the fact that they were Jewish. At York University a few weeks ago, students were forced to lock themselves in the Hillel offices as a crowd surrounded them and made them feel threatened and unwanted.

We should learn a lesson from Israel's tennis team. Keep your dignity and play the game, even if others want you to fail. In the end, the better group will prevail.

The Kirshner File

Iraq remains a work in progress

Shortly after American forces entered Baghdad in April 2003, following the U.S. invasion of Iraq on March 20, looters ransacked the National Museum, a repository of Iraqi archeological treasures, stealing many of its priceless antiquities. The pillaging of the National Museum was symbolic of the disorder and chaos that descended on Iraq in the wake of the attack, dubbed Operation Iraqi Freedom, the most important armed U.S. intervention in the Arab world since Lebanon in 1982.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Astonishingly, the then U.S. secretary of defence, Donald Rumsfeld, laughed off the thefts as a minor event. "Stuff happens," he said in a flippant comment that appeared to underscore his insensitivity.

The wholesale ransacking of the National Museum was a troubling sign that the United States had not properly prepared itself for post-war realities in Iraq, as well as a harbinger of further trouble.

In the ensuing months, U.S. casualties rose by leaps and bounds as a nationwide insurgency – supported and staffed by disaffected Baathists, Islamic fundamentalists and a sprinkling of common criminals – took hold. The uprising was at odds with a boastful claim, delivered by the then president of the United States, George W. Bush, in May of that fateful year, that major combat operations had ended.

As the rebellion evolved, deflating U.S. domestic backing for the increasingly costly conflict, Iraq was convulsed by an unstoppable wave of suicide and roadside bombings, assassinations and sectarian fighting, which pitted minority Sunnis against majority Shiites and brought Iraq ever closer to a full-blown civil war.

Iraq seemed like a hopeless basket case, prompting some Iraqis to pine for its deposed dictator, Saddam Hussein.

But last month's partial reopening of the National Museum, with its exquisite collection of ancient cuneiform tablets, stone reliefs, pottery and sculptures, was generally viewed as an indicator of tangibly better times in Iraq.

Six years to the week after the United States and its allies stormed into Iraq and made short work of Saddam's ruthless, totalitarian government, the resurrection of the National Museum was a small but telling example that Iraq's return to normalcy has begun in earnest. But just as countless looted pieces in the National Museum are still missing, so the process of stabilization and reconstruction still has a long way to go.

By general consent, the situation began to improve markedly after the Bush administration, the architect of the invasion, acknowledged that more troops were needed to provide security in Baghdad, the capital, and in Anbar province, the heartland of the insurgency. On Jan. 10, 2007, Bush announced the "surge," the deployment of more than 20,000 additional soldiers to Iraq, bringing the total to about 140,000.

Before ordering more troops to Iraq, Bush had been under the illusion that Iraq could be controlled and pacified by a far smaller force. Call it wishful thinking, if you will. This illusion was fostered by Rumsfeld, who wilfully ignored advice to the contrary by some of his generals.

Thinly stretched U.S. forces, augmented by troops from a coalition of countries, including Britain, Poland, Japan and South Korea, could not possibly deal with the mushrooming violence and sectarian killings.

Admitting failure, Bush adopted the surge, devised by the commanding general in Iraq, David Petraeus (who has since taken over the U.S. Central Command, which covers the Middle East, the Persian Gulf, the Horn of Africa and parts of Central Asia). Under the surge, U.S. and Iraqi troops have secured violent-prone neighbourhoods in Baghdad and dealt the insurgency in Anbar province a devastating blow.

The surge was opposed by some American politicians, who argued that the war was unwinnable and feared that it would divert resources from the war in Afghanistan and the war on terror.

Two years on, however, the surge seems to have worked, with the average number of attacks in Baghdad and Anbar province having fallen by a remarkable degree. Considering the fact that one-quarter of the American death toll in Iraq once occurred in Anbar province, this is a pivotal achievement.

Yet the new dynamic is attributable not only to an infusion of fresh U.S. troops. In Anbar province, where U.S. troops fought bitter and prolonged battles with rebels in Falluja and Ramadi, flattening neighbourhoods to forge hard-won victories, the back of the insurgency was also broken by the formation of armed groups known as Sunni Awakening Councils. Financed and trained by the Americans, the councils have since spread to other Sunni-populated areas of Iraq.

Incredibly enough, most of its 100,000 strong membership is made up of former insurgents. Along with local tribal chiefs, they switched sides to show their disgust with the Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia movement, which alienated locals by sowing sectarian differences and trying to impose a radical brand of Islam on the people. Commanded by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi until his death in 2006, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia is still a force to be reckoned with, but according to Petraeus, it has been significantly degraded in counter-insurgency operations.

Alongside the surge, the United States has gradually ceded operational control of the war to Iraqi forces in 11 out of Iraq's 18 provinces, a development that is in line with Washington's desire to withdraw the bulk of its army from Iraq. The Americans have also brought a measure of democracy to Iraq through the medium of a constitution and local, provincial and national elections. No one, least of all Petraeus and his successor, Gen. Raymond Odierno, believes that the gains of the surge are guaranteed to endure. Prior to stepping down, Petraeus warned that the gains ratcheted up so far are "tenuous" and "reversible," and that "serious challenges" loom ahead.

U.S. President Barack Obama [Carrie Devorah photo]

The first challenge, as outlined by U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates, is daunting: "How do we preserve the gains that have already been achieved, and expand upon them, even as the number of U.S. forces are shrinking?"

Barack Obama, the new American president who promised to end the war, announced recently that U.S. combat troops will be pulled out by August 2010, leaving a residual force of 35,000 to 50,000 to hunt down insurgents, train Iraqi soldiers and guard U.S. institutions.

Obama's timetable is in sync with a U.S.-Iraqi security agreement, signed last November, that requires American combat forces to withdraw from Iraqi cities by June 30, 2009 and from the country by the close of 2011, unless the United States and Iraq negotiate a separate pact to extend the U.S. presence. (Foreign troops have more or less left, leaving Britain with the largest non-American contingent).

Apart from the burning issue of troop levels, the primary challenges confronting the United States and its main Iraqi partner, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, run the gamut from security to economics.

The insurgency continues to rage in two provinces, Nineveh and Diyala, though the rest of Iraq is fairly calm. The anti-American Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, remains popular and influential. Basic services, from electricity to running water, have yet to be restored to pre-2003 levels. Falling oil prices are postponing urgent reconstruction projects and exacerbating an unemployment problem.

Four million Iraqis are still displaced from their homes, and tensions are brewing between the Kurdish autonomous government and the central government. Iran may yet reap immense benefits from Saddam's overthrow. And if Iraq cosies up to Iran, this would hardly be to Israel's strategic advantage.

Clearly, Iraq is a work in progress, its future far from settled. But the United States has no intention of making a precipitous and irresponsible withdrawal from Iraq, realizing that Iraqi forces are not yet capable of securing the nation from its enemies.

2008: Another Great Year at Romspen

Many investors now regret that they took on more risk than they realized by overweighting their portfolios with stock market investments. They are now waiting for these investments to recover. But is this really the best solution?

For a risk-averse investment strategy consider the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, a leading Canadian non-bank commercial mortgage lender. Since inception and including 2008, investors in the RMIF have earned about 10% per annum. That's not just a paper gain – it's cash paid to investors each and every month. Court dismisses war crimes case appeal

David Matas

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The case to strip suspected war criminal Wasyl Odynsky of his Canadian citizenship and facilitate his deportation continued this past Monday after a court rejected his efforts to stop Jewish groups from continuing proceedings against him.

Odynsky is suspected of war crimes while serving Nazi Germany as a Ukrainian guard stationed at the Trawniki and Poniatowa labour camps. The former was a training centre for Ukrainian guards who were enlisted as auxiliaries to SS killing units, according to the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

The case to strip him of his Canadian citizenship was pursued in appellate court by B'nai Brith Canada last April after it was initially dropped by the Canadian government in 2007 due to a lack of evidence.

Last Thursday, the Federal Court of Appeal dismissed Odynsky's argument to halt the challenges by Jewish human rights groups to his effort to remain in Canada. The court determined he lied about his past upon entering the country in 1949.

The ruling allowed David Matas, B'nai Brith's senior counsel, to "argue the merits of this case" in Toronto this past Monday, Matas said in a B'nai Brith statement last week.

"The government has demonstrated a clear inconsistency in its application of the law with regards to Nazi-era cases," Matas said. "In the case of Wasyl Odynsky, court rulings have clearly demonstrated that he lied upon his wartime past when entering the country."

In earlier testimony, Odynsky denied all allegations of war crimes against him. He stated he was forcibly posted to the labour camps under duress and was merely a perimeter guard at the camps, never having direct contact with any prisoners.

"We are pleased to have the opportunity... to argue the merits of this case before a Federal Court in the hope that the path will be cleared for revocation of [Odynsky's] citizenship and his subsequent and immediate deportation from Canada," Matas said.

Though it hasn't participated in the case to this point, Canadian Jewish Congress is "looking into" engaging in it as it goes forward, Congress CEO Bernie Farber told The CJN last Friday.

"We're certainly gratified that this case has not come to an end," Farber said.

"Our position has always been that anyone who was involved as a Nazi enabler, and Mr. Odynsky, in our view fits that description... every effort should be made to deport him from Canada."

Congress backs renewal of anti-terrorism provisions

Compiled by CJN Staff

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has commended Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Justice Minister Rob Nicholson for introducing Bill C-19, legislation that restores two elements of the Anti-Terrorism Act (ATA) that lapsed two years ago, and for retaining safeguards to protect against the potential adverse impact of these measures.

The first, recognizance with conditions, would renew preventive police powers, under certain conditions, to arrest a suspect when a terrorist act is perceived to be imminent. The second, investigative hearings, would compel someone believed to have knowledge of terrorist activities to testify at closed-door judicial hearings.

Police would have to show a judge that every other option available had been used first, and witnesses compelled to testify can hire a lawyer.

"As a community that is particularly sensitive to the threat of terrorism, we support the approach of the Anti-Terrorism Act because it set its primary sights on prevention of terrorist acts," CJC co-president Sylvain Abitbol said. "A look around the world clearly tells us that terrorist acts remain a clear and present danger. Our security and police personnel must have sufficient authority to take preventive action to interdict possible attacks before they occur. Our anti-terrorism régime is stronger with the re-introduction of these two elements plus the additional safeguards."

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

CJC co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka added, "These measures provide a stern test to a democratic society, which must tread the delicate path of providing for the safety of its citizens while minimally curtailing their liberties. Governments such as ours must thwart the efforts of those who would use our open society against us and then shut it down, but such actions themselves must always be rooted in, and comport with, the rule of law.

"Properly framed and implemented counter-terrorism legislation enhances civil liberties and core Charter of Rights values and protects our way of life from the threat of terrorism."

These two measures were not used after their initial passage, and Congress CEO Bernie Farber said that this "suggests that the dire predictions of mass human rights abuses flowing from such extraordinary authority were overstated, not that these powers are unnecessary in the fight against terrorism."

Canadian Society for Yad Vashem gets new chair

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Fran Sonshine, newly elected national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, says this position is a natural for her.

As she and her husband, Ed, are both children of Holocaust survivors,"the story has always been in our homes. It permeates the way we look at life," she said.

The organization was founded 20 years ago, in order to implement the vision of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust remembrance and education centre in Jerusalem, through events, programs and fundraising activities across Canada.

Succeeding founding chair Hank Rosenbaum, Sonshine said her mission is to strengthen the profile of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, and widen its outreach.

Among her other community activities, Sonshine, a former elementary school teacher, was the 2009 annual campaign co-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto with Henry Wolfond, and is the immediate past chair of the board of Baycrest.

She has been also been involved with other organizations, including State of Israel Bonds and Aish Hatorah; and as well as being a past chair of the Toronto Hadassah-WIZO bazaar, she has led missions to Israel and travelled across Canada as a leadership trainer for that organization.

She and her husband established one of the first legacy funds for the Toronto Jewish Foundation, and were honoured by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem in 2003. They have also been recipients of the International spirit of Jerusalem Award given by State of Israel Bonds, Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner honorees, and last year, were one of five couples honoured by Baycrest at its Tribute Gala.

Fran Sonshine

Sonshine, mother of three and grandmother of six, said she is grateful for the opportunity to "[take] my connection with Yad Vashem to a new level. Last year, I had the privilege [of visiting] Yad Vashem in Jerusalem to experience first-hand various events and programs on the dynamic campus. I look forward to working with Canadians across the country to further Holocaust remembrance and education."

Especially now, she said, "we have a big job to do. There is still a lot of Holocaust denial, and it's becoming more acceptable. It's infuriating, and it's more important than ever before to work with people and remind them that it sure can happen again. We have to stand up and talk."

Among her plans, she said, is to bring to Canada Echoes and Reflections, a multimedia curriculum on the Holocaust developed by Yad Vashem, the Anti-Defamation League and the USC Shoah Foundation Institute for Visual History and Education.

"It has been a success in the United States, and I would like to roll it out here. There are schools here that teach the Holocaust, but this is an actual lesson plan."

She would also like to develop a followup program for educators who have travelled to Yad Vashem to learn how to teach the Holocaust.

"Yad Vashem is the No. 1 organization in the world for Holocaust education and commemoration, and we need to follow up experiences. We could set up conferences and provide continuing education."

In addition to the annual Yom Hashoah program at Earl Bales Park, which the Canadian Society organizes with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – the largest in the world after the one in Jerusalem – it has a joint venture with the government of Ontario in which it brings honorees to Queen's Park who have rebuilt their lives after the Holocaust and have contributed to the community.

It also has archives, a library and artifacts, Sonshine said. "We are the go-to people, and we have it all at our fingertips."

Tale of Mideast Jews can ease campus tension: prof

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Israeli peace activist Ada Aharoni said that informing people about the uprooting of Jews from Arab countries decades ago can be used as a tool to help ease tensions on campuses between Jewish and pro-Palestinian students.

Aharoni, an Israeli professor, poet, author of 27 books and the founder of the International Forum for the Literature and Culture of Peace (IFLAC), was in Toronto last week to take part in the inaugural Canadian Academic Friends of Israel conference.

Ada Aharoni

The March 8-9 conference, titled Emerging Trends in Anti-Semitism and Campus Discourse, was held at the University of Toronto and chaired by Ed Morgan, a U of T law professor.

The event, which featured speakers such as Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, was attended by some 120 professors, students and Jewish leaders.

Some of the issues explored included anti-Jewishness that may be disguised as anti-Zionism, as well as emerging narratives that affect campus communities and academic freedom, and the Zionist ideology itself.

Aharoni has taught at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology and the University of Haifa and founded IFLAC in 1999 to spread the culture of peace and build bridges between nations. She spoke at the conference about the uprooting of Jews from Arab countries and shared her story about being a Jewish refugee from Egypt.

"I presented it as a tool for students to be able to empower them, so when they hear that Palestinians were thrown out [of Israel], they'll know there were two migrations, not only one, in the mid-20th century," Aharoni said.

She said that in 1948, about 650,000 Palestinians fled Israel, while about 900,000 Jews from neighbouring Arab countries either fled or were thrown out of their homes and forced to leave all their possessions behind.

"I spoke about ethnic cleansing, because the Palestinians keep telling you about there was an ethnic cleansing of Palestinians from Israel, and it's not true. There was an ethnic cleansing of Jews in the Middle East. So few are left in those Arab countries," Aharoni said.

"Out of the 100,000 Jews in 1948, only 40 Jews are left in all of Egypt."

She urged the students at the conference to share this information with their peers, because, based on a case study she conducted when she was teaching at Penn State University, this information can help change the minds of people who have anti-Israel views.

She said she was teaching a class made up of North American, Israeli, Arab and Palestinian students, and she assigned a research paper that had to contain only objective facts and statistics about the fate of Jews from Arab countries.

"My goal was to find out if their opinions [about the Arab-Israeli conflict] would be changed," Aharoni said.

"By the last lesson, Palestinian students stood up and said… 'We checked all your statistics, and you know what, you're right… How come you Jews, who are supposed to be wise and intelligent, have kept all these facts in your drawers for more than 60 years?'" she recalled.

"I was so pleased, because my students understood what all the governments of Israel have never understood – that this [information] is really a tool."

She said her Palestinian students said this information made them feel like they weren't the only underdogs.

Aharoni said they told her that, "'Until now, we've been told the Nazis killed six million Jews and that's why you came and took our country. This has nothing to do with us – go to Germany. But when you come and tell us that half the citizens of Israel are Jews from Arab countries, that is a different story – we are responsible for what happened.'

"In Islamic philosophy, to be able to have peace, real peace, the side that has done wrong has to pay something concrete, and [the Palestinian students said] 'You have already paid when you were robbed of all your property in the Arab countries.'"

Aharoni recalled reading a poem she wrote titled The Second Exodus at a lecture she gave at the Penn State Hillel with both Jewish and Palestinian students in attendance.

The poem was about her father, who died of a heart attack after he found out that all his property, money and assets – even money he had set aside in a Swiss bank – had been confiscated by the Egyptian government.

"Two Palestinian students wearing keffiyot had tears in their eyes, and one of them said, 'That is exactly what happened to my father.' Suddenly we were on the same side. We were not enemies anymore. We were refugees who had suffered from the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Aharoni said that there is a lot of Jewish history that people are simply unaware of, and becoming informed can help nations better understand each other and help the peace process along.

"Until now, we have been doing hasbara to the Americans, the Canadians, to the French, but not to the Arabs, and they are the ones who should listen to us. It's not with you that we want to make peace. We want to make peace with them," she said.

"Changing someone's attitude from hatred to understanding and harmony and co-operation is something that is happening all the time. But to be able to speak about it, you have to know."

An Evening to Remember Frances and Morris Bitterman

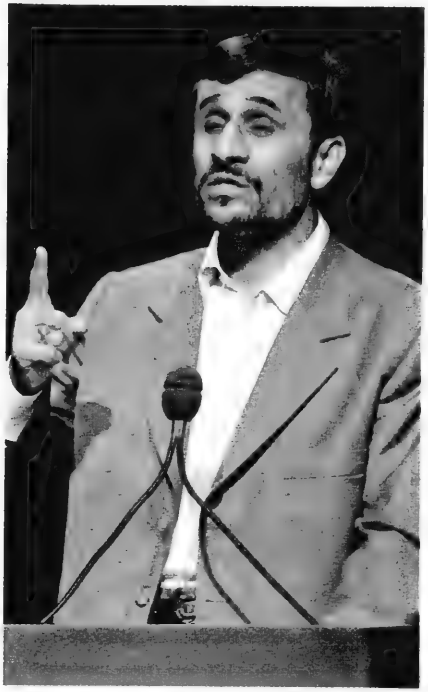
Monday, April 27, 8:00 p.m.

Morris (Moishe) Bitterman was the only member of his extended family to survive the Shoah. He left for Palestine on the famed refugee ship, The Exodus, and served as an Israeli soldier along side those who were committed to founding the new State of Israel.

He immigrated to Canada in 1952 and became our Ritual Director from 1976-1995 where as part of his duties he prepared countless B'nai Mitzvah candidates.

Frances Bitterman was a pillar of support for Moishe, a volunteer in the shul and a kind soul.

Everyone is invited on Monday April 27th to commemorate the lives of two exemplary Jews who were an integral part of the Beth Tikvah Community and to hear their compelling stories.



Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Iran not just Israel's problem

To illustrate the "perfect description" of the Iranian paradox, Menashri repeated a saying that one of his colleagues in Tehran taught him that states Iranians "have freedom of expression, they just don't have freedom after expression."

Still, Menashri insists that dialogue between the United States and Iran could be a major step toward reigning in Iran's hegemonic ambitions in the Middle East.

Professor welcomes dialogue with U.S.

If America successfully enters talks with Tehran, he said, Iran will be perceived as negotiating with "the Great Satan," something that will sow doubt in all of its proxies.

He said that U.S. President [Barack] Obama is opting "for dialogue, which I don't have anything against. While it may not lead us anywhere, I think it's good. It at least sends a clear message to the Iranian and American people that the U.S. sincerely looked for a way to deal with Iran peacefully."

Such a gesture may make it easier to create a "unified, world opinion" and take "action" against Iran going forward, Menashri said.

"The most important thing is to send a message to the youth of Iran," he said, because at this stage, the country is "very sensitive" to pressure as civil society grows more powerful and gains more influence.

Though he remains optimistic about dealing with Iran peacefully, Menashri said he recognizes that time "is not in our favour," and he would have liked to see dialogue established long ago.

"You need to convince Russia, China [to side against Iran]. And who's going to do it?" he asked. "In my view, people in Iran, ultimately, will not be good for this."

A belligerent Iran, Menashri said, is not something that should be handled by Israel alone.

Menashri suggested that Iran's rulers still have no pragmatic reason to accept the Jewish state.

"Ideologically, the Iranian regime doesn't view Judaism as a nationality," he said. "Raising the [issue] of Israel is very important to any Islamist leader… to unify the emotions of those [supporters] around them… and retain power. Ahmadinejad used Israel as the ticket to his leadership."

Menashri said he belongs to the Israeli camp that doesn't consider Iran an existential threat to his country, but he conceded it's a "great challenge" to hold that position.

Of all the solutions being proposed to the problem of Iran, the one he doesn't advocate is unilateral Israeli action.

"In a general sense, the problem of Iran's nuclear program is not Israel's alone. I think Israel should speak less about it, because this [perpetuates the idea] that it is Israel's problem alone," Menashri said.

"Today, Arab countries' number one problem is not Israel, it's Iran. There's tension between the moderate Arab world and Iran. I'm hopeful that Saudi Arabia, Jordan… will react to the emerging power in Shiite Iran."

Exodus Experience a multi-sensory tour of Pesach story

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Don't let the concrete, factory-like structure fool you. Or the setting – Downsview Park, in the wilds of what used to be the Downsview Air Force Base.

Once inside the building, you encounter The Exodus Experience, a multi-sensory tour of the story of Pesach. Under the auspices of Tzivos HaShem, the youth arm of the worldwide Lubavitch movement, the program has been shown around the world, from Sydney, Australia, to Los Angeles, South Africa, Montreal (eight years ago) and many places in the United States.

Rabbi Yonah Vilenkin, who has headed Toronto's Tzivos HaShem since 2003, said that participants go through in groups, rather than individually, and he recommended that people reserve ahead.

The second part of The Exodus Experience is Chabad's popular annual model matzah bakery.

Last week, students from the Zareinu Educational Centre, a school that provides special education and individualized therapies for children who have physical and developmental challenges, and a group of seniors took The Exodus Experience tour. They enjoyed the impressive sound effects, the sight of a Jewish slave bemoaning his sorry state in front of the pyramids, the dramatic lights flashing, the plague of frogs – including ones coming down from the ceiling – and pharaoh's advisers going through the lists of Egyptian gods to the ABC song from Sesame Street.

Going from room to room, you walk through sand, straw and stones. As we passed through the divided Red Sea, we saw goldfish swimming through walls of water. The shrill blast of a shofar punctuated the giving of the Torah.

Scene from the Exodus Experience

The smiles, giggles and laughs of the audience during the tour showed everyone had a good time.

The entire program, including the tour and the matzah factory, takes about two hours. It runs from March 12 to 31. The cost is $12, and group discounts are offered.

For show times or reservations, call Rabbi Vilenkin at 416-661-0650.

A letter to the German chancellor

By H. DAVID KIRK

I am writing to you as a German Jew, born in 1918 and abroad since 1934. You have reawakened images of my childhood in Germany and memories of my forward-looking and brave mother.

Guest Voice

Much like you, who are able to see the current renewal of anti-Semitism as a threat to Jews, my mother early on recognized the ever-darkening future in the Germany of 1933. Like my mother, who began preparing my brothers and me for a life abroad, you know how to adapt to difficult circumstances. Thus, when you received Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's letter with its hateful threats against Israel, you refused to respond.

Today, Israel's very existence is threatened by Iran's nearly perfected weapons of mass destruction, and by its president's virulent threats to wipe Israel off the map. With these threats growing ever stronger and closer, one is bound to ask: what is to be done? Surprisingly, my work in the sociology of adoptive kinship, in spite of its very different theme, gives a clue: catastrophic events can sometimes be transformed into opportunities. In that context, I propose a new kind of non-financial wiedergutmachung (compensation), the essence of which is found in the title of my book, Shared Fate.

If Germany were to acknowledge the threat that it, like other western nations, faces from militant Islam, it could recognize a "shared fate" situation with embattled Israel. Thus, if Germans understood that their country would be no safer than other western nations if Iran had nuclear weapons, they might want to declare themselves in support of Israel – by diplomacy if possible, by force if necessary.

In the era of persecution and genocide, none of the democracies dared to step forward to protect Jews. Even today, such a step would require great courage and conviction and call for the kind of leadership that you, Chancellor Merkel, have already exhibited. In that new role, Germany would usher in a new and world-shaking relationship between itself and the Jewish people.

קנדה שכדאי לראות

אני מוצא שישראלים רבים מקיימים את סיסמת הערוץ הישראלי בטלויזיה: "לחיות כאן-להרגיש שם", ומחוברים יומיומית לתכניות המשודרות בישראל, החל מחדשות הבוקר ועד ללונדון וקירשנבאום בלילה. אין בזה כמובן כל רע, וזה מראה את המובן מאליו: יכול אדם לצאת מישראל, אך אין הוא יכול להוציא את ישראל מתוכו. קשה בגיל מבוגר להתרגל להומור חדש, בשפה זרה, לתרבות דיבור ונושאים חדשים. ישראלים מדברים בהרבה להט על התמוטטותה של מפלגת העבודה, אבל לא מצאתי עדיין ישראלי שיתווכח בלהט על התמוטטותה של המפלגה הליבראלית הקנדית.

ובכל זאת-אם החלטתם לחיות במקום חדש-כדאי לנסות להבין את דופק התרבות המקומית, מעבר לדילים במרכזי המכירות, שהפכו למוזיאונים המודרניים. "מה קנית וכמה זה עלה" הוא הנושא השכיח של פגישות ישראלים בגלות טורונטו.

השבוע ראינו שני סרטים קנדיים חדשים שמביאים את קנדה בצורה מאוד משכנעת ונוגעת ללב. לטעמי אלה הם סרטי חובה למי שמנסה להבין את נשמתה של הארץ החדשה שלו.

The Necessities of Life הוא סיפורו של אסקימואי מאזור הקוטב הצפוני שמועבר לקוויבק סיטי בשנת 1952 לטיפול במחלת השחפת שאובחנה אצלו. בבית החולים דובר הצרפתית אין אפילו נפש אחת שמדברת בשפת האינואיט והוא מנסה לברוח ומסרב טיפול. ממש על סף המות מציל אותו ילד אסקימואי חולה שחפת שמדבר גם צרפתית.

זהו סרט מדהים על תקשורת בלי מלים, על הדיעות הקדומות נגד ילידים, ועל הרבה אהבה וחמלה.

עשר בסולם קורן

הסרט One Week הוא סיפורו של צעיר קנדי תושב טורונטו שזוהה אצלו סרטן סופני והוא יוצא למסע מדהים לרוחבה של קנדה. פגישותיו האקראיות עם אנשים פשוטים לאורך הדרך, בנגד הלחץ של ארוסתו ומשפחתו לשוב העירה כדי לנסות להציל את חייו-יוצרים מתח קולנועי נהדר ומרהיב. עוד עשר בסולם קורן.

תושיית האם היהודיה

מוטי הזמין את אימו לארוחת ערב בדירת הסטודנטים שלו. במהלך הערב התרשמה האם שהיחסים בין מוטי לבין אחת השותפות לדירה, טליה, חורגת מיחסי חברות רגילים. מוטי שראה את מבטי אמו, אמר לה: "אמא, אני יודע מה את חושבת, אבל תאמיני לי, טליה ואני סך הכל חברים טובים".

שבוע אחרי הביקור אמרה טליה למוטי: "מאוד מוזר, מאז שאמך היתה כאן-חסרה לי המצקת של המרק. האם סביר שהיא לקחה את זה בטעות?"

מוטי חשב שזה מאוד לא הגיוני, אבל החליט לבדוק. הוא שלח לאמו מייל ושאל:

"אמא, אני לא אומר שלקחת את המצקת של המרק, אבל מאז שהיית כאן-היא חסרה."

כעבור יומיים ענתה לו אמו:

"אני לא אומרת שאתה ישן בלילות עם טליה, אבל אם היא היתה ישנה בחדר שלה, היא היתה מוצאת את המצקת מתחת לסדין".

אבל שישאר בינינו.

דור לדור יביע אומר

תודה לפנינה על הקטע החכם הבא.

סטודנט צעיר, קולני ושחצן נכנס לשיחה עם איש זקן על שפת הים. הוא ניסה להסביר לזקן שהדור של הישישים גדל בלי טלויזיה, לויינים, אינטרנט וכל השאר, ועל כן אין זה פלא שגישתם לעולם כל כך פרימיטיבית.

אחרי שתיקה ארוכה ענה לו הזקן:

"אתה צודק, בני, לנו לא היו כל הדברים האלה ולכן נאלצנו להמציא אותם. מה אתה, שחצן קטן שלי, עושה כדי להשאיר משהו משמעותי לדור הבא?....."

Boys turn 'a regular day' into musical fundraiser

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Five Grade 12 students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto have taken a play that four of them wrote as a Grade 11 drama project and expanded it into an 80-minute musical about teenagers dealing with issues including romance and drugs. They will present it as a fundraiser March 23 and 24.

The five 17-year-olds, who coalesced into a group of best friends almost two years ago, are "extremely – I repeat extremely – talented students," Josh Sable, director of student activities at the school's Wallenberg campus, wrote to The CJN in an e-mail.

Ryan Peters, Jeremy Chad, Ben Deverett and Noam Tomaschoff wrote the original 40-minute play, for which they received a mark of 100 per cent.

Their friend Russell Citron, who enjoys writing and public speaking, didn't take drama last year, but "naturally, we wanted him to be part of it," said Chad in a joint interview with four of the five last week at the Wilmington Avenue school.

Tomaschoff – who has studied at Toronto's Randolph Academy for the Performing Arts and taken part in a summer program at the Lee Strasberg Institute of New York University, where he has been accepted to study acting next year – was home sick.

The play, titled Just a Regular Day, includes 13 original songs, and features the five boys as well as four female students. Most of the cast members also appeared in the school's annual musical, said Chad, who is student council president and plans to study engineering at university next year.

A CD of the music will be sold at the show.

Peters, who plays piano and has acted in community theatre, wrote the music, and the lyrics were a collaborative effort.

Deverett – whose main academic interest is science, but who enjoys acting and singing and has appeared on the children's television show Ricky's Room – used a software application to make the music sound as if it were being played by a live band.

"I like catchy music," said Peters, citing show tunes and the works of Elton John and Billy Joel.

The boys credited their Grade 11 drama teacher, Brad Mittelman, for encouraging them to go ahead with the project, although it didn't fit the parameters of the "anthology" he had assigned them. "I think some stricter teachers would have said no," Peters said.

The play is "totally slice of life," Deverett said. The students denied, however, that it reflected their real-life experiences.

"In our [real] lives it's us huddled around a piano," Citron said.

The play is infused with more drama than their own lives: Tomaschoff plays a "confused adolescent" who is interested in a girl, but she has changed over the summer and become "cool." When he tries to approach her at a party, everything backfires, Deverett explained.

Everything begins on "just a regular day," Chad said.

Without revealing the plot twists – and there are several – the play's lesson is, "Be yourself," Deverett said.

Tickets are $12 in advance, $18 at the door. The show will be held at the Crescent School Theatre, 2365 Bayview Ave.

The students plan to donate the profits to the performing and visual arts fund at TanenbaumCHAT, as well as to JACS, the organization that deals with suffering caused by drugs and alcohol in Toronto's Jewish community.

For tickets to the show or for more information, call Wendy Peters at 416-315-1118, or e-mail wendypeters@rogers.com.

JEWISH EDUCATION SERVICES QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Recently, UJA Federation announced important changes in the delivery of educational services, affecting the Mercaz and financial support for Jewish education. Since the announcement, many community members have sent us their questions and concerns.
Here are responses to those inquiries.

Q. What are the changes?
A. UJA Federation will be streamlining the Mercaz, our education department, and, at the same time, increasing financial support for Jewish education by:
- Adding $500,000 to tuition subsidies over the next year and a half
- Setting aside a substantial sum of money for education projects
- Maintaining and, hopefully, increasing financial support for supplementary schools and special education.

Q. What will happen to the Mercaz?
A. The Mercaz will still exist, with a smaller staff, but, for the most part, it will be not be delivering programs in the traditional way. In partnership with our schools, it will be serving as a catalyst for program delivery by other means, cutting down on overhead and enhancing quality. Our goal is strengthening the capacity of our excellent schools to offer programs and services themselves. The community can be rest assured that priority programs and services will be maintained and delivered with the same superior quality.

Q. Will the schools be expected to pay for programs and services currently provided by the Mercaz?
A. We are setting aside a large pool of funds to pay for worthy projects that UJA Federation and the schools agree to undertake.

Q. How will these changes affect school tuitions?
A. We understand the financial burden of school tuitions. That's why we are increasing tuition subsidies by $500,000 to more than $8 million, in addition to an extra $2 million from the Julia & Henry Koschitzky Fund for schools that provide tuition subsidies. Our new approach will offer a stronger forum for discussing with the schools creative solutions to the tuition challenge. It is a complex issue because, even with tuitions as they are, our Jewish schools are under severe financial pressure.

Q. Are these changes related to the current recession?
A. No. These changes would have taken place regardless of economic conditions. In fact, discussions about the role of the Mercaz have been ongoing long before the economic downturn. Contrary to rumours, this new direction is not the result of a Mercaz funding shortfall or any other similar considerations. It is motivated by the benefits of redistributing the administrative costs of a large, centralized education department to increased direct support for children, parents and schools.

Q. When will we know more details about the new Mercaz and how these changes will be implemented?
A. Over the next few weeks, UJA Federation professional and lay leaders will be meeting with Mercaz personnel, school officials and others who are most affected by our new approach. Additional details should be available within a couple of months.

We welcome your questions and suggestions. Please e-mail info@ujafed.org.

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

Published as a community service by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

One COOL Day warms hearts

By Alana Getzler

More than 100 members of UJA Federation's Impact Toronto division came together recently with one common goal – helping others.

Impact Toronto caters to the "hands on" social and philanthropic needs of Jewish Toronto's 25 – 40 year olds

The occasion for the mitzvah-making was Impact Toronto's semi-annual One COOL Day initiative - chaired by Richard Goldhar - which sees volunteers roll up their sleeves and volunteer at a number of community organizations including several UJA Federation partner agencies, that help Toronto's vulnerable. The experience also teaches participants about the GTA's wealth of organizations that assist others.

Participants had the choice of many such organizations on Sunday, March 1, including Reena, JIAS (Jewish Immigrant Aid Services) Toronto and Zareinu Educational Centre.

"The clients certainly enjoyed their time with the volunteers, and they were a great help to myself and my staff as they helped with a carnival for clients of the agency," said Michelle Anbar, program coordinator for outreach and respite services at Reena. "We all had fun and played BINGO with the members,"

explained Jennifer Brodlieb, the One COOL Day volunteer project coordinator at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. "Positive feedback has been offered from not only the volunteers and the agencies, but the beneficiaries of the volunteer day as well."

After hours of volunteering, the day culminated in a "Food and Shmooze", at The House. Opening its doors about 3 years ago on Toronto's Eglinton Avenue, The House has quickly grown into one of the city's most popular and relaxing interactive places to explore Judaism as it pertains to the 21st century.

Over pizza, participants had a chance to interact with one another, share their stories of the day and engage with Rabbi Rafi Lipner, The House's Director, in a discussion about random acts of kindness.

"One COOL Day was a tremendous success this year," explained Steven Ekstein, chair, Hands on Toronto (HOT), a program of Impact Toronto. "This event gave young Jewish adults an opportunity to help those in need and gave them great exposure to the organizations supported by their donations. The hope is that the introduction to these agencies has whetted the appetites of those interested in helping out, and has offered them the chance to learn about how they can further their commitment to the community."

For more information about Impact Toronto programming please contact Alana Getzler at agetzler@ujafed.org, or 416-635-2883 ext. 5120.

Conservative group seeks larger role in movement's future

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — The leadership of the Conservative movement's synagogue arm has acceded to a request for an "urgent" meeting from a new coalition of clergy and lay people to discuss new strategic directions for the organization.

The meeting was scheduled to take place this week in New York.

"I look forward to working with this group," Ray Goldstein, the president of the United Synagogue for Conservative Judaism, told JTA. "I'm really excited about having their passion and willingness to work to strengthen the United Synagogue, and through the United Synagogue, the Conservative movement."

The proposed meeting was triggered by a letter sent to Goldstein by a group that includes officials of some of the movement's largest and most vibrant congregations. Among them are Rabbi Philip Scheim of Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation is also a signatory, although his synagogue – formerly the largest affiliated Conservative congregation in North America, with 2,650 member families – broke ties with United Synagogue last year.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl stressed that he is participating in the new group as an individual.

"I care about the future of the Conservative movement, and the dissatisfaction of my congregation with United Synagogue is part of that larger issue," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

"We feel that the larger institutions of the Conservative movement are in need of 're-engineering,'" he added. "This has been in development for a long time. It's not a reflection of the economy. The economic situation may make it more urgent."

Among the issues he sees as most pressing are delivery of services at the congregational level, and the way that the United Synagogue "projects a vision of Conservative Judaism that is vigorous and that engages people."

Rabbi Philip Scheim

Rabbi Scheim also said that congregations want practical support, but at the same time, the goal is for the group to work with United Synagogue leadership to articulate and promote "a compelling vision that will captivate the Jewish world."

Rabbi Scheim said the new group is the first of its kind in bringing together 25 of "the most powerful congregations in the movement."

He said he was optimistic about the prospect of working together with United Synagogue leaders.

The letter asserted that only fundamental change in the United Synagogue would enable its future success.

"We don't believe that it can happen if 'business as usual' reigns, with merely a change in the identity of the leadership," the letter stated.

The Conservative movement, once the United States' largest synagogue denomination but since overtaken by the Reform movement, has been anguishing over its future for years. But a major leadership overhaul – at present, the three major arms either have recently installed new leaders or are preparing to – has sparked hope that the movement's fortunes are primed for a turnaround.

About 50 rabbis, cantors and synagogue lay leaders, brought together under the banner of Hayom: Coalition for the Transformation of Conservative Judaism, signed the letter to the United Synagogue.

The group, which also includes well-known pulpit rabbis such as David Wolpe of Los Angeles and Gordon Tucker of New York, was formed last summer in reaction to Goldstein's decision to keep the selection of a new United Synagogue executive strictly an internal process.

Rabbi Steven Wernick was tapped last week to lead the Conservative movement's synagogue association. Wernick, spiritual leader at Adath Israel in suburban Philadelphia, will succeed Rabbi Jerome Epstein as executive vice-president of the United Synagogue for Conservative Judaism. In 2007, Arnold Eisen assumed the chancellorship of the Jewish Theological Seminary, and Rabbi Julie Schonfeld will become the chief executive of the Rabbinical Assembly this summer.

United Synagogue 'marches to its own drummer'

As opposed to JTS, which invited representatives of the movement's other organizations to sit on the search committee that picked Eisen, the United Synagogue kept the process closed. The committee charged with finding the United Synagogue's new chief executive did not even include a pulpit rabbi.

"Needless to say, that didn't sit well with us," said Rabbi Michael Siegel, spiritual leader of a large Chicago congregation and the Hayom chair. "We decided to begin a process to find a more direct way to speak with the leadership of the United Synagogue and to begin a process of developing a long-range plan."

Siegel said there is a "general dissatisfaction" in the movement regarding the services that communities receive from the United Synagogue. The organization, he said, suffers from a gap of creative strategic thinking. Hayom's objective, he added, is to create "an outside agitating force" to press for change.

"The United Synagogue is far less inclusive than the other" arms of the movement, said one Conservative rabbi who signed the Hayom letter. "The United Synagogue deserves the attacks, honestly. They have failed in a major way to meet the major needs of Conservative Jews."

In fact, the United Synagogue did initiate a strategic planning process that yielded a 2004 report by the management consultant Jacob Ukeles. Among Ukeles' recommendations was that the United Synagogue bring representatives from the major congregations to its board.

"It's very much an organization that marches to its own drummer," Ukeles said of the United Synagogue. "It tends to be very insular, very self-contained."

Goldstein, who has been accused of shelving the Ukeles proposals or acting on them too slowly, rejected the criticism, noting that the organization's bylaws require that the board include representatives from the other arms of the movement, as well as regional delegates that represent current or recent synagogue presidents.

"Some of them actually attend our meetings and participate," Goldstein said. "Some do not."

As to the search for a new executive, Goldstein conceded that keeping the process closed may have been an error, but said he had sought informal input from the movement's other arms, including from Eisen.

"I never received a call," he said.

MATZAH PRODUCTION IN HIGH GEAR: Matzah and Passover biscuits are produced here in one of the largest matzah bakeries in Israel. With three weeks to go before Passover, Pesach food production is in high gear. In Israel, the most popular size of matzah is the 2.5-kilogram family pack. Twenty-nine million dollars' worth of matzah will be sold in Israel for Passover. [Isranet photo]

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Echoes of the expulsion in Havana

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Old Havana is a glorious place that's frozen in time. Even after many decades of unfortunate decay, the exquisite beauty of its buildings, plazas and boulevards, and the intricacies and detail in façade after façade, bear silent testimony to a grand era of elegance and finesse that could justly place it alongside other capitals, such as Prague and Vienna.

Through A Sephardi Window

There are precious few Jews in all of Cuba – perhaps less than 1,000, I'm told. The sight of a very visibly Jewish Jew walking these streets must have been as incongruous to the Cubans as the sight of all that family laundry hung out to dry over so many exquisite Rococo balconies was to me.

No matter. One soon discovers that, by and large, Cubans are by nature blessed with an upbeat and respectful disposition. My presence, once noticed, resulted in the temporary halting of conversation, then silent stares followed by continued and hushed commentary, explaining amongst themselves the particulars of the subject matter – me, a visible Jew.

I am quite certain that others like me have had similar experiences. What was dissimilar, however, is that I am quite fluent in Spanish – actually, it's my mother tongue. The sight of a Jew is one thing, but a Jew that smiles back while saying "Ola que tal!" – "Hi! How are you?" – is something else altogether. Language, especially when correctly pronounced and nuanced, is a very powerful connector.

But this is not at all my point. What I wish to retell is something that occurred to me no less than three times in as many days of my stay in Havana. After smiles and pleasantries were exchanged, I was informed by native Cubans on three different occasions that they, too, are Jews!

Well, they're Jews, but not really Jews. In each of these instances (with two women, one man), they went on to share that they were direct descendants of Jews of Spain forced either into expulsion or into quasi-Catholic observance – a fascinating fact that somehow was transmitted for 500 years.

One often hears comments that the fallout from the atrocities of the Holocaust has in no way concluded, but that the catastrophic damage tragically continues, and continues to manifest itself in survivors today and into the foreseeable future in so many heartbreaking ways.

I couldn't help but similarly sigh upon hearing these declarations that descendants of Conversos carry around for generations past and future – morsels of information, whether factual or otherwise.

Groups must change or face extinction

By JONATHAN MIRVIS

Guest Voice

The recent economic meltdown has created havoc among non-profit organizations that are totally dependent on philanthropic dollars. Many organizations have developed a business model entirely dependent on philanthropy, and these organizations stand to suffer most if the economy continues its downward slide.

In times when finances were abundant, this model was successful particularly among Jewish organizations, enabling them to provide social services to the community that many could not afford. Now that resources are limited, how can these organizations survive?

Three key strategies seem to come to the fore.

The first is to focus on large pools of small donors who support the endeavours of the organization. They may be past beneficiaries or their families who appreciate the social value the organization is generating.

Jonathan Mirvis

A second is to focus on earned income. It's critical that these organizations examine their inventory of services and affix fees for services or products where possible.

A third is seeking government contracts that are awarded to organizations that provide social services to the general public. While the financial support from this source may be considerable, in this article we will limit ourselves to discussing the ramifications of the first two strategies.

In suggesting the two strategies, we are assuming that the average citizen in the new economy will continue to seek products or services of value, will be willing to pay for them, and support their development and dissemination, if requested. While choices may be far more discriminatory than in the past, people ultimately will continue to make purchases and contribute financially to those organizations they value.

The common denominator of these approaches is that for organizations to survive, they will have to be relevant and meaningful to those they serve and be able to compete in the marketplace. This will require a radical shift in thinking by the leaders of the organizations.

In the former world, there could be a clear distinction between those who were being served and those who were the prime sources of income. In some situations, this reached extreme proportions, where organizations were dependent on one family or a number of families who dictated the priorities of the organization, even though this may not have been in the best interests of their constituency.

Since it was far easier to raise large amounts from single donors than it was to raise small amounts from multiple donors, the multiple small donors often have been ignored in favour of the larger. This has led to a systemic danger whereby policy may be dictated by the powerful few who are not necessarily in touch with the market needs.

In the new economy, the economic future of these organizations may be dependent on their constituency. Thus, these are the first questions that must be asked: who is our constituency and what do they value?

If these organizations fail to be relevant to their constituency and meet its needs, they may find themselves bereft of support, leading to their ultimate extinction.

Thus the new economy may well lead to a healthy democratization of organizations, leading to a new relationship between the organization and those being served. The constituency will see itself not only as beneficiaries but as "owners," and the organization's leaders will be far more answerable to this constituency, preventing it from making unilateral decisions that may not be in their interests.

It is the "small change" that will drive this big change, ensuring that we emerge from this economic crisis stronger than ever. – JTA

Students volunteer in impoverished community

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

I recently led a group of students from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto to the small mountain community of Franklin, W. Va., where we spent a week volunteering with Habitat for Humanity.

Working alongside some of the poorest of an impoverished community, we helped renovate trailers and homes for those living in substandard housing. The trip to the community of Franklin, where 20 per cent of homes are without running water or electricity, proved to be an eye-opening experience for our students, exposing them to the harsh realities of poverty faced by too many in our world.

My team worked on renovating a trailer. Seeing the temporary nature of the structure and the cramped and dingy quarters was an education in itself for us.

Our main task was to remodel the trailer to meet the standards of the Americans with Disabilities Act as, in the coming months, the elderly owner would lose the use of his legs to diabetes. Along with lessons on how to tear down walls, remove and replace flooring, install a toilet, and use a hammer, saw and drill, we learned about the triple threat of poverty, malnutrition and inaccessible health care.

The lessons of the trip extend far beyond the volunteer work. Our first task upon arriving in Franklin was to kasher the kitchen and then to unpack the endless boxes of pots, pans and dishes we had brought with us. Through careful planning, we had determined what food we would need to bring with us, and with the help of the supermarket manager who had scoured the store looking for the kosher symbols we had faxed him, what we could buy locally. For many students, these lessons in keeping a kosher kitchen were first-time experiences.

It was also the first time that many students were responsible for cooking and serving their own meals and cleaning up. While cooking for 40 is certainly different than preparing the average family meal, every student took his or her turn in the kitchen, chopping vegetables, scrambling eggs and cleaning dishes. One parent sent me an e-mail after the trip, telling me that her daughter, after realizing how much work goes into cooking, has started to help prepare dinner at home.

Even before our large, red coach bus thundered into town, declaring our presence, many of the locals knew about the group of Jews from Canada who were coming to volunteer.

A few weeks before we left Toronto, I received a call from Pastor Craig Richter. He told me that many of his parishioners had never met a Jew, and he was hoping that we might find a way to connect our communities. On Thursday afternoons during Lent, the community comes together for a luncheon and so, during our week in Franklin, our students catered a kosher lunch for the local churches and we shared the meal and stories of their lives.

While we were preparing for the trip, many people asked me why we had to travel to West Virginia when issues of homelessness are so prevalent in our own community. It is true that there is much work to be done here at home, and I hope that the trip will serve as a catalyst for our students to engage in more volunteer work.

Often, however, it is the group experience that is the pivotal piece of education. We could teach about Israel without a trip to Israel, about keeping kosher without a kitchen, or about Shabbat during the week. Living these experiences, however, adds a dimension of learning that cannot be articulated in the sterile setting of a classroom.

On that subject, writer and activist Jane Jacobs once said, "That is why we have cooking classes and cooking demonstrations, as well as cookbooks. That is why we have apprenticeships, internships, student tours and on-the-job training, as well as manuals and textbooks."

I could teach about volunteerism, tikkun olam and chesed in Toronto, but travelling to West Virginia brought the experience alive, gave it a context and a sense of purpose.

The blessing of the sun, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We continue to look at Birkat HaChamah, the blessing of the sun, to be recited on April 8 and once again, after a 28-year wait, in the year 2037.

The actual blessing for Birkat HaChamah is brief: "Blessed are You, Lord our God, King of the universe, who re-enacts the works of creation." However, a longer ceremony with readings from Psalms, Genesis, Jeremiah and other traditional sources has been formulated.

Several sites have prepared the text for downloading – some with commentary. The Kehillaton site has done a great job at creating a six-page document with Hebrew alongside English translation. [tinyurl.com/chamah12] Yeshiva.org.il has prepared two versions: one for Jews of Ashkenazi and Sephardi origin [tinyurl.com/chamah15] and another for Edot Hamizrach, including Jews from Iraq. [tinyurl.com/chamah17] As well, you can download a comprehensive 95-page booklet, a compilation of original-source documents from the Shulchan Aruch, the Talmud and elsewhere. [tinyurl.com/chamah13]

Massekhet HaChamah was prepared on behalf of the Conservative movement's Commission on Social Justice and Public Policy. The 68-page document is a collection of halachic and aggadic texts dealing with the sun. Since this year's Birkat HaChamah coincides with Passover's Fast of the First-Born, the brochure also includes a block of text which, when studied, releases first-borns from the obligation to fast. [tinyurl.com/chamah14]

There are also some good online classes that take advantage of audio and video to highlight relevant sections from Mishneh Brurah [tinyurl.com/chamah 31] and the Rambam. [tinyurl.com/chamah 25]

Most of these sites point out that the Birkat HaChamah ceremony concludes with the familiar Aleinu prayer that describes how idolatry should be removed from the earth. [tinyurl.com/chamah18] As many sites point out, Birkat HaChamah must not be considered sun worship. "The blessing is addressed to God, the creator of the sun – and all else. Jewish tradition absolutely forbids worshipping or praying to any entity other than the one God – and numerous times the Bible singles out the sun as one of those entities we may not worship!" [tinyurl.com/chamah22]

The last time Birkat HaChamah was observed was on April 8, 1981. It seems that a group of early birds rose for a spectacular view of the rising sun (and New York City) as they congregated atop the Empire State Building at 5 a.m. The invitation to the event has been preserved online. [tinyurl.com/chamah30] A JTA report quotes an account of the event from the New York Times. [tinyurl.com/chamah29]

If anything, this year's event will be getting even more attention as many people emphasize the importance of caring for and respecting the environment. Rabbi Arthur Waskow points out that on Shabbat HaGadol, prior to Birkat HaChamah, we will be reading from the Prophet Malachi, "who 2,500 years ago spoke forth a vision of the future, at once ominous and hopeful." Ominous, when the prophet foretells: "That day is at hand, burning like an oven." In Rabbi Waskow's interpretation, this alludes to a "global climate crisis – the overheating, scorching, burning, of the earth." And hopeful, when we read that a "sun of justice shall arise, with healing in its rays," or according to Rabbi Waskow, "a healing from the use of solar energy and the other sustainable sources of renewable energy." [tinyurl.com/chamah26]

If you are planning to spend Passover in the holy city of Safed, you will also have the opportunity to participate in the Birkat HaChamah Festival. The week-long celebrations kick off with an April 8 sunrise ceremony at 6:17 a.m. at the Citadel of Safed. Over the course of the next week, there will be poetry readings, workshops and displays of alternative solar ovens. The site also has directions for related crafts such as building a Jewish Star Sundial [tinyurl.com/chamah28] and a Solar Ner Tamid, Eternal Flame. [tinyurl.com/chamah27]

One particularly intriguing festival project is the series of mirrors that have been installed along mountaintop ridges in Israel. As the sun rises, this will initiate a series of solar reflections "ultimately uniting Safed and Jerusalem – two sister cities in their holy expression and existence." [tinyurl.com/chamah 11]

Fitness maven writes her first book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jennifer Cohen, a personal fitness trainer, dedicates her first book, No Gym Required (Key Porter), to the average woman who looks in a mirror and recoils in horror at what she sees.

"It's disturbing to me that women are so unhappy with their bodies," she said in an interview. "They should try to maximize their assets. My aim is to inspire women to be the best they can be."

And in a direct nod to her book, she said that women can be fit, healthy and self-assured without going to a gym or hiring a trainer.

Cohen, who commutes between Toronto and Los Angeles, urges women to adopt a back-to-the-basics approach that bucks quick-fix Hollywood solutions.

As she writes:

"I am writing this book for you, the woman who has marvelled at the miraculous transformation of celebrities who go from flab to fab, the ones who lose 30 pounds in 10 days and claim to have done it through a balanced diet and exercise, and is crushed that she is unable to achieve similar results."

Cohen 33, believes that women should set realistic goals through a vigorous and consistent training regimen and good eating habits.

"The key to consistency is adjusting your mindset and making small, simple changes," she explained.

"Diet is the foundation of any healthy fitness program," added Cohen, who has worked with movie stars, studio executives and recording artists. "It's 70 per cent of the battle."

When it comes to meal planning, she urges readers to concentrate on natural and organic foods.

As she put it, "Processed foods and those with preservatives are laden with hidden sugars and fats. Even meats and so-called natural produce like fruits and vegetables are filled with antibiotics and pesticides, which are proven toxins. Your body's food-processing mechanism is just not designed to handle them."

And she distinguishes between "good" fats (avocados, most nuts and olive, peanut and canola oils) and "bad" fats (meat, poultry, seafood, eggs and some dairy products).

"Control what you're eating," said Cohen, recommending home-cooked meals as important in reducing the intake of calories.

Apart from diet, Cohen recommends good sleeping habits, daily morning push-ups and a catalogue of exercises.

She recommends a list of pop hits designed to pump you up, from Get into the Groove by Madonna to Rhythm Nation by Janet Jackson.

Motivation is also pivotal.

"People find excuses not to work out and eat right. They have no time. They feel overwhelmed. They don't know where to start. But it's easy to eliminate the excuse factor."

Cohen, who is five feet six inches tall and weighs 129 pounds, exercises about 30 minutes a day and hikes once a week when she is not spending time with her clients.

She is the fitness director of the Yorkville clubs in Toronto. In Los Angeles, she leads exercise classes on Santa Monica's beach and is working on a line of "wellness" sneakers she has developed.

Jennifer Cohen working out

Keenly ambitious, she hopes to build her small company into a fitness empire. "One hundred per cent. I've always been entrepreneurial," she said.

Born in Winnipeg, Cohen has a BA degree in psychology from the University of Manitoba and an MA in sports marketing from George Brown College in Toronto.

Always a devotee of exercise, she worked at a succession of jobs before settling on a career in fitness.

Cohen's late father, Michael, was an electrical contractor. Her Israeli-born mother, Essia, is a psychiatric nurse.

Fresh out of school, Cohen joined the marketing department of the Toronto Raptors basketball team, after which she was an account manager for a record company in the city.

She settled in Los Angeles 10 years ago, and in her first job there as a talent agent's assistant, she lasted a mere 11 days. "I hated it."

Tired of the entertainment industry, she went back to what she knows best — fitness — becoming a personal trainer.

Now, with No Gym Required, Cohen hopes to impart her wealth of knowledge and experience to all those women out there who aspire to improve themselves through diet and physical fitness.

Carleton project to film Shoah survivors, students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

With the number of living Holocaust survivors dwindling each year, Carleton University's Jewish studies centre is working on a project to capture survivors' stories on film so that they can educate students for decades to come.

The Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies at Carleton, with financial help from the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, is trying to build on the work that survivors themselves have been doing to educate younger generations about the Holocaust.

Andrea Segal, the Holocaust film project's co-ordinator, said that what makes this program unique from other educational Holocaust video programs is that while the films will provide survivors' testimonies, they will also focus on the interaction between survivors and students.

"The impetus is having the Holocaust survivors speak, but it is equally focused on the students and their reactions," Segal said.

She said the vision of the Zelikovitz Centre is to film survivors who have been invited to tell their stories at schools, as well as the students and teachers who listen, question, and respond emotionally to what they've learned.

Beyond that, Segal said the goal is to use the footage – filmed by Gemini-nominated director Francine Zuckerman – as part of academic modules. She hopes to produce at least a dozen volumes that focus on different topics, such as children in hiding or the Auschwitz death camp.

She added that the initiative could take about five years to complete, but the first priority is to raise the funds needed to get all the filming done.

Once the filming is complete, the next step is to work on developing the academic programming that will complement the footage.

"One-third of the Carleton faculty in Jewish studies is focused on Holocaust studies. Carleton is providing that expertise," Segal said, adding that written educational material will go hand in hand with the films to give students an in-depth look at the Holocaust.

"The filming aspect can go ahead without the academic part, because the survivors are getting older and we don't know how much longer they're going to be able to do this."

The centre has already produced a 20-minute promotional video that features two Holocaust survivors – David Shentow and Anna Czajeznecky – speaking to high school students, as well as interviews with students who were moved by the testimonies they heard.

Segal said she hopes to reach out to Holocaust survivors across the country who share their survival stories with younger generations.

"As you can imagine, it is very difficult for the survivors to go and speak and share their stories, because it literally brings them back to that time, but they feel personally that it is very important so that it doesn't happen again, not only to Jewish people but to others as well," Segal said.

Israel Bonds office reopens in Winnipeg

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After leaving his position with Israel Bonds here just before Rosh Hashanah last year, Ariel Karabelnicoff returned to his post at the beginning of February.

During the time Karabelnicoff was away, the Israel bonds office in Winnipeg was closed and all dealings went through the main office in Toronto.

"Purchases of bonds still took place, and no long-term damage was done with the closure of the office, but it's best for everyone if the office here is open for business," Karabelnicoff said in an interview.

Ariel Karabelnicoff

He said he left to work at Oreck Canada, a retail-distribution company, where he managed its call centre, but came back because he missed his old job.

"What can I say? I like working for the State of Israel and I am very happy to be back," he said. "I feel that the work I am doing is meaningful, and my heart is in this job. I will try to make a difference."

Since he has been back, Karabelnicoff, who was born in Argentina and lived in Modi'in in Israel before coming to Winnipeg, said that sales have been "very solid."

"It's important that we have a functioning office in Winnipeg, especially at this very critical time, economically and politically for Israel," he added.

"Look, in New York, people who have been laid off from Wall Street are applying to get a job selling Israel Bonds. If I were in New York, do you know how many people would want my job?" he said.

Even after multiple wars and everything else it has been through, Israel has never once defaulted on paying back its bonds, the personable Karabelnicoff said.

He noted that more than one million Israelis are now within range of Grad missiles that have been launched from Gaza.

"Because of this, the government of Israel will spend hundreds of millions of dollars building missile-resistant structures like kindergartens, schools, synagogues, hospitals, bus stations and other vital infrastructure in the south of Israel to protect the population and try to allow people to live as normally as possible."

Money from Israel Bonds purchases will be used to invest in infrastructure in southern Israel, Karabelnicoff said.

Meals on Wheels program faces deficit

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish community's kosher Meals on Wheels program is facing a deficit as it struggles to keep up with a 50 per cent increase in demand over the past year.

"The program is in financial trouble," said Marilyn Regiec, executive director of the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre, which prepares the meals and arranges delivery five days a week.

"We are projecting a $25,000 deficit for the program come our April year end."

Regiec said the problem stems from rising food costs and increased demand. The number of meals going out now works out to 12,000 a year, compared to 8,000 just a few months ago.

"Each meal – consisting of soup, bread, an entrée and dessert – costs us $10.50 to prepare," Regiec said. Until recently, the centre had been charging recipients $6.20 for each meal.

"We just raised the price by $1," she said, noting that in Montreal the rate is $7.50, while the Vancouver and Ottawa Jewish communities charge in the $9 to $10 range.

Avery Spigelman loads kosher meals at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre for delivery.
[Myron Love photo]

She noted that the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg contributes $2 toward the cost of each meal, but only up to a limit of 8,000 meals a year.

"This is supposed to be a community program, not just a Gwen Secter program," Regiec added. "We are operating the program because the community requested us to run it."

She said that she and two of her Gwen Secter board members met on Jan. 21 with federation president Jonathan Kroft and David Kroft, chair of the federation's allocations committee.

"They came here and we showed them our facility and what we do," Regiec said.

"We gave them facts and figures. It was enlightening to them. They weren't aware of what we do here, what the kosher Meals on Wheels program was about and how we do it."

Commenting on the situation, Jonathan Kroft said: "We are very proud of the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre and the work they do. The kosher Meals on Wheels program meets an important need in our community. We understand the need for increased support. We are working hard with the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre to find a way to sustain this service for all the people who benefit from it.

"In these times, delivery of services can be particularly challenging. We are confident that we will find a way to deal with this issue."

Faye Rosenberg Cohen, the federation's director of planning, added that "everyone agrees that the kosher Meals on Wheels program is a key component in reducing the isolation for Jewish seniors. We all want to see it thrive."

Rosenberg Cohen said the jump in demand seems to have coincided with the closing of the Omnitsky Fine Foods, Winnipeg's last kosher butcher shop, about a year ago.

"I think the increase in demand has come because a lot of people who want to keep kosher either can't cook on their own or can't afford to buy kosher meat," Regiec said. "They appreciate that we offer fresh, homemade meals. Also, more people are choosing to stay in their homes rather than move to nursing homes."

The program could also use more volunteer drivers to deliver meals, said Shirley Murray, manager of volunteer services for Meals on Wheels Winnipeg Inc. Currently, there are nine drivers serving north end clients and another nine delivering in the south end. Murray said the program could use another 10 volunteer drivers.

"The kosher Meals on Wheels program is a very important component of Jewish life in Winnipeg," Regiec said. "Its loss would be devastating to the elderly and incapacitated members of our community. For some of our clients, this is one of their few life lines to our Jewish way of life."

Montreal federation travels to Paris for new CEO

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After being without a top professional for almost a year, and following an international search for a replacement, Federation CJA in Montreal has chosen Paris-based Argentine native Andres Spokoiny as its new executive director.

Spokoiny, who has been working with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) for 12 years mainly in the Baltic states and Poland, will assume the Montreal post in June.

Andres Spokoiny

He replaces Danyael Cantor, who resigned in April 2008 as the federation's executive vice-president after 11 years to become executive director of the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, a federation agency. Senior federation staff and lay administrators have been filling in since he left.

Federation president Marc Gold believes Spokoiny fits the federation's needs "to a T," despite his lack of direct experience in Canadian Jewish affairs.

In addition to his global knowledge of Jewish communal life today and experience in rebuilding Jewish communities from the ashes of Communism, the federation was attracted to Spokoiny for a number of other reasons. He is fluent in English and French, as well as Hebrew, Yiddish, Spanish and Portuguese; he's youngish at "about 40", and he has a background in both Jewish learning (he attended a rabbinical seminary) and in business (he holds an MBA) and worked for IBM for nine years.

His Argentine nationality and time living abroad are also assets, Gold said, as the federation continues to try to integrate newcomers from the former Soviet bloc, Latin America and France into the community.

Spokoiny and his wife, Erica, have two small children. This is another positive attribute, Gold said, because the federation is trying to reach out more to young families.

"In our search, we set our sights high," said Gold. "We were looking for someone who was strategic and decisive, a leader and a driver of change as we confront the challenges of today and beyond…

"Although he has been based in Paris, he is very familiar with the challenges facing North American federations with whom he has worked closely on various projects with the JDC."

Gold described the search for a new top professional as an "exhaustive process" in which hundreds of potential candidates were considered. The headhunter Egon Zehnder International in Montreal and the Mandel Centre for Leadership Excellence at United Jewish Communities in New York were consulted.

The 95-year-old JDC is the largest Jewish American non-governmental organization, supporting Jewish communities in need around the world. Since the fall of Communism, it has played a major role in the revival of Jewish communities that were cut off from the Jewish world for decades.

Spokoiny was also concurrently the director of Leatid Europe, an institute training Jewish lay and professional leaders throughout Europe.

After taking up his duties in Montreal, he is expected to continue his association with the JDC International Centre for Community Development at Oxford University.

Prior to joining the JDC, Spokoiny worked at IBM, where he was responsible for training and development, including recruitment in the southern region of Latin America.

"I'm honoured and humbled by this responsibility," Spokoiny said in a statement. "Montreal is a great and unique community that, in many aspects, can and will be a 'model community' in North America and beyond. I'm looking forward to this personal and professional challenge."

Spokoiny, who is of Ashkenazi background, holds a BA from the Conservative Rabbinical Seminary in Buenos Aires and earned his MBA from the University of Buenos Aires. He also studied at the Melton Centre of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Obama might do more for Darfur, Cotler says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While Canada has a significant role to play in any international effort to enforce the International Criminal Court's (ICC) arrest warrant against Sudanese president Omar Hassan al-Bashir, it's U.S. President Barack Obama who might actually "take the lead," Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler believes.

The warrant, issued this month, charges al-Bashir with war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Speaking to reporters earlier this month, Cotler, who also serves as his party's special counsel on human rights and international justice, elaborated on the potential U.S. role in enforcing the warrant after he had issued an earlier statement hailing its historic nature.

"Will Canada take the lead in this? I don't believe we can," Cotler said. "But I think President Obama might."

Cotler, who also chairs the Save Darfur Parliamentary Commission and is a former justice minister, cited as an encouraging sign the appointment of Susan Rice, assistant secretary of state for African affairs under former U.S. president Bill Clinton, as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

"She has said she is still haunted by [the 1994 genocide in] Rwanda and won't let it happen again, even if military intervention is required," Cotler cited her as saying.

Cotler also pointed to other signs he saw as encouraging, including that Obama had expressed the "most commitment" to Darfur while serving in the U.S. Senate and running for president.

Cotler remembered meeting with senior Obama adviser Samantha Power of Harvard University's Carr Centre for Human Rights, who expressed a commitment to Darfur that was "unequivocal and unwavering."

Obama was the only presidential candidate to mention Darfur during the campaign and said the United States will "have to act," Cotler said, noting that Obama also received a report on genocide prevention from former U.S. secretary of state Madeleine Albright.

In terms of concrete action, the United States, under the aegis of the United Nations, could quarantine Sudanese ports to block the exportation of oil to China, Sudan's largest importer. "China is an enabler here," Cotler said.

Cotler also denounced the recent Israeli Apartheid Week on North American university campuses and singled out for praise Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff's statement that was also highly critical of the week-long series of events.

Les Grands Ballets to make Israeli debut in June

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Les Grands Ballets Canadiens de Montréal will be performing in Israel this June for the first time in the troupe's 52-year history.

Tel Aviv and Jerusalem are the first stops in a three-week international tour that also includes Cairo, Egypt, Ljubljana, Slovenia, and Baden-Baden, Germany.

Les Grands Ballets will take part in Tel Aviv's celebration of its 100th anniversary with performances June 1 and 2 at the outdoor stage of the Suzanne Dellal Centre for Dance and Theatre, the base of the Batsheva Dance Company, and then at the Jerusalem Centre for the Performing Arts on June 5 during the Israel Festival, an annual cultural showcase. President Shimon Peres has been invited to attend.

The trip to Israel marks the 60th anniversary of bilateral relations between Canada and Israel. Canada officially recognized the Jewish state a year after it declared independence.

The troupe will present two major contemporary pieces from its repertoire: Noces by the Belgian choreographer Stijn Celis and Cantata by the Italian dance maker Mauro Bigonzetti.

In Noces, 24 dancers are on stage in this fast-paced romp reminiscent of a Balkan peasant wedding and featuring the music of Igor Stravinsky. The piece has been frequently presented on the ballet's other tours.

Cantata, a more recent addition to the troupe's stock, is set to popular Neapolitan songs from the 18th and 19th centuries performed live and expresses energetically the many ways men and women relate to each other, from seduction to love to jealousy.

Les Grands Ballets will give four shows at the Cairo Opera House June 9 to 12. The troupe has never performed anywhere in the Middle East before.

"Unquestionably, this tour will be a milestone in our history," said Alain Dancyger, the ballet's executive director. "The company's historic presence in the Middle East is significant, clearly underscoring our established international reputation."

Dancyger, however, took the occasion of announcing the tour to also voice his displeasure with the federal government's cutbacks in arts funding and the threat that the cuts poses to the ballet's ability to go abroad.

He said the Middle East and European tour is going ahead, even though the loss of government funding and the drop in private-sector support due to the recession will leave the troupe with a $250,000 shortfall, as things stand now.

"I am extremely upset that the government of Canada has abolished PromArt and Trade Routes, the only two programs that support international tours.

"The decision to cut off all financial support for exporting and raising the visibility of our culture is surprising in the current economic context. Foreign demand for our company's work is at the highest level it has ever been in our history."

Shown is a scene from the exuberant contemporary ballet Noces, which Les Grands Ballets Canadiens de Montréal will present in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem in June. [Serguei Endinian photo]

Dancyger also expressed these views earlier this month to the parliamentary committee on Canadian heritage and is waiting for a final answer from Ottawa on whether it will contribute to Les Grands Ballets' upcoming international tour.

The ballet is also facing opposition to its Israel tour from Tadamon, a pro-Palestinian group that promotes the boycotting of Israel, including in the cultural realm. An open letter by Freda Guttman being circulated on the Internet appeals to the troupe to cancel the performances as a stand against Israel's alleged violations of international law.

Although the troupe has never been to Israel, it does have solid ties with the country through Israeli choreographer Ohad Naharin going back to 2002. That year, Les Grands Ballets commissioned Naharin, Batsheva's artistic director, to create the dance work Minus One, which has since become a staple of its repertoire.

Last spring, the ballet celebrated Israel's 60th anniversary at Place des Arts with a retrospective of avant-garde Naharin's creations, which it then toured at the National Arts Centre and Quebec City's Grand Théâtre, and a tribute to one of its longtime subscribers, builder and philanthropist David Azrieli.

Passover Food Ideas

Chag kasher v'samayach

Editorial

As we begin to detect small hints of spring in the air, Jewish cooks everywhere turn their thoughts to Passover cooking. Planning a menu for this holiday seems to be a source of great discussion, and it sometimes challenges even the most seasoned chefs.

Preparing food for friends and family members who have restrictions or allergies, or even those who are just plain fussy, can be difficult. After we've rid our homes of chametz, including many of the items that are a staple in some of our diets, we are occasionally at a loss about what to prepare.

We should, however, concentrate on what we can eat for Passover, not on what we have removed from our pantry. In addition to the array of fresh vegetables and fruits that can be incorporated into many dishes, there are, every year, more and more kosher for Passover items available in our supermarkets.

We can also draw upon what our mothers and grandmothers served on holidays past. Passover is a time to rely on traditions, and most families have a favourite chicken dish, kugel recipe or Passover dessert that will be sure to please even the most picky eaters.

Keeping in mind cultural variations in cooking, and the ever-present trend toward low sugar, high fibre, vegetarian foods, we've tried in our upcoming Passover food pages, to include meal ideas for beginner cooks about to host their first seder, and for those of us just looking for a new dish for the seder or a mid-week meal.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy these recipes. Chag kasher v'samayach.

Three chocolates and a macaroon

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Two seders, at least two main courses, salads, a myriad of side dishes. Not to mention the chicken soup and matzah balls. Passover can be daunting in the amount of work and preparation involved. Making dessert should, in my mind at least, be stress free, however, so I've whipped up four unbelievably easy and delicious recipes to replace the usual chiffon cake, make it a little bit more fun and a whole lot of tasty. Three chocolate desserts and a macaroon, to be precise. Most can and should be made ahead, leaving your oven and stove top free for all the last minute reheating that seders call for. If you have kids hankering for something sweet during the holidays, why not treat them to what I call Passover S'Mores? Simple and effective, it may just become a holiday ritual.

PASSOVER S'MORES

Break off small pieces of matzah, about 1-1/2 inches in diameter. Top with 1 heaping tablespoon of semisweet or milk chocolate chips. Place in microwave. Heat for about 40 seconds on high power or until chocolate has melted. Remove from microwave. Place heaping tablespoon of marshmallow fluff; microwave for about 20 to 30 seconds or until marshmallow fluff has puffed and melted. Let cool slightly before enjoying.

OOEY GOOEY I CAN'T BELIEVE THEY'RE KOSHER FOR PASSOVER BROWNIES CAKES

These divine little cakes can be made all year round. Feel free to substitute pecans for the marshmallows or caramel sauce for the chocolate ganache. I like to serve each one on an individual plate with a decorative pattern of raspberry coulis around the plate and a few fresh raspberries.

3/4 cup unsalted butter or margarine
3 oz. unsweetened chocolate, coarsely chopped
1 cup granulated sugar
1/2 cup firmly packed light brown sugar
3 eggs, lightly beaten
2 tsp. kosher for Passover vanilla
1/2 cup matzah cake meal
2 tbsp. potato starch
1/4 tsp. salt
1-1/3 cups kosher for Passover mini-marshmallows
1/2 cup semisweet chocolate chips

Topping:
8 oz. semisweet chocolate, chopped
3/4 cup whipping cream or nondairy creamer

Lightly grease 16 muffin cup tins. Preheat oven to 350. In saucepan set over medium heat, melt together butter and chocolate, until smooth. Whisk in granulated and brown sugars. Whisk in eggs. Whisk in vanilla. Gently stir in matzah cake meal, potato starch and salt. Stir in marshmallows and chocolate chips.

Fill each cupcake tin about halfway with batter. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 15 to 17 minutes or just until set. Do not overbake. Remove from oven and let sit for 5 minutes. Run small paring knife around edge of each cake and remove gently. Let cool on rack. (Brownie cakes can be covered tightly with plastic wrap and stored for up to 3 days).

Topping: Bring cream or creamer to a boil over medium high heat. Add chocolate; whisk until smooth. Let cool slightly. With fork, drizzle chocolate ganache over top of brownie cakes. Makes 16 brownies cakes.

CHOCOLATE MARTINIS

This showstopper treat is simplicity itself, although it does have to be made the day ahead and you should plan on having enough room in your fridge to store the martini glasses. To make this dish more sophisticated, or if the children at your seder are having another dessert, feel free to add kosher for Passover liqueurs to each layer, matching the liqueur to the chocolate flavour.

Sweeten up your holiday meal

10 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped and melted
10 oz. premium milk chocolate, coarsely chopped and melted
8 oz. premium white chocolate coarsely chopped and melted
6 cups whipping cream
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract

In saucepan, bring cream just to a boil. Stir 2 cups of cream into each of the melted chocolates, stirring until blended and smooth. Let cool to room temperature. Cover each bowl with plastic wrap and refrigerate for about 1-1/2 hours, or until well chilled and liquid but not yet firm. Using a standup or hand held mixer, beat the dark chocolate mixture until soft peaks form. Divide evenly among 8 martini glasses, smoothing top.

Whip the milk chocolate mixture until soft peaks form. Carefully spoon milk chocolate over dark chocolate layer, smoothing top and being carful not to mix the layers. Chill while preparing the white chocolate layer.

Whip the white chocolate layer until soft peaks form. Carefully spoon on top of milk chocolate layer, again being careful not to mix the layers. Cover top of glasses with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 12 hours or for up to 36 hours.

Garnish with shaved chocolate, a chocolate kiss, or fresh raspberries. Makes 10 servings.

CHOCOLATE CARAMEL HAZELNUT SOUFFLE CAKE

1 lb. bittersweet chocolate, finely chopped
1 cup unsalted butter or margarine
8 eggs, separated
1 cup granulated sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt

Topping:
1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup toasted chopped hazelnuts
3/4 cup whipping cream or oil based cream substitute pinch salt

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease a 10-in. springform pan.

In saucepan set over medium low heat, melt together butter and chocolate until smooth.

In bowl of standup mixer, beat egg yolks until broken up. With mixer running, gradually add 1/2 cup of the sugar. Beat for about 5 minutes or until mixture is very thick and almost to the ribbon stage. Fold egg mixture into chocolate mixture.

In clean bowl, whisk egg whites and salt until soft peaks appear. With mixer running, gradually add remaining 1/2 cup sugar until stiff glossy peaks form. Stir one-third of the egg whites into chocolate mixture to lighten it. Fold in remaining egg whites just until blended, along with vanilla and salt.

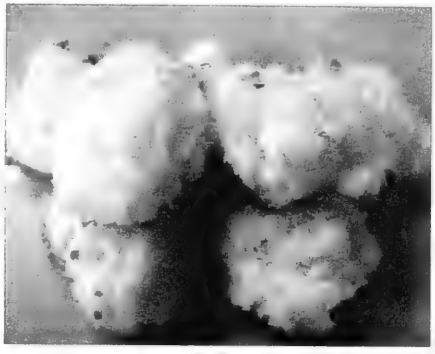
Transfer batter to prepared pan. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 30 to 35 minutes or until puffy and just firm. The cake should still be moist in the centre although not runny. Cool completely in pan on rack. Wrap cake in plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 24 hours or for up to 2 days. Bring to room temperature before serving.

Topping:

In heavy saucepan, combine sugar and 3 tbsp. water, swirling pan until sugar is dissolved. Cook over medium heat, brushing down sides of pan with a wet pastry brush, until sugar starts to turn a deep amber colour. This should take about 5 minutes. Immediately remove the pan from the heat; stir in nuts and cream. The mixture will froth and splatter. Return pan to low heat and cook, stirring, for about 3 minutes or until mixture thickens. Slice cake and top with hazelnut caramel sauce. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

TRIPLE NUT MACAROONS

4-1/4 cups shredded sweetened coconut (2-200g bags)
1/4 cup each chopped almonds and pecans
1/4 cup chopped walnuts
1 tbsp. matzah cake meal
1 can sweetened condensed milk
1/4 cup cream of coconut (optional)
1 tsp. vanilla
2 egg whites



Preheat oven to 350. In large bowl, combine coconut, almonds, walnuts, and pecans. Stir in matzah cake meal, breaking up any lumps of coconut if necessary. Stir in sweetened condensed milk and coconut cream (if using), stirring until mixture is well moistened.

In separate bowl, beat egg whites until stiff. Gently fold into coconut mixture.

Using 2-tbsp. ice cream scoop or large spoon, drop mounds of cookie onto two parchment paper-lined baking sheets.

Bake in centre of preheated oven, one baking sheet at a time, for 20 to 25 minutes or until golden brown. Let cool completely on rack. Serve same day or wrap tightly in plastic wrap for up to two days. Makes about 44 macaroons.

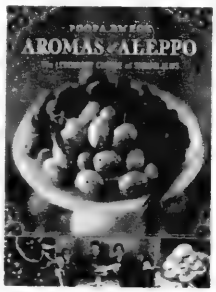
Passover Food Ideas

Some traditional Syrian recipes

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When Sarine and Murad Kattan left Aleppo, Syria, in 1947 for their honeymoon in Italy, their thoughts were of love and their future in their beloved homeland, where their family and the larger Jewish community had lived and flourished for centuries.

Back in Aleppo, the announcement of the United Nations partition of Palestine fuelled the already smoldering atmosphere of anti-Semitism, setting off pogroms that virtually extinguished all Jewish life, erasing centuries of rich, thriving culture.



Those Jews that survived fled by the thousands, and the honeymooners were forced to remain in Italy, never to see Aleppo again.

By all accounts, the culture and cuisine of the Jews of Aleppo should have perished. They did not. The Syrian Jewish community, extremely tight-knit despite being scattered across many continents, continues to thrive.

Now Sarine and Murad's daughter, Poopa Dweck, has documented the rich culinary legacy of her parents' homeland in Aromas of Aleppo: The Legendary Cuisine of Syrian Jews (Ecco/HarperCollins). Illustrated with magnificent photos, Aromas of Aleppo documents the sumptuous cuisine and unique customs of this vibrant culture.

"When the Jews left Aleppo, they dispersed throughout the world to Mexico, South America, Israel, Panama, Geneva," noted Dweck by phone from her home in Deal, N.J. "The largest Syrian Jewish community is in Brooklyn. We stay connected – the community is like one. At weddings and bar mitzvahs, we all know each other."

From the time they arrived in America, the Aleppian community has defied assimilation. "When we came to Brooklyn, to the Lower East Side of New York, other Jews didn't even think we were Jewish. We were dark-skinned. We looked different. We didn't eat matzah ball soup and challah. We made our own Syrian flatbread.

"The reason we're so closely knit, I think, is that we have paid strict adherence to our customs and religious observances. We didn't go to meatloaf. Through its food, holidays and life-cycle events we've kept it intact."

Passover is the culinary highlight of the year for Aleppian Jews, as for Jews the world over. Through our celebratory meal, the seder (the word means "order" in Hebrew), we retell the 3,500-year-old story of our ancestors' flight to freedom from the land of Egypt. And everything on the table is laden with meaning.

The centrepiece is the seder plate that holds the traditional symbols. "The plate I use was my mother's," Dweck said. "We're three girls and two boys in the family, and the others knew when she passed away that I was getting that plate."

The shank bone hearkens back to the days of old when the Passover celebration included offering and eating a sacrificial lamb, and unlike Jews of eastern European ancestry (the majority in the United States), Aleppian Jews present the bone with the meat attached on the seder plate.

Charoset is a fruit and nut mixture symbolizing the mortar used by our ancestors as slaves in Egypt. Every Jewish community in the world makes it with whatever is local.

"Because dates were so plentiful in that part of the Arab world," Dweck noted, "our charoset would be made purely with all dates, whereas Ashkenazim use apples."

Aleppian Jewish cuisine is a combination of Mediterranean and Levantine cooking. "Compared to other Arab cuisines, it is elaborate, very opulent, because Aleppo itself was a flourishing commercial centre, and the ingredients came from all over the world and were of the best quality," Dweck said. "Through Turkish, Persian and Spanish influences that came to Aleppo, it was brought up to a high level. Our cuisine was known as the pearl of the Arab world."

Candied coconut with pistachios is favoured dessert

One factor that distinguishes Aleppian cooking is the use of tamarind. "Whereas the rest of the Arab world uses pomegranate concentrate, we use tamarind," she said.

Her book tour took her to Beijing, where fresh tamarind grows in pods in the countryside. "I taught the Jewish community there how to make tamarind concentrate. It's so plentiful there."

Through Persian influence, Aleppian cooking makes much use of dried fruit, especially apricots, in everything from meat dishes to desserts.

"My mother and the old-timers would get nuts when they'd see these fake cakes for Passover. Our traditional dessert of choice for Passover is Coconut Helou Hindi (candied coconut with pistachios)," she said. "I make it every year. One reason it's so popular is, a hundred years ago, we couldn't use chocolate, because it contained lecithin, which is not kosher for Passover. This is our key dessert for the holiday."

Rice is an important part of the Passover Aleppian table, and a traditional Passover meal will typically include several mehshis (stuffed vegetable dishes) with a meat and rice filling called hashu. "Aleppo is known as the queen of mehshis," Dweck said.

STUFFED EGGPLANT WITH QUINCE

2 dozen very small eggplants, cored
2 recipes hashu (recipe follows)
3 quinces, cored, peeled, and cut into 6 pieces each

Sauce

3 tbsp. tamarind concentrate, homemade or store-bought (see notes) juice of 1 lemon (about 3 tbsp.)
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. kosher salt
6 pieces candied quince (recipe follows), for garnish

Stuff eggplants with hashu. Place alternating layers of quince and stuffed eggplants in a large ovenproof saucepan.

To make sauce: In a small bowl, combine tamarind concentrate, lemon juice, sugar, salt and 1 cup water and mix well. Pour sauce over stuffed eggplants and quince. Place a heatproof plate over them to serve as a weight.

Cook over medium-low heat for about 10 minutes, or until eggplants release moisture. Remove saucepan from heat. Add enough water to cover eggplants 3/4 of the way. Keep heatproof plate on top as a weight. Bring to a boil over medium-high heat, then reduce heat to low, cover and simmer 30 minutes, or until 1/4 of the liquid remains.

Preheat oven to 300. Transfer saucepan to oven and braise 45 minutes. Uncover and braise 30 minutes more. Garnish with candied quince, if desired. Yield: 6 to 8 servings

Notes: While Sephardi Jews eat rice for Passover, eastern European Jews do not and may enjoy this dish after the holiday.

Tamarind concentrate is sold in Middle Eastern stores. If you cannot find kosher for Passover tamarind concentrate, you can make your own (recipe below).

Shape any leftover hashu mixture into 2-inch balls and cook it with the sauce.

Hashu:

1 lb. ground beef
1/3 cup short-grain white rice
1 tsp. allspice
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 tsp. white pepper
1 onion, chopped (1/2 cup, optional)
1 cup pine nuts (optional)

Soak rice in water, enough to cover, for 30 minutes. Drain. Combine meat, rice, allspice, oil, cinnamon, salt, white pepper and, if desired, onion and pine nuts in a large mixing bowl. Mix well.

Tamarind Concentrate:

3 lb. tamarind pulp
3-3/4 cup sugar
1-1/2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice (optional)
3 tbsp. sour salt (citric acid)

In a large mixing bowl, submerge tamarind pulp in about six cups of water. Cover and soak 6 to 8 hours or overnight. After pulp has soaked, while keeping it in the water, pull it apart to make a mash-like, pulpy, soft mixture.

Line the bottom of a colander with cheesecloth. Fit the colander over a large nonreactive mixing bowl. Strain tamarind pulp by pressing it firmly against the surface of the colander, squeezing to extract as much liquid as possible. Pick out any plant matter and pits from the liquid and set it aside.

Place the strained pulp in a clean mixing bowl and submerge in fresh water. Work to pull it apart again, then strain and reserve the liquid. Repeat this process a third time.

Combine all the reserved tamarind liquid and strain through a cheesecloth or fine mesh strainer. Discard the pulp.

Pour the tamarind liquid into a large saucepan and bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce the heat to low and simmer until the liquid is reduced by half. Add the sugar, lemon juice if desired, and sour salt to the tamarind liquid. Increase the heat to medium and boil slowly, stirring frequently with a wooden spoon, until the mixture has a silky consistency akin to a dark, thick syrup. Let the mixture cool thoroughly, then pour into a glass jar. Store in a cool, dry place up to a year. Yield: 4 cups.

Candied Quince:

3 to 4 quinces, cored, peeled and cut in 1-in.-thick slices (about 3 cups)
3 cups sugar

In a medium saucepan, cover quinces with sugar and cook over medium-low heat. The sugar will melt and liquefy, and the quinces will start to turn a beautiful dark and rosy colour.

When mixture bubbles, reduce heat to low and simmer, stirring occasionally, for 1 hour, or until quinces are thoroughly coated with a thick, gooey syrup. Transfer quince and syrup to a jar, and store in refrigerator for up to 2 months. Yield: 2-1/2 cups.

Anything's possible for Passover – even gluten-free!

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Pesach strikes an acute sense of panic in many Jewish homemakers worldwide. Faced with dietary guidelines, special family traditions and endless Passover meals to prepare, we often find cooking for Pesach a daunting task.

Tamar Ansh, well-known Israeli author of two bestselling cookbooks, believes that on Pesach, "anything's possible!" In her latest cookbook, A Taste of Tradition: Pesach and Beyond (Targum), Ansh offers an amazing array of culinary possibilities, each more delicious than the next. Her recipes, ranging from basic to gourmet, are so simple to prepare and delicious that you won't want to wait until next Pesach to use them again. This unique cookbook also contains tantalizing, full-colour photos that will whet your appetite.

A Taste of Tradition: Pesach and Beyond, which contains more than 350 recipes, has a universal appeal and is sure to become a family favourite. Ansh has thought of something for everyone, from meat lovers to carb addicts, from health nuts to junk food fanatics. As an extra bonus, all her recipes are 100 per cent wheat-free, gluten-free and non-gebrochts, making them ideal for kosher celiacs and individuals who are gluten-sensitive.

On Passover, many Jews will not eat gebrochts – foods containing matzah and its derivatives (cake meal, matzah meal, farfel) that are combined with liquid and could possibly ferment. Some Jews will eat these foods only on the eighth day of Passover. Other Jews will eat matzah products that are combined with fruit juice but not with water. (Consult your rabbi for guidelines.)

With luscious, no-fail recipes and dozens of tips and helpful hints, A Taste of Tradition: Pesach and Beyond, is a wonderful resource for Pesach and all year round. Enjoy!

NON-GEBROCHTS KNEIDLACH

1 lb. ground white chicken or white turkey
2 eggs
1/2 tsp. salt
1 potato, cooked and mashed
1 small onion, diced or puréed

Combine all the ingredients and mix them well. Refrigerate the batter for about an hour to make the batter firm. Make small balls out of it and drop them into boiling water. Cook the kneidlach for about 3/4 of an hour. Add them to the soup pot about 45 minutes before your soup finishes cooking.

Note: Kneidlach can be made in advance and frozen. Remove them from the freezer and place them in the soup approximately 45 minutes before the soup finishes cooking. Yields 15 to 20 balls.

THICK YELLOW VEGETABLE SOUP

2 tsp. olive oil
1 to 2 medium onions, sliced
1 green pepper, chopped
1 red pepper, chopped
2 orange or yellow peppers, chopped
2 medium sweet potatoes, cubed
2 medium potatoes, cubed
1 butternut squash, cut in chunks
5 to 7 large carrots, sliced large piece of pumpkin, cut in chunks
3 ripe tomatoes, chopped
2 to 3 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
small bunch each fresh dill and parsley

In an 8-quart (or larger) pot, heat the oil over a medium flame and sauté the onions and peppers until they are transparent. Add all the other vegetables, salt, pepper and herbs. Fill with water until almost the top of the pot. Bring to a boil and then simmer for about 2 hours on a low flame, until the vegetables are completely soft. Purée until smooth. Freezes well. Serves 8 to 10.

MANGO, AVOCADO AND ROMAINE LETTUCE SALAD

1 bag bug-free romaine lettuce, rinsed and dried
1 large, fresh mango, peeled and sliced
1 large avocado, peeled and cubed
1/3 cup craisins or dark raisins
1/2 cup candied pecans, crushed
1 small red pepper, chopped

Tear apart the lettuce and place it in a large salad bowl. Add the rest of the ingredients and mix it all together.

Dressing
1/4 cup honey
2 tsp. oil
1/4 cup light mayonnaise
2 tsp. apple cider vinegar or regular vinegar
2 tsp. granulated garlic powder
2 tsp. granulated onion powder

Whisk all of this together and pour it over the salad right before serving. Yum! Serves 4 to 5.

BEET SALAD IN ORANGE SAUCE

4 to 5 beets, cooked and sliced
1 small onion, diced
1 tsp. vinegar
3 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. olive oil
1/2 cup fresh orange juice
small pinch of salt

Toss all of the ingredients together in a bowl to mix well. Place the mixture in a pot, cover with the lid, and bring to a boil over a high flame. Reduce the flame to low and simmer for 15 to 20 minutes. Remove from the heat and refrigerate. Stir before serving. Serves 4 to 6.

SWEET POTATO SCOOPS

8 medium sweet potatoes
2 tsp. oil
1/2 cup plus 2 tsp. brown sugar
1 packet vanilla sugar (see note below)
12 to 15 pineapple rings
1 tsp. cinnamon

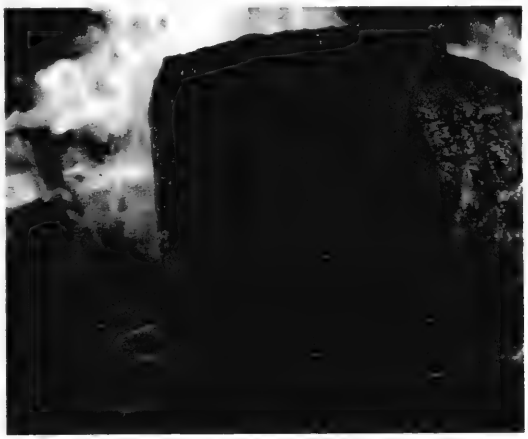
Preheat oven to 350. Boil or bake the sweet potatoes until they are soft. Mash them with the oil, 1/2 cup sugar and vanilla sugar. Lay out the pineapple rings on a baking tray lined with baking paper. Scoop the sweet potato mixture with an ice cream scooper and place each scoop on top of a pineapple ring. Mix the 2 tsp. brown sugar with the cinnamon and sprinkle it on top of each scoop. Bake, uncovered, for 45 minutes, until the sweet potato mixture is slightly crispy on top. Serves 12 to 15.

Note: To make your own vanilla sugar, bury a split vanilla bean pod in granulated sugar. (Use 1 bean per pound of sugar.) Store in a container for a week and then remove vanilla bean. You can reuse the vanilla bean for up to 6 months. (Or substitute 2-1/2 tsp. sugar and 1 tsp. vanilla extract for 1 packet vanilla sugar.)

TANGY VEAL OR MEAT ROAST

6 garlic cloves, peeled
1/4 cup olive oil
1/4 cup (wine) vinegar
2 tsp. parsley flakes
1/2 tsp. oregano
4 to 5 lb. (2 to 2 1/2 kg) roast, washed and dried
1 cup semi-dry white wine
3 stalks celery, diced
3 carrots, sliced into rounds
2 large onions, sliced

Next-Day Marinade
1/2 cup olive oil
1/2 cup (wine) vinegar
1 tsp. parsley flakes
1/2 tsp. oregano
1 cup tomato sauce, optional
6 to 8 garlic cloves, pressed



Squeeze the garlic cloves into a bowl using a garlic press. Add the olive oil, vinegar, parsley and oregano to the bowl, mixing it well with the garlic. Place the meat into a large glass or plastic container and pour this garlic mixture over it. Marinate the roast for 6 hours or overnight, basting periodically.

Then place the meat in a pot that fits its size as closely as possible. Add the wine to the meat, put the pot over a medium low flame and simmer it for 3 hours. Cool and refrigerate the pot overnight.

The next day, remove the meat from the pot and discard the juices. Slice the roast and lay it flat in a 9 x 13-inch (or a bit larger) baking pan. Mix all the ingredients for the marinade together and pour it over the meat slices. Arrange the celery, carrots, and onions over the meat and cover the roast well with foil. Bake at 350 for another 2 hours, basting the roast once an hour or so to prevent it from drying out. Serves 8 to 10.

APPLESAUCE CRANBERRY ICE

1 1/2 to 2 cups applesauce
2 cans jellied cranberry sauce
1 cup lemon-lime soda
1 cup orange juice
1 to 2 tsp. fruit-flavoured liqueur, optional (I did not use it)

Mix everything by hand in a bowl, or beat it with a hand beater for a minute or two to make it smooth. Pour it into a large, flat, square plastic container and freeze it overnight. (Right, this took you about 4 1/2 minutes so far? Now comes the next 5 minutes or so!)

The next day, remove the ice from the freezer. Cut into it, if you can, to break it into four or five pieces and put it into the mixer bowl. If it is too frozen to break apart, let it sit on the counter for a few minutes. Beat it slowly with the regular flat beater (i.e., NOT the egg whipping beater!), until it resembles sherbet consistency. Refreeze it. Remove the ice from the freezer about 5 minutes before serving. Scoop it into dessert bowls and serve. Serves 6.

Recipes from my friend's bubbie, Loblaws, Weight Watchers

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

In the age of no fat, carbs and calories, I figured my friends would have some interesting recipes for Passover that I could share. However, when I polled some of them via Facebook and e-mail, most replied that they stick to their mother's traditional recipes or they consult a cookbook. Many were apprehensive to share their recipes, and after my repeated requests, some finally broke down to admit none were completely of their own invention. After receiving my friend Pam Isen's Chicken Soup recipe, I received the following confession: "I have to admit I am feeling guilty, as this is my Bubbie Peggy's recipe."

PAM'S BUBBIE PEGGY'S CHICKEN SOUP

1 whole kosher chicken
1 kosher chicken back
1 beef bone
2 large carrots
2 large yellow onions
4 medium parsnips
1/2 bunch celery
5 sprigs fresh dill
salt to taste

Peel, rinse and then cut the carrots and parsnips into large chunks. Keeping the vegetables large, about 3 inches long, makes it easier to save them when the soup is done. Peel and cut the onions into quarters. Wash and cut the celery into large pieces as well. Save the dill for the final stages of cooking.

Fill a very large stock pot halfway with hot water and bring to a simmer. Rinse the chicken and bones under cold water and then place into the hot water. As the water comes to a boil (do not let it come to a rolling boil), the scum will begin to float to the top. Skim the scum and discard. Allow to simmer a few more minutes until the water is clear and skim again if necessary.

Next, place all of the vegetables, except the dill, into the pot. Using a small pot, fill the stock pot with warm water, almost to the top. Cover the pot, tilting the cover slightly to vent the steam. Bring to a boil (watch carefully so it does not boil over), then reduce to a light simmer and leave covered with a slight vent for about 2 hours.

Periodically, skim the fat from the top of the soup and discard. During the last hour of cooking, season with kosher salt to taste. Don't be afraid of the salt. It is a key ingredient to bring all of the flavours together. Just remember one thing – season a little at a time, you can always add more. The purpose of the salt is not to make the soup salty; it is to enhance the flavour. Next add the whole sprigs of dill and then allow the soup to simmer lightly uncovered for 1 hour. Removing the cover will allow the soup to reduce slightly and concentrate the flavour.

The easiest way to strain the soup is to have a large colander resting on top of a second large stock pot. Pour the soup through the colander slowly (or use a large measuring cup as a scoop if you have trouble pouring from the large pot) in stages. Remove the vegetables and pieces of meat during the straining and set aside to serve in the soup. After straining, place the soup in smaller containers and allow them to cool almost to room temperature before placing in the fridge. Add kosher for Passover noodles or matzah balls. This soup freezes very well.

After Pam's confession, I reapproached friends to ask them for their family recipes, or anything that they cook that may be inspired by other recipes. My friend Susan Javier then offered up her kosher for Passover version of a recipe from a cooking class at Loblaws, which used crackers instead of matzah, but Susan recommends the matzah version.

SUSAN'S MATZAH BARK

1-1/2 cups butter
1-1/2 cups brown sugar
4 pieces of matzah
bag of chocolate chips
1 cup sliced almonds or sprinkles or similar garnish

In a saucepan, melt butter and brown sugar, bringing to a boil, stirring constantly. Prior to this, place matzah on a cookie sheet. Spread the melted butter and sugar evenly over the matzah and place in a 350 degree oven for a few minutes until the butter starts to bubble. Remove from oven and put chocolate chips on top. Pop it back in the oven for about 30 seconds to start melting the chocolate chips, then spread the chocolate, sprinkle sliced almonds or colourful sprinkles on top, cool and serve.

Gilah Benmergui, a friend for over 20 years, offered up her Passover-friendly version of a Weight Watchers' recipe that is a family favourite. Gilah has modified it over the years to make it even lower in fat and calories, however, she claims this version is the perfect healthy alternative for the holidays.

GILAH'S LOW-FAT PASSOVER CHEESECAKE RECIPE

12 Passover cookies of choice (2-1/2 in. squares) made into crumbs or 1 cup matzah meal
2 packets vanilla sugar (if using matzah meal)
2 cups light cream cheese
1 cup fat-free sour cream
1/2 cup sugar
1 tbsp. vanilla extract
2 large eggs
2 tsp. lemon zest

Preheat oven to 325, wrap outside of 10-in. springform pan with heavy-duty foil, then spray inside entirely with non-stick spray. Press cookie crumbs or matzah meal (combined with two packets of vanilla sugar) over bottom and partially up the sides of pan.

In large bowl, with an electric mixer on medium speed, beat cream cheese, sour cream and vanilla extract until smooth. Add eggs one at a time, beating on low speed until blended, then stir in lemon zest.

Pour batter into springform pan and set into large roasting pan. Pour boiling water into roasting pan so that it comes halfway up sides of springform pan. Bake until almost completely set, 35-40 minutes.

Turn off oven and prop door open with wooden spoon, leaving cake in oven 30 minutes. Transfer to rack and run knife around edge of pan to release cake. Cool completely, then refrigerate covered until ready to serve.

Last, but never least, my best friend, high school prom date, and the only man to respond to my request sent me the following message, "OK, this cake is soooo good, I literally make it year-round. I always have the ingredients in my cupboard, and it's always a show stopper. Really good with ice cream, and/or berry compote, and/or whipped cream." He has been making this cake for so many years that he cannot remember where it originated.

GAVIN NEVSKY'S CHOCOLATE FUDGE CAKE

cooking spray
unsweetened cocoa
8 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
1/2 cup margarine
3/4 cup sugar
3 large eggs, beaten
1 tsp. vanilla extract
2 tbsp. powdered sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly coat a 9-in. pie plate (I use a clear, round 9-in. Pyrex) with cooking spray, and dust with cocoa.

Melt chopped chocolate and margarine in a heavy saucepan over low heat, stirring constantly, 3 to 5 minutes or until smooth: whisk in 3/4 cup sugar, whisking until blended.

Whisk together eggs and vanilla in a large bowl. Gradually whisk in chocolate mixture, whisking until blended. Pour into prepared pie plate.

Bake at 350 for 30 minutes or until edges are dry and centre is set. (Do not over-bake). Cool in pie plate on a wire rack 30 minutes or until completely cool. (Cake will fall slightly when removed from oven.) Dust with 2 tbsp. powdered sugar just before serving.

HOOPS 4 ISRAEL

Hooping it up for a cause

By-ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Ethiopian Israeli communities will once again benefit from a bunch of guys and gals doing their best Toronto Raptors impressions to raise money.

The third annual Hoops For Israel (H4I) 3-on-3 charity basketball tournament, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Birthright Israel Alumni Committee, takes place on Sunday, March 22, at the HoopDome, 75 Carl Hall Rd. at Downsview Park. The event gets underway at 1 p.m.

David Goodman, 26, the driving force and founder of the tourney – he put the first H4I together after returning from a Taglit-Birthright Israel trip in 2006, during which he became deeply affected by the plight of Ethiopian olim in Kiryat Moshe – is enthused by the yearly growth in participation and funds raised for the cause.

The last two Hoops events benefited the Kiryat Moshe Ethiopian community. This year, H4I fixed its sights on the community of Bat Yam, located about a 10-minute drive outside Tel Aviv.

H4I volunteers visited the town this past December and met with its community leaders and youth. The charity will help build a new athletic complex and mentor its youth by imparting "intangible leadership skills," Goodman said.

According to the H4I website, the community at Bat Yam – approximately 6,000 people – is one of the most impoverished in Israel, with 70 per cent of residents living below Israel's poverty line.

Goodman's last two tournaments helped raise nearly $300,000, and he predicts this year's tourney will raise almost $100,000.

Bat Yam youth ready to play.

Despite H4I's early and continued success, Goodman wants to see more done, particularly in terms of increased volunteerism by his peers in the North American Jewish communities.

"Why isn't volunteerism more widespread?" he asked rhetorically in a recent interview with Heebonics. "It rests on the laurels of volunteers to ensure the continuity of the Jewish community. And we're going to have to find [voluntary] events to cater to our generation."

To that end, Goodman, who is not afraid to dream big in this regard, said that this Sunday he'll officially announce the creation of an "overarching... social-networking" charitable body called Hoops For Change as a call to social action. H4I will be just one of many Hoops For Change's tikkun olam and tzedakah projects.

An outgrowth of intensive discussions with fellow youth philanthropists and Birthright alumni that took place earlier this month in Los Angeles, Hoops For Change will incorporate the H4I event among a slew of other charitable projects under its umbrella in Jewish markets across the continent.

"This will take tzedakah and tikkun olam to a new level," Goodman said. "We'll have various Hoops events in 2011. Not just in Toronto [but also] in Los Angeles, New York, Washington and Chicago." Plans to bring events to Montreal, Boston and Miami are also being considered in the longer term, he said.

Goodman said his pitch to expand on the H4I model was met with ardour by UJA Federation – the primary sponsor of H4I and the new Hoops For Change initiative – and by members of Birthright NEXT, peer counterparts in the United States.

Details are still being worked out, but as of this weekend, the new direction of Goodman's Hoops project will have an impact on those in need in Toronto and beyond.

"We'd asked participants [in H4I] to raise a minimum of $2,000 per team in order to play. But with the difficult economy, we've worked out a cool twist where players can volunteer hours in the community [as payment] instead," he said.

Among the numerous volunteer works planned is an advocacy initiative called The Garden Project, which involves volunteers making use of Israeli water and environmental technologies to plant gardens and beautify public basketball courts around Toronto.

Volunteer from H4I and Ethiopian olim.

Other projects include basketball workshops and support groups for Reena clients and a proposed alliance with Toronto's Concrete Hoops, an organization run by graduates of Oakwood Collegiate that preaches a "stay in school" mantra to the city's at-risk youth, all in a basketball-saturated camp environment.

One member of Concrete Hoops will also participate at this year's H4I and has promised Goodman he will run basketball clinics for Jewish Family and Child youth this summer at Centre Camp, operated by the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, in lieu of a monetary donation to H4I, Goodman said.

As of last week, Goodman estimated that H4I will reach its goal of 32 participating teams – nearly 144 people – and more than 50 volunteers at the event on Sunday to help the residents of Bat Yam.

"Who's to say we can't bring this model across Jewish communities in North America?" he asked. "I see a product we have now that deserves to be everywhere. There's no reason it can't have impact in... getting our peers involved in the Israeli and Canadian community."

He added: "Hoops 4 Israel opened a door for me... to think about what Israel needs."

As such, with the imminent announcement of the Hoops For Change model this weekend, Goodman is throwing down the gauntlet and challenging today's Jewish youth to do better for their fellow North Americans and Israelis in need.

"We're still working on Hoops For Change's budget. But we anticipate we'll have this whole infrastructure that will be an outlet for volunteerism for people who want to give back through basketball... in a really tangible and pragmatic way," he said, adding that there will be more news about the specifics of Hoops For Change in the months to come.

Global financial crisis hits Israeli diamond industry

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TEL AVIV — The Israel Diamond Exchange (IDE) is an impressive place – a sprawling jewelry bourse that's secured like Fort Knox.

To enter one of the facility's four interlinked buildings, visitors must undergo a security check, leave a digital fingerprint impression and be willing to have their every movement scanned by thousands of strategically located cameras. Members' offices are enclosed behind heavy metal doors, and safes provide yet another level of protection.

It's all in the interests of safeguarding the shining baubles – worth millions upon millions – that the exchange's 3,000 members keep locked away in their offices.

But while the exchange goes to great lengths to assure the members don't lose their merchandise to skullduggery and thieves, the market outside has done what malevolent ne'er-do-wells couldn't do – slash drastically the value of members' inventory.

"The downturn in the economy in the world affected diamonds like it affected everybody," said IDE President Avi Paz. "First prices went down and then trade volumes went down."

Avi Paz

Paz, who also serves as president of the 29-member World Federation of Diamond Bourses, said despite industry efforts to boost prices by limiting the supply of rough diamonds, "some goods went down sharply, some less so, depending on quality and size. It's still difficult to give numbers since it's only five months."

While the full impact of the international financial crisis remains unknown, the Israel Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor released data for 2008 showing sharp declines in diamond sales. Net polished-diamond exports fell 11.8 per cent in 2008 to $6.24 billion (all figures US), compared with $7.07 billion in 2007, while net rough-diamond exports declined two per cent to $3.31 billion in 2008, from $3.38 billion the year before.

IDEX magazine, a diamond industry publication, quoted analyst Chaim Even-Zohar predicting consumer demand for diamonds would drop 10 per cent in 2009, while analyst Ken Gassman suggested the fall could be limited to only seven or eight per cent.

Danni Eizenstien has seen first-hand how the diamond industry – which Paz credited for 30 per cent of Israeli exports in 2008 – has suffered in recent months.

In January, things were particularly bad. "At first, for two weeks I didn't touch my [magnifying] loop. The phones were quiet," he said.

The second generation of a family business his father Avner started 30 years ago, Danni said that "the atmosphere here is that people are a little bit worried. In the beginning, it started a panic. It's gone toworried. People start to understand that they will lose and will have to recreate themselves again."

The current downturn comes after a very profitable period. "Two thousand and seven was a very good year," said Paz. "We had more than $10 billion in exports from Israel, nearly $7 billion in polished stones and $3 billion in rough stones.

Danni Eizenstein

"Even 2008 until the end of September, we were up nearly three per cent."

When the international economy began its collapse, Paz issued a news release calling on the two big players – De Beers and Alrosa – who supply nearly 75 per cent of the world's rough (unpolished) diamonds, to cut production. Alrosa, a Russian firm, cut entirely its supply of rough stones, while De Beers is down to 10 to15 per cent of its pre-downturn production.

The fates of Israeli diamond merchants are closely linked to their biggest customer, the United States, ground zero for the downturn. "Israel sells about 60 per cent of its polished diamonds to the United States," Paz said, adding he is encouraging merchants to diversify their markets.

"For the moment, it's difficult," he continued. "We took action to redress the impact of the downturn" by offering buyers free hotel stays, free entry to the Exchange and support for diamond merchants at international trade shows, including an important trade fair in Hong Kong.

So far, only a small number of merchants have been forced out of business. "Most are just looking at lower incomes," Paz said.

Paz believes that when it comes to discretionary purchases for Christmas gifts, diamonds hold a unique place. They maintain their value better than other luxury items, such as high-end handbags, electronics and holidays. "It will always be worth something," he stated.

Eizenstien puts diamond sales in two categories: "the bread and butter goods of mostly 1 point to 1.5 carats. They got hit, but not so much."

These stones were in high demand in recent years and prices soared. "In one day, it stopped." But, he added, "People will continue to get married and still need diamonds, but maybe smaller ones."

A second group of merchants bore the brunt of the downturn – those who dealt in larger stones. "A $1-million stone went down a lot," he said.

People were initially "shocked" by the extent of the slowdown and, for many, the extent of the troubles didn't register for two or three months. But they are recovering, if only at a fraction of earlier volume. "Small trades have started again. I believe things will pick up," he said.

Schalit's release imminent?

JTA

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert postponed a special cabinet meeting that was thought to possibly include the approval of a deal to free kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit.

The meeting was postponed from Monday to Tuesday. The cabinet was to either approve a release agreement or be updated on any progress in talks to free Schalit ahead of the establishment of a new government, according to the Prime Minister's Office.

Late Saturday, Security Agency Director Yuval Diskin and his special envoy, Ofer Dekel, arrived in Cairo in an attempt to reach an agreement. They had been scheduled to return to Israel Sunday night, but remained in the Egyptian capital to negotiations into Monday. The fact that they are remaining in Cairo is not an indication of what kind of progress is being made, according to the Prime Minister's Office.

Hamas, which is said to be holding Schalit in Gaza, is demanding the release of more than 400 Palestinian prisoners held in Israeli jails, including some who killed Israelis. Israel wants some of the prisoners, most of whom are from the West Bank, to be exiled to the Gaza Strip or to third countries, according to reports.

Noam, left, and Yoel Schalit sit next to an empty chair that was reserved for Gilad Schalit at a Kabbalat Shabbat ceremony last Friday evening at the Schalit family's protest tent outside the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. Some 40 close and distant relatives of the kidnapped soldier sat around the table for the Shabbat meal.

Schalit was captured in a May 2006 cross-border raid while on patrol duty.

Before the start of Sunday's regular cabinet meeting, expected to be the last of his government, Olmert said: "Over the past three years, we have made unceasing, I would say considerable, wide-ranging and complex efforts on various channels, some of them hidden, most of which were known to two or three people only, this in order to protect the effort being done in order to bring about an agreement that will lead to Gilad Schalit's release.

"All of these channels operated intensively in various places and contexts. The result as of today is that Hamas' position has been far beyond than what even the most moderate of those who have been constantly pushing and pressing to reach a far-reaching agreement with Hamas would have been prepared to accept."

Iran, Hamas express solidarity with Sudan president

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran and the Palestinian militant group Hamas showed their support for Sudan's president last Friday, sending top officials to the Sudanese capital and denouncing the international warrant for his arrest on charges of war crimes in Darfur.

Their visit came as the United Nations human rights group warned that Sudan's expulsion of 13 aid organizations from its Darfur region could also constitute a war crime. Sudan took the step in retaliation after the Netherlands-based International Criminal Court issued a warrant against President Omar al-Bashir on March 11.

The expulsion raised fears of a humanitarian crisis in the large, arid western region, where war has been raging for six years. Some 2.7 million people have been forced from their homes, and many rely on aid groups for food, water, shelter and medical care.

The government also ordered the closure of SUDO, the largest Sudanese non-governmental aid organization operating in Darfur, said SUDO's head, Ibrahim Mudawi. He said the order came late last Thursday, accusing the group of violations of the law, without providing specifics.

SUDO, with about 300 staffers, distributes food and drills water wells in Darfur, as well as operates 13 clinics and provides psychological help, Mudawi said. "We will take legal procedures against this decision," he said. "We are worried [about our staff]. We don't know what they are going to do with them."

The ICC accuses al-Bashir of leading a counter-insurgency campaign against Darfur rebels that included atrocities against civilians. Al-Bashir denies the charges against him and his government refuses to co-operate with the ICC, calling it part of a colonial conspiracy to destabilize Sudan.

Dozens of al-Bashir supporters marched in downtown Khartoum after Friday prayers in support of the president. They waved banners, shouting: "With our blood and soul, we defend you, al-Bashir." The small rally came after al-Bashir joined thousands of supporters demonstrating in the capital last Thursday denouncing the warrant.

Iran's parliamentary speaker, Ali Larijani, arrived in Khartoum along with Moussa Abu Marzouk, the No. 2 figure in Hamas' Damascus-based leadership. Larijani told reporters at the airport that the ICC's arrest warrant is an insult. Also in their delegation were Syria's parliamentary speaker, Mahmoud al-Abrash, and representatives from other Palestinian militant factions.

Iran and Hamas have been longtime allies of al-Bashir, whose government is dominated by Muslim fundamentalists and military officers.

A spokesperson for the UN human rights office said last Friday that the expulsion of the groups may be a war crime and said officials at the agency were looking into the issue.

"To knowingly and deliberately deprive such a huge group of civilians of means to survive is a deplorable act," Rupert Colville said in Geneva. "Humanitarian assistance has nothing to do with the ICC proceedings. To punish civilians because of a decision by the ICC is a grievous dereliction of the government's duty to protect its own people."

"This decision by the government could threaten the lives of thousands of civilians, living in camps in Darfur and elsewhere," he added.

Asked about the comments, a senior Sudanese foreign ministry official, Mutrif Siddique, said only, "Their campaign against us continues."

Siddique said the Sudanese humanitarian affairs ministry, which is responsible for the work of aid agencies, is aware that the expulsion of the organizations will have an impact on people in Sudan.

"This ministry and authorities have made arrangements to avoid a food shortage or a medical crisis," he said. "There will be a partial effect and they [authorities] will work to avoid any shortage."

Siddique claimed that major UN aid agencies were not affected by this expulsion decision and stressed that hundreds of Sudanese NGO workers remain and work in Darfur.

The U.S. State Department condemned the decision to expel the aid groups and urged the Sudanese government to allow the groups to continue operating.

"These organizations provide critical humanitarian assistance to millions of Sudanese, and the forced departure of these organizations immediately and seriously threatens the lives and well-being of displaced populations," said spokesperson Gordon Duguid.

The World Food Program questioned whether the remaining aid groups would be able to fill the gap.

"We simply don't have the capacity to carry out the lifesaving work of the NGOs," said the agency's spokesperson in Geneva, Emilia Casella.

Under the Geneva Conventions, it's illegal to intentionally starve people to death by blocking their access to food. The rule applies to international conflicts, but efforts have been made to incorporate it in customary international humanitarian law, which would carry weight in courts.

Other UN agencies also expressed concern about the consequences of losing their aid partners. The World Health Organization said it would tear a hole in its disease-monitoring efforts, which could lead to outbreaks of infectious diseases going unchecked.

"If they are not helping us do this very vital work, we may see the emergence of infectious diseases," said WHO spokesperson Fadela Chaib.

Arabs resent ICC indictment

By ZVI BAR'EL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — International Criminal Court prosecutor general Luis Moreno Ocampo has issued an indictment against Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir.

The indictment, issued on March 4, made him an instant hero for civil rights activists and the enemy of Arab opponents of "new imperialism."

"Western imperialism left the Islamic countries in the last century after it destroyed them and exploited their wealth through direct conquest, and came back to them via the window of conquest and destruction for its own ends, by means of the legal frameworks it set for itself, such as the International Criminal Court, with the excuse of defending human rights and disseminating justice via western, rather than international, criteria," wrote Saudi publicist Hamad al-Majid in the newspaper Asharq Alawsat.

Is this a western effort to unseat al-Bashir and divide Sudan into three districts, so that the West can rule the country, or is this an indictment of a person accused of genocide, mass murder and sponsoring – perhaps even planning – mass rapes in Darfur?

In Khartoum, the answer is clear. The carnival atmosphere al-Bashir organized for himself after the indictment was publicized was proof of it: there were donkeys bearing the prosecutor's picture and dog puppets with Ocampo's name, and al-Bashir danced to songs that cursed the prosecutor and condemned his supporters.

Al-Bashir seized power in Sudan in 1989 and runs a dictatorial regime of terror there. He does not plan to report to the International Criminal Court. The Sudanese parliament, which he controls, is planning to rule that Sudan may return by any means, even by force, any Sudanese citizen arrested by a foreign power or by an institution Sudan does not recognize. Washington got the hint: Last week, it ordered the reduction of its diplomatic staff in Khartoum.

American experts have been disseminating a proposal to take steps against Sudan, similar to those taken against Iraq, and to forbid flights over the Darfur area in order to prevent Sudanese air attacks. The United States has imposed sanctions on Sudan since the late 1990s, and forbids American companies from doing business there. Sudan's oilfields are currently filled with Chinese firms.

Now Sudan is threatening counter-sanctions: to stop exporting gum arabic to the United States and any country that supports the arrest warrant against al-Bashir. Gum arabic, a resin made from the bark of the Senegalese acacia tree, is used in soft drinks. Sudan produces about 70 per cent of the total world supply.

The arrest warrant aroused major controversy in Arab countries. They are once again perceived as incapable of preventing western intervention into their affairs.

Israeli police officers killed in West Bank attack

JTA

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli police officers were killed in a shooting attack in the Jordan Valley.

A group calling itself the Imad Mugniyeh Group claimed responsibility on Monday for the shooting in an anonymous call to a news agency, Israel Radio reported. Mugniyeh, a Hezbollah terrorist leader, was assassinated last year. Hezbollah blames Israel for the killing, though Israel has never claimed responsibility for the hit.

The men were shot at close range Sunday evening in their patrol car while driving near the settlement of Masua, in the northern West Bank, according to reports. Paramedics tried to resuscitate the victims who were found critically wounded in their overturned car. The two were pronounced dead at the scene.

David Rabinovitch, 42, and Yehezkel Ramzarker, 50, were buried Monday. An Israel Police spokesperson told Ha'aretz that the shots were likely fired by one or more Palestinian gunmen, although no Palestinian group has claimed responsibility.

Police were searching the area for the gunmen.

A 'strategic goal' of toppling Hamas

In response to the proposed deal, Israeli Arab MK Ahmed Tibi urged an international boycott of Lieberman.

"No minister should meet him, especially no Arab minister," Tibi told Reuters.

Under Israeli law, Netanyahu has until April 3 to put together an administration and have it approved by Parliament.

The agreement between Likud and Yisrael Beiteinu elicited swift expressions of concern on the part of European Union officials.

Javier Solana, the European Union's foreign policy chief, suggested that Europe should consider taking steps if the next Israeli government backs away from western-supported peace negotiations on creating a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

"We will be ready to do business as usual, normally with a government in Israel that is prepared to continue talking and working for a two-state solution," Solana said in Brussels. "If that is not the case, the situation would be different."

Lieberman's party won the third-largest number of seats in a Feb. 10 election that saw Israel swing to the right after a 22-day offensive in the Gaza Strip, territory run by Hamas Islamists opposed to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas' peace efforts.

The coalition accord sets a "strategic goal" of toppling Hamas rule in the enclave, going beyond Israel's current aim of halting rocket fire, and could complicate western efforts to reopen Gaza border crossings to vital goods.

Livni has demanded a commitment from Netanyahu to a two-state solution as a condition for joining a coalition. She is also seeking a power-sharing deal by which she and Netanyahu would rotate as prime minister.

Netanyahu wants to shift the focus of peace talks from territorial to economic issues, a plan rejected by Palestinians.

Stay out of internal Arab disputes, Saudi Arabia warns Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Saudi Arabia's top diplomat on Sunday urged Iran to stay out of internal Arab disputes, in particular in Lebanon and among the Palestinians.

Iran's foreign minister made a surprise visit to Saudi Arabia amid rising tensions between the Islamic Republic and the Arab world.

Manouchehr Mottaki was met by his Saudi counterpart, Prince Saud al-Faisal, at Riyadh Air Force base and met later with the Saudi monarch.

The visit came after Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Syria held a mini-summit in Riyadh last week to patch up their differences, which largely revolve around the role of Iran in the region.

Iran supports Islamist movements Hamas and Hezbollah and is often at odds with U.S.-allied Arab regimes in the region. Arab nations such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia are also wary of Iran's nuclear program.

At a news conference Sunday, al-Faisal called for mutual respect between his nation and Iran.

"Although we appreciate the Iranian concern in Arab issues, from our point of view, this should be conducted through the legitimate Arab doorways," he said.

Egypt's Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit accused Iran last week of manipulating Arab states to increase its influence, and Saudi Arabia has called for a unified Arab approach to Iran.

Syria is Iran's closest Arab ally, something Saudi Arabia and Egypt would like to change.

Pope regrets Williamson affair

JTA

ROME — Pope Benedict XVI met with Israeli rabbis last week in a bid to further repair the rift created by the Vatican's relationship to a Holocaust-denying bishop.

The meeting last Thursday with a delegation from Israel's Chief Rabbinate came days after the Pope wrote a letter to bishops admitting errors on how he handled the lifting of Bishop Richard Williamson's excommunication.

"This was not just another meeting," Haifa Chief Rabbi She'ar-Yashuv Cohen, who headed the rabbinical delegation, told reporters. "This was a special experience, a turning point, the end of a crisis. We could not have expected a warmer reception."

During the meeting, according to the Vatican, the Pope told the rabbis that during his May trip to the Holy Land he intended "to pray especially for the precious gift of unity and peace both within the region and for the worldwide human family."

He expressed hope that his visit might "also help to deepen the dialogue of the Church with the Jewish people so that Jews and Christians and also Muslims may live in peace and harmony in this Holy Land."

Pope Benedict XVI admitted in the letter to bishops that his rehabilitation of a Holocaust-denying bishop backfired.

The remarkable letter, whose text was officially released last Thursday by the Vatican, also says the Vatican must become Internet savvy to prevent further mishaps.

Benedict specifically addressed the Jan. 21 lifting of the excommunication order on Bishop Richard Williamson and three other traditionalist bishops, saying it unleashed "an avalanche of protests" whose "bitterness laid bare wounds deeper than those of the present moment."

Lifting the excommunications had been intended to heal a rift in the church. But due to the uproar over Bishop Williamson, the Pope said, it "suddenly appeared as something completely different: as the repudiation of reconciliation between Christians and Jews," and a revocation of the reforms of the Second Vatican Council.

The Pope continued: "A gesture of reconciliation with an ecclesial group engaged in a process of separation thus turned into its very antithesis: an apparent step backwards with regard to all the steps of reconciliation between Christians and Jews taken since the Council – steps which my own work as a theologian had sought from the beginning to take part in and support."

This, Benedict said, he "can only deeply regret."

"I have been told that consulting the information available on the Internet would have made it possible to perceive the problem early on. I have learned the lesson that in the future in the Holy See we will have to pay greater attention to that source of news," the Pope said.

Pontiffs very rarely issue documents admitting errors in such a detailed and personal way. Benedict said he was particularly hurt by the "open hostility" from within the Church itself.

"Precisely for this reason, I thank all the more our Jewish friends, who quickly helped to clear up the misunderstanding and to restore the atmosphere of friendship and trust which – as in the days of Pope John Paul II – has also existed throughout my pontificate and, thank God, continues to exist."

World Jewish Congress president Ronald Lauder praised the Pope.

"The Pope has found clear and unequivocal words regarding Bishop Williamson's Holocaust denial, and he deserves praise for admitting that mistakes were made within the Vatican in the handling of this affair," Lauder said in a statement.

"The Pope's letter conveys the essential requirements for interreligious dialogue: candour and the willingness to tackle difficult issues squarely. His expressed anguish at the events following the Holocaust-denying statements by [Bishop] Williamson reflects the similar emotional pain felt by Jews worldwide during this affair," he said.

"We reciprocate his words of appreciation for Jewish efforts to restore interreligious dialogue and will continue to work with the Catholic Church to further strengthen mutual understanding and respect."

In a related development, Rome Jewish leaders said the pontiff will visit the main synagogue in Rome in the fall.

Israel Briefs

Schalit report denied

Hamas' deputy leader denied reports that he received a videotape of captured Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit. Moussa Abu Marzouk made his denial in an interview last week with the London-based newspaper a-Sharq al-Aws. Marzouk also said he had not been given a letter from the soldier, as had been reported. "I have no information on Schalit," he was quoted in the interview as saying. "I don't know if he's alive or dead. The factions aren't willing to give any information on him." The Kuwaiti newspaper al-Jarida had reported that Marzouk was given a tape and a letter last month by the commander of Hamas' military wing, Ahmad Jabari, during his short trip to Gaza after attending Palestinian reconciliation talks in Egypt. A senior Israeli source had told Israel Radio that the Prime Minister's Office had no knowledge of the video. Schalit was abducted in a cross-border raid in July 2006.

Katsav denies sex charges

Moshe Katsav accused Israeli authorities and the press of a "witch hunt," and emphasized his innocence on sex charges. The former Israeli president blasted Attorney General Menahem Mazuz and the law enforcement establishment during a 2-1/2-hour news conference last week. Mazuz announced that he was ready to indict Katsav on rape and indecent assault charges as well as obstruction of justice. Stressing his innocence, Katsav said authorities and the press were carrying out a "lynch and a witch hunt" against him. Katsav was first accused in 2006 and stepped down as president shortly before his term ended in June 2007. He was replaced by Shimon Peres. Katsav struck a plea deal in June 2007 under which the rape charges would be dropped, but last April he reneged on the deal.

Star producer gives Indie band's EP professional quality

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

The first thing that strikes you about Urban Preacher's debut EP is that it sounds different than most unsigned indie bands' EPs. This isn't a one-person folkie singer-songwriter acoustic disc; it's a full-sounding, polished, almost professional EP. It's anything but unplugged.

"A lot of indie bands are putting out CDs that all sound like indie records," says Jordan Safer, 22, the Toronto band's keyboardist, guitarist and harmonica player. "We wanted to give people value for their money."

To that end, Urban Preacher got George Massenburg to produce the self-titled EP. Massenburg has recorded with Billy Joel, Kenny Loggins, Journey, James Taylor and Linda Ronstadt, and is an adjunct professor with McGill University's department of music research.

It was Massenburg's idea to record this live "off the floor" in the studio, giving the EP a raw, live, powerful feel.

"Everything was done live off the floor in 2-1/2 days," Safer, the group's main songwriter says. "There's no fiddling about, only the backing vocals are dubbed."

The next thing that strikes you is the powerful vocal styles of former New Yorker Myrrhine Faller.

"If you don't have a strong vocalist, you don't have a strong group," Safer says. Without a good singer, no matter how good the song is, "it's not going to get out there."

Faller's voice reminds me at times of Canadian singer Alannah Myles. His soulful voice helps shape the bluesy sound of Urban Preacher. Safer describes the music as "dirty Southern rock." What does that mean? "It has a roots feel and a country feel. It's similar to the Black Crowes," he said of the blues-oriented rock group that sold more than 20 million records.

"We're sort of a cross between [American soul-funk] singer Sharon Jones and the Black Crowes. We're also very influenced by the pedal steel guitar sound of Southern rock like the Allman Brothers."

Safer met vocalist Faller in Montreal, where he was studying political science at McGill University. "I met her through the Montreal music scene. We hit if off, and she became the band's singer right from our first show."

The band went through a revolving door of musicians before Safer moved back to Toronto with Faller and settled with the current six musicians, including a sax player.

Although Safer is the only Jewish member of the band, Urban Preacher does not play on Friday evenings and holidays.

"They're a great group of gentiles," he says, because of their acceptance of his beliefs. Safer recalls meeting Jewish reggae artist Matisyahu who stuck to his beliefs, refusing to play on Shabbat.

"It's all about having core values," he says. "People will always respect that. I'll never forgive myself otherwise."

He says that once, while in another band, he turned down a Friday evening gig with James Brown's backup group.

Since forming a year ago, Urban Preacher has been playing its songs in venues from the Maritimes to Toronto. He says that gigging is one way to stand out in the crowd.

"Live, live, live," he says. "You have to connect with people. We go back and forth between Toronto and the East Coast. We want to be the band that everyone wants to go see."

He says an Urban Preacher gig is high energy and "in your face.

"We make our audience part of the show. Our shows are worth every penny. We encourage our audience to get up and dance. Even if you're making great music, you need to connect with them. If you don't interact with them, they won't remember you. You're a much more sustainable group if you're a good live band first."

The group's EP, recorded in December, has been getting airplay on college radio stations and has charted on MySpace and CD Baby.

The six songs on this EP are a good collection of strong, soulful, bluesy rock songs, and the band is not afraid to throw in a bit of rap here and there.

Urban Preacher is on YouTube with Urban Preacher Promotional Video – a 70-second video clip of the group. Their music is also on the group's myspace.com/urbanpreacher site. The EP is available on itunes.ca.

Urban Preacher is touring the East Coast until March 21, before returning to the Horseshoe Tavern in Toronto for Bookie's Edge102.1FM Nu Music Night on March 24. They also have upcoming gigs in Montreal and Ottawa. Check out their MySpace for dates and venues.

Jordan Safer, left, wails on the harp at the Horseshoe Tavern in Toronto. At right, he's pictured with the rest of Urban Preacher including singer Myrrhine Faller.

Cutting-edge world music group favours Hebrew

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

After only a few moments of hearing Jaffa Road's debut CD Sun Place, listeners of all stripes will likely agree that this fusion band truly plays a world of music.

From Afro-Caribbean jazz and ancient Ladino songs to reggae beats and Arabian grooves, this new group creates an alchemy of distinct tunes.

"Our sound is the sum total of a journey through many musical places and influences," says band founder and composer Aaron Lightstone.

"I believe we have found a fresh and exciting way of blending together a number of musical cultures, with the end result of producing new music that has not been heard before."

In association with the Ashkenaz Foundation and the Small World Music Society, the group will be releasing its inaugural CD at a live gig on March 25 at Lula Lounge in Toronto.

The concert will be recorded by CBC Radio One for a future broadcast.

Beyond their cutting-edge sound, what's particularly different about the group is that although they are a multi-ethnic mosaic of Canadian musicians, many of their tunes are sung in Hebrew.

"Jewishness and love of Hebrew language and culture is the starting point for many of our compositions," says Lightstone, an accredited music therapist raised in Thornhill, Ont.

"What we are doing is part of a renaissance of Jewish and Hebrew culture."

Indeed, with songs like Betzet Yisrael from Psalm 114 and Tiftach Li Et Halayla, adapted from the lyrics of Song of Songs, Jaffa Road is innovating in the annals of nouveau Jewish culture.

The origins of the group can be traced back to Tel Aviv where Lightstone was inspired by Shlomo Bar and Habrera Hateeveet, whom he heard in a small club.

"I wanted to play in a group like that," he recalls.

"So I returned to Canada with the intention to create a world music group with Jewish roots… Over time, I met musicians who were into doing this, too."

Lightstone, who plays the guitar, oud, saz and synthesizer, met quite a troop of fellow musicians.

Multi-lingual lead singer Aviva Chernick is an accomplished cantorial soloist who also acts and dances.

Sax player Sundar Viswanathan is a tenured professor of jazz studies at York University who has performed and recorded around the world with the some of the biggest names in jazz.

Bassist and producer Chris Gartner has performed with such stars as members of the Barenaked Ladies and the Band, and drummer Jeff Wilson, who jams on the Latin and Arabic percussion, has appeared alongside Sultans of String.

The debut CD also features five guest musicians.

Looking to the future, Jaffa Road wants to drive along new routes and build on the momentum that has already steered them well.

"We want to play lots of music, make and sell lots of discs and get our music into some movies," says Lightstone.

"I feel very privileged to work with these people."

Jon Lovitz to reveal 'the true me' in solo show

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

If the real Jon Lovitz had peeked out from behind the characters he has played, Hollywood would have seen the intellect beyond the humour: Saturday Night Live's Chanukah Harry might have waxed poetic about Jewish morals and The Critic's Jay Sherman could have dissected the Israeli elections.

In fact, Toronto and Ottawa audiences will see the real Lovitz during his Ontario stand-up tour – he'll perform at Ottawa's Centrepointe Theatre on March 20 and then visit Toronto's Panasonic Theatre on March 22.

In an interview with The CJN, Lovitz, 52, said his solo act will show a tell-like-it-is side to his personality. "The whole act is the true me and how I think," Lovitz says from his Los Angeles home. "I talk about everything from [actor and comedian] Bob Saget to sex."

Audiences can expect a mix of Jewish humour and topical riffing, plus a few attacks on the hot-button issues of today such as gay marriage. But don't come to Lovitz's act hoping to see one-liner SNL characters such as Tommy "Yeah, that's the ticket" Flanagan.

"I once tried doing all those SNL bits, but it just didn't work," Lovitz admits.

But what does work, judging by a conversation with Lovitz, is infusing the comedy with an intellect the public don't see from the actor who appears on their television sets plugging Subway sandwiches.

When asked about his associations with the Jewish faith, Lovitz launches into a theory of how Jews may not necessarily be the Chosen People. Rather, the Jewish people chose their own path."It's not a race but a religion, because people can choose to be Jewish," he says. "It's a way of thinking, a way of respecting all living creatures."

Lovitz says his mind has been wrestling with intriguing philosophies on religion because he's been reading a book focusing on Jewish morality.

Wait. Jewish morality from the actor behind SNL's The Devil and Master Thespian?

"You have to be smart to have a sense of humour," Lovitz declares. "It's inherent in the Jewish culture. Education is valued in our people, and so is intelligence. And to phrase truths you have to be brimming with that kind of intellect."

The comedian is no stranger to finding the truth behind the joke, playing not just laugh-heavy roles in his 40-plus films but also more thoughtful characters, such as a baseball scout in A League of Their Own and a lingering ex-husband in I Could Never Be Your Woman. But one of the main highlights of Lovitz's career, according to the thespian himself?

"I loved working on City Slickers II," he says, "because I got to be with Billy Crystal, Jack Palance, some fine actors."

These days, Lovitz isn't diving into movie roles as he once did, instead focusing on his standup tours and planning to open his own comedy club in Los Angeles in the next few months. He also finds time to relax by playing tennis and golf.

It will be interesting to see who emerges onstage during his Toronto and Ottawa gigs – the comedian quick to deliver the one-liners and insightful theories on daily living or the chin-stroking philosopher with more than a few footnotes on Jewish history. If we're lucky, we'll see a combination of both.

Lovitz performs at the Centrepoint Theatre in Ottawa on March 20, and the Panasonic Theatre in Toronto on March 22. For tickets to the Toronto show, call 416-872-1212; for the Ottawa show, call 613-580-2700.

Spring in the City of Brotherly Love

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

Philadelphia blooms in spring.

The city bursts into renewed life with its annual flower show. The oldest exhibit of its kind in America, the Philadelphia Flower Show attracts masses of people to view the latest in garden design, or, at the very least, to purchase fresh bunches of pussy willows.

Sunshine warms the venerable old cityscape, especially the clutch of 18th-century buildings on Independence Mall, where Thomas Jefferson penned the Declaration of Independence in 1776. The Liberty Bell – a cracked but ever-potent object – is housed in its own building. And across the street, a new and exciting project is underway: a new National Museum of American Jewish History (NMAJH), slated for completion in 2010.

The Jewish community has deep roots in Philadelphia, says Jay Nachman, my guide to the NMAJH in its current headquarters, at 55 North 5th St. It all began with Mikveh Israel, known as the "Synagogue of the Revolution." In 1738, a merchant named Nathan Levy applied to the family of William Penn, Royal Proprietors of Pennsylvania, for a piece of ground to bury his child in accordance with Jewish ritual. A larger burial ground "for several Jews" was granted in 1740. During the War of Independence, Jews from elsewhere in the colony sought refuge in Philadelphia, where many joined the revolutionary fight.

The freedom offered by the new republic is underscored by a letter in the synagogue's archives, written by George Washington, guaranteeing freedom of religion. Ben Franklin pledged a generous five pounds ($800 in today's U.S. dollars) to the congregation. Over time, people moved on, and synagogues were built in other parts of the city, but during the celebratory 1976 Bicentennial Year, the city's first synagogue was reborn. Its bicentennial service, in the Sephardi tradition, echoed those given more than 200 years previously, with the omission, naturally, of references to King George.

The archive-rich museum shares a lobby with Mikveh Israel, but has long outgrown its quarters, hence the solid support for a new 100,000-square-foot space at 5th and Market streets, facing the Liberty Bell. The new five-storey building will house archives, permanent and visiting exhibitions, an auditorium and educational facilities. It was designed by architect James Polshek and his team to resemble two interlocking volumes, linked by a light-filled atrium: "Where freedom was born, a museum that celebrates Jewish freedom."

Moreover, the spirit of this museum is uniquely American. As Nachman says, "People hear the word 'Jewish' but they don't hear the word 'American.'" Yet Jews have been vitally present in America for more than 350 years. The Philadelphia community, one of the largest in the country, established an important early publishing centre and is renowned as the home of philanthropist Rebecca Gratz, founder of the nation's first Hebrew Sunday school.

The current exhibit in NMAJH, Shaping Space, Shaping Meaning, challenges visitors to determine what the new museum, one block south of the current space, will offer. What, for example, should be the tone of the texts that accompany colourful individuals (from 1654 to the present) in the core exhibition?

Contemporary issues are addressed in Drawing the Line, which underscores the need for continuing dialogue by posing a series of provocative questions, from the oddball-sounding, "Are Jews white?" to core queries, including "Does anti-Semitism exist in America?" and "Is Israel the homeland for all Jews?" Visitors contribute their views on file cards, reminded that "there are no right answers, only discussions." Their answers appear under each question, divided into categories: "yes," "no," and "um."

In the museum's new headquarters, icons of American liberty – Independence Mall, the Liberty Bell – will provide visual reminders of historical context for the American Jewish story, told through a collection of objects that includes Franklin's works, translated into Yiddish.

Can't wait for the new museum to be completed? No worries, there's no bad time to visit the City of Brotherly Love. After adding your views to the current exhibit-discussion, take a walk around the old quarter for more glimpses into the past, including flag-maker Betsy Ross' house and Elfreth's Alley, one of the oldest continuously inhabited streets in America. And no one put the "LOVE" into 20th-century Philly like sculptor Robert Indiana, whose LOVE sculpture adorns John F. Kennedy Park, behind the city's stunningly ornate city hall. Commissioned for the 1976 bicentennial, Indiana's sculpture draws a steady stream of visitors who pose for photos in front of it. While snapping "Love" photos of a native Philadelphian and her visiting friend, I notice the direct line between the park and the Philadelphia Museum of Art. Ben Franklin Parkway stretches between them, "just like the Champs-Elysees," boasts the girl from Philly.

The Museum of Art, a stunning neoclassical structure, was made famous around the world by movie star Sylvester Stallone when, as prize fighter Rocky Balboa, he ran up its vast staircase, pumping his fists in the air. "On a warm day like this," my new friend tells me, "you'll see lots of people running up the steps." She was right. The Rocky statue on ground level draws its share of fist pumpers, while fitter Philadelphians run up the main or "Rocky Steps" to impersonate the underdog winner, just like in the movie. On a sunny morning, the walk from Love Park to the museum offers its own highlights; in addition to great views and flags from all nations, there are important works of art. At 17th and Ben Franklin, stands the city's imposing Holocaust Memorial, designed in 1964 by sculptor Nathan Rapoport.

Close to central Philly, the Washington Square neighbourhood features row after charming row of brick townhouses. Follow Spruce or Pine Street eastward to Society Hill, where, near Dock Street and the Delaware River, you'll find Philly's favourite new restaurant, Zahav, an Israeli import.

In a time when even renowned eateries seem to be having trouble attracting recession-weary patrons, this brainchild of partners Steve Cook and chef Michael Solomonov is bustling. Esquire Magazine calls it "one of the best 20 new restaurants in America," with a cuisine fashioned after Solomonov's native Israel. To prepare for this radical experiment in fresh, tapas-style eating, the staff visited Israel to sample the real thing.

Meals are "kosher-inspired," says manager Elon Gigi, who arrived in Philly from Ashdod, Israel, 4-1/2 half years ago. Servers, clad in desert-chic short-sleeved khaki shirts over T-shirts with Hebrew lettering, are kept busy describing house specialties that include four spicy condiments, from mild to "wow," extra-creamy hummus with oven-hot flatbread, as well as eclectic choices such as Moroccan lamb and Bulgarian roasted red peppers.

The room is high-ceilinged and airy, and Israeli music plays in the background. Multitudes of dishes arrive, designed to be shared by the whole table. Zahav's tasty fare includes a remarkable version of fried cauliflower that Elon tells me was named "dish of the year" by a major American food magazine. The success of this new kid on the block, in the heart of the historic waterfront district, marks yet another chapter in the evolving narrative of Jewish culture in Philadelphia.

Crossing the yellow-taped line into mystery territory

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Toronto lawyer and writer Robert Rotenberg has produced a credible "police procedural" murder mystery called Old City Hall that is set in Toronto and features the famous building of the title – now home to an array of criminal courtrooms – as an iconic centrepiece of the story.

Rotenberg's debut novel focuses on Kevin Brace, a leading radio personality who commands a million-dollar salary.

Bright and early one winter morning, he answers the door of his lakefront condominium and tells his newspaper delivery man, "I killed her." Inside, his wife lies dead in the bathtub, victim of a stabbing.

Robert Rotenberg

Officer Daniel Kennicott and his partner, Nora Bering, soon arrive at the crime scene, which they secure for Detective Ari Greene and the other operatives who will follow. From there the story proceeds in bite-sized chapters that detail the activities of a motley crew of crime professionals who variously investigate the murder, divine its forensics, prosecute or defend the chief suspect, make backroom deals in the corridors of justice, and write sensational newspaper stories about the killing.

Rotenberg is an insider to the legal system and an expert guide in the machinations of justice as it is carried on in that Queen Street landmark familiarly known to his colleagues as "the Hall." He also clearly enjoys showing off the colourful neighbourhoods and locales of Toronto, whose residents he depicts correctly as representing a diverse range of ethnic and national backgrounds. Locations include Gryfe's Bakery, the Don Jail, the Islands, The Bay on Queen Street and Vesta Lunch on Bathurst Street.

The story takes place between the dead of winter and the arrival of summer. The city is caught in the grip of Maple Leaf fever as its once-glorious hockey team holds steady through the playoffs to capture the eternally elusive Stanley Cup. Yes – the Stanley Cup. As with various aspects of the story, readers are required to suspend their disbelief.

Since murder mysteries have become a staple of modern popular literature, an author would have to get up pretty early in the morning to outwit the modern reader. Unfortunately, Rotenberg ties up his story with a series of revelations that the attentive reader could have guessed at the outset. One is left feeling slightly manipulated because of the prior omission of various pieces of key information. When the police and legal prosecutors take Brace's initial confession at face value, the reader senses that they are inept. The author treads a fine line between skilful storytelling and advancing the tale with annoying little baby-steps of plot.

In its promotional copy, publisher Simon and Schuster Canada promotes Rotenberg as the latest in a succession of famed lawyers-turned-suspense writers such as Scott Turow and John Grisham. The jacket copy asserts that Rotenberg does for Toronto what Leonard Elmore does for Florida, Ian Rankin does for Edinburgh, and Turow for Chicago. (The jury is still out.)

Further, the publisher has scored an international publishing coup by selling rights to Old City Hall in the United States, Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Spain, Russia, Japan and Israel. Whether the book actually deserves all this hype and attention, time alone will tell. Certainly there are no great characters in its pages, nor any lofty truths, and it evokes no grand emotions whatsoever.

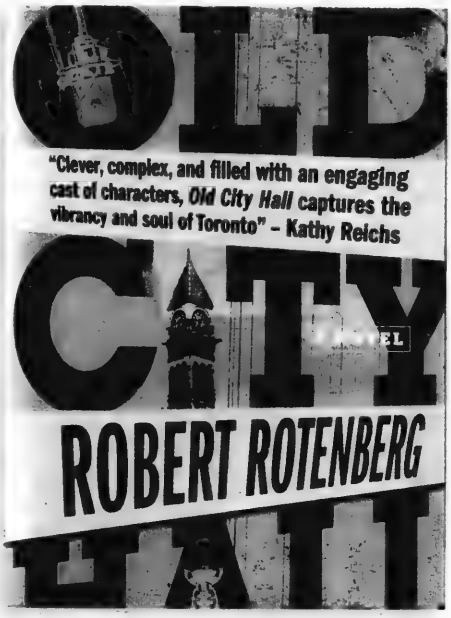
I read an insightful comment recently to the effect that there are more people interested in writing books today than there are people interested in reading them. The crafting of murder mysteries seems to have a particular allure.



OLD
"Clever, complex, and filled with an engaging cast of characters, Old City Hall captures the vibrancy and soul of Toronto" – Kathy Reichs
CITY

Years ago, when I edited books for a leading pulp-fiction publisher in Toronto, my senior editor allowed an unruly pyramid of manuscripts to accumulate behind his desk until it nearly reached the ceiling. I used to get $50 or $75 to read the more promising of these manuscripts and produce a one-page plot synopsis. I read two manuscripts a day.

Today, as then, there seems to be no end of aspiring mystery novelists. People seem to think it is a glamorous occupation, but probably less than one per cent of the aspirants ever see their work into print. Those who do often capitalize on their success do this by writing a series based upon a single detective. The most famous example in Canada is Howard Engel, whose books involving Jewish detective Benny Cooperman have become a beloved addition to Canadian literature.

Here are a few other notable examples. Honour Among Men, a new Inspector Green mystery by Barbara Fradkin, was published a while ago by Rendezvous Crime Books. Fradkin is an accomplished writer whose previous novel, Fifth Son, won the Arthur Ellis Award for Best Crime Novel. This latest novel takes place in Ottawa and Yugoslavia, and involves the same police inspector, now solving a 10-year-old mystery involving a Canadian peacekeeping unit.

Toronto lawyer-writer Morley Torgov has already produced a number of well-received novels, including A Good Place to Come From (1974) and The War to End All Wars (1998). Torgov recently ventured into crime writing with Murder in A-Major, the first in an anticipated series of Inspector Hermann Preiss mysteries. As Dusseldorf's top detective in the mid-19-th century, Preiss is called upon to solve a case involving the famed musical couple, Robert and Clara Schumann. Murder in A-Major is published by Rendezvous Crime Books.

Some years back, Winnipeg writer Allan Levine produced a series of mystery novels featuring a Jewish detective who prowled Winnipeg's seedy north end. Last year he came out with the first in a new series. In Evil of the Age: The Charles St. Clair Chronicles, Levine introduced a gumshoe journalist named Charles St. Clair who attempts to solve a murder in New York in the 1870s. The book was published by Heartland Associates. Knowing Levine's reputation as one of our most prolific scribes, he's probably finished a sequel by now.

Israel lobbies Chavez to curb anti-Semitism in Venezuela

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has embarked on an intensive diplomatic campaign to persuade Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez to rein in a recent wave of anti-Semitic attacks against Venezuela's Jews.

Over the past two weeks, Israel's Foreign Ministry has asked 15 different countries that maintain ties with both Israel and Venezuela to take high-level action on this issue. The use of international intermediaries is necessary, because Venezuela severed diplomatic ties with Israel and expelled all its diplomats about a month ago, in response to Israel's recent military operation in Gaza.

"There has been a significant outbreak of anti-Semitism there, and we wanted to send messages to Venezuela's president through several different channels in order to clarify the gravity with which we view the situation," a senior government source said. "We wanted them to know that in Israel's view, Chavez is responsible for the Jewish community's welfare."

Two of the countries whose assistance Israel requested are Argentina and Brazil, both of whose presidents subsequently called Chavez and relayed Israel's message. Another is Russia, and a fourth is Spain, whose foreign minister, Miguel Moratinos, is due to visit the Venezuelan capital, Caracas, soon. In addition to passing on Israel's message, Moratinos has agreed to meet with leaders of the local Jewish community.

Israeli officials believe that the strong messages have begun to have an impact on Chavez's government: Venezuelan police recently arrested several suspects in the recent anti-Semitic attacks. However, there is still great fear among Venezuela's Jewish community, which numbers some 15,000 people.

Members of the Caracas Jewish community, who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals, told Ha'aretz that Chavez has thus far given tacit backing to the growing anti-Semitism, and he could also stop it if he so desired, by giving the necessary orders to his security services. "There's an atmosphere of intimidation against the Jews," said one.

During the Gaza operation, the largest synagogue in Caracas was vandalized by unknown assailants, and several Jews were physically attacked. Earlier this month, a bomb was thrown at the Jewish community centre in Caracas. In response to growing public criticism of such incidents within his own country, Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro made a well-publicized visit last month to the synagogue that was attacked.

Australia threatens to quit 'Durban II' anti-racism meet

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Australia threatened last Thursday to withdraw from a UN conference on racism next month unless the wording of a document it considers anti-Semitic is dropped or substantially altered.

Israel and Canada have already withdrawn from the April 20 to 24 World Conference Against Racism in Geneva, amid fears Arab nations will use it to criticize Israel.

The United States has also said it will not attend the conference unless the wording of the final declaration is altered radically. Israel is calling for a boycott of the event.

"If we form the view that the text is going to lead to nothing more than an anti-Jewish, anti-Semitic harangue, an anti-Jewish propaganda exercise, Australia will not be in attendance," Foreign Minister Stephen Smith told Parliament.

In related developments, European Union countries last week stepped up their opposition to Muslim attempts to shield Islam from criticism and attack Israel through the UN conference on racism.

EU members were unusually outspoken in appearances before the UN Human Rights Council, saying that they were worried about preparations for the global racism conference to be held next month because attention was being diverted from the real problems of racial discrimination.

"I am deeply disturbed by the turn this event is taking," Dutch Foreign Affairs Minister Maxime Verhagen said.

"The thematic world conference is used by some to try to force their concept of defamation of religions and their focus on one regional conflict on all of us," Verhagen told the 47-member council.

References to Israel and protection of religion in the current draft conclusion being negotiated for the so-called "Durban II" conference are unacceptable, Verhagen said.

"We cannot accept any text which would put religion above individuals, not condemn discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, condone anti-Semitism or single out Israel," he said. Denmark, Germany, Belgium and Italy voiced similar concerns.

Islamic countries, still angry over cartoons and films attacking Muslims, have been campaigning for wording that would equate criticism of a religious faith with a violation of human rights. The informal negotiations have proven difficult with many issues that marred the first UN conference on racism in 2001 re-emerging – such as criticism of Israel.

The April meeting is designed to review progress in fighting racism since the global body's first such conference eight years ago in Durban, South Africa. That 2001 meeting was dominated by clashes over the Middle East and the legacy of slavery, and particularly marred by attacks on Israel and anti-Israel demonstrations at a parallel conference of non-governmental organizations.

Davis Cup win lifts Israel to record 8th in world rankings

By OREN KESSLER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In the wake of its 3-2 victory against Sweden on March 8, Israel climbed to a record eighth spot in International Tennis Federation rankings this month, ahead of the Czech Republic, Australia and even France, which came in 12th. Unfortunately, Russia, Israel's competitor in its next Davis Cup match, was once again ranked first.

While the Israel Tennis Association (ITA) weighs whether to hold the July match against Russia at the National Tennis Center in Ramat Hasharon or Tel Aviv's Nokia Arena, the star of the victorious series in Sweden made no bones about his preference.

"Only Ramat Hasharon. We're not even thinking about Nokia. There's no reason to play against the Russians indoors – we love Ramat Hasharon," Harel Levy told Israeli media.

Levy was given a hero's welcome the day after winning the fifth and decisive match in Malmo, Sweden against Andreas Vinciguerra to give his team a ticket to the quarter-finals for the first time in more than 20 years.

In the new rankings, Russia edged out rival powerhouses Spain, which boasts none other than world No. 1 Rafael Nadal, and the United States, with Andy Roddick.

Russia is led by Marat Safin – a former world No. 1 currently ranked 25 – and Nikolay Davydenko, ranked 28, although Safin is weighing retirement and may bow out before his team lands at Ben-Gurion Airport. Rounding out the team are Mikhail Youzhny and Teimuraz Gabashvili.

The ITA is reportedly concerned about the effect of the July heat on spectators, and is mulling a move to the indoor home of the Maccabi Tel Aviv basketball team. The arena also has nearly twice the capacity of the tennis centre, whose centre court, known as Canada Stadium, has 6,000 seats.

Levy given a hero's welcome

Michael Klein, the head of the tennis governing body, said: "It is the ITA's intention to hold an in-depth meeting over achieving optimal conditions for both players and fans. The goal is to give everyone a great tennis experience, with consideration towards weather conditions."

While other factors are presumably at play – ticket revenues and relations between the ITA and stadium authorities – Klein says giving fans a comfortable experience remains a top priority. "No non-professional considerations will lead to one decision or another, only the comfort of the fans," he said.

The surface at Ramat Hasharon is considered hard by world standards, a feature that plays to the advantage of Israeli competitors who are already used to it. The tough surface and even tougher crowd have earned the venue the nickname "Israhell" among visiting players.

Harel Levy

Russia's team, by contrast, is used to playing in arenas, as poor weather in that country often demands that matches be moved indoors.

Thousands protest Israel-Sweden match

JTA

STOCKHOLM — Thousands of people demonstrated against Israel during a Davis Cup match in Sweden.

About 6,000 protesters gathered on March 7, outside the matches' venue in Malmo. Some 1,000 police kept the demonstrators, many of whom tried to storm the arena, under control. Five protesters were arrested for throwing rocks. Violence also continued elsewhere in the city.

Spectators were barred from watching the Davis Cup play because the city said it could not guarantee the Israeli players' safety, with only about 300 to 400 media representatives, sponsors and guests in attendance, according to reports.

The decision to bar spectators came shortly after the United Arab Emirates refused to issue a visa to Israeli tennis standout Shahar Pe'er for a Dubai tournament last month.

"In almost every respect, the events of the past week in Sweden are a sad moment for tennis, for sports in general, and certainly for Israel. Never in my career as an athlete have I encountered such hatred and such blend of sports and politics," Israeli doubles tennis star Andy Ram said on Ynetnews last week. He added that he has never seen such tight security.

Israel defeated Sweden, 3-2, on March 8 to advance to the Davis Cup quarter-finals. In the decisive match, Harel Levy outlasted Andreas Vinciguerra in five sets in a battle that lasted 3-1/2 hours.

God can wait

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

Writing in the National Post a few weeks back, Christian television host Michael Coren and University of Western Ontario professor Ian Hunter argued that the recession might very well bring people back to God.

The Church, Coren argued, "will be at the forefront of caring and coping in all this mess." And Hunter mused that "God's economy somehow works in... mysterious way[s]." The recession, wrote Coren, "might force us, perhaps kicking and screaming, to re-evaluate the meaning of life, the universe and the banking system."

On the flip side, the liberal magazine New Scientist warned recently that an economic drought is the worst time to start thinking irrationally. In a February editorial titled "The credit crunch could be a boon for irrational belief," the magazine's editors noted that "when human beings lose control over their lives, they become more prone to superstition, spiritual searchings and conspiracy theories." This could produce an unfortunate outcome: "In a recession, or any other time of uncertainty, you are more likely to make bad decisions" – and by "bad decisions," New Scientist means turning toward religion for answers.

Call me skeptical, but I'm not inclined to believe either the pro- or the anti-religion sides in this debate. Each party, it seems, is just using the latest headlines to further their very aggressive agendas. These responses to the market's collapse are, if anything, entirely predictable.

Religious leaders simply need to keep two documents on file – one that blames human beings when things go bad, and another that praises God when things are good. The atheists have it even easier: they only need to hold on to the one that restates the irrationality of a higher being, and simply edit it for content, depending on the latest developments. Has anyone stopped to consider that the recession might not have anything to do with God, one way or the other?

It's odd that religious leaders who so often wax poetic about "free will" and the beauty of a God who allows his people to make their own decisions are now convinced that market turmoil is a wake-up call from a higher being. And it's equally strange that the rationalists who would have us believe that humanity sinks and swims on its own merits (or lack thereof) are warning us not to look for meaning in a collapse caused by the worst forms of human greed and consumption.

Which is to say that both theories are a serious reach. Sometimes a recession is just a recession.

Coren and Hunter, and the people at New Scientist, are playing on human emotion. Note their language: Coren says that what humanity needs is "caring and coping in all this mess." New Scientist argues that we have lost "control over [our] lives." This is the language of fear, carefully worded to evince catastrophe and panic.

Don't let these words ensnare you. Getting trapped in this war of attrition is the worst thing you can do right now. Far better would be to get your personal affairs in order and simply wait for the markets to turn again, as they inevitably will. My advice: leave the philosophizing about the larger meaning of shrinking pensions and portfolios to someone else.

Frankly, all of this hemming and hawing – this bigger-picture meditation – looks bad on both the religious and rationalist camps. The important thing right now isn't to win the war for God or no-God, but to work our way out of this jam and do the best we can to learn from the mistakes that led to the financial crisis. God can wait, or simply continue to not exist, depending on your worldview.

CAULIFLOWER-LEEK KUGEL W ALMOND-HERB CRUST

8 c cauliflower florets (from 2 med.cauliflower)
4 c coarsely chopped leeks (from 3 lg. leeks)
6 tblsp olive oil
6 tblsp matzo meal
1/2 c chopped parsley
1 1/2 tsp salt
1/3 c almonds, toasted, chopped
3 lg eggs
1/2 c chopped dill
1/2 tsp black pepper

Cook cauliflower in large pot of boiling salted water, about 10 min. Drain; transfer to large bowl; mash coarsely. Heat 3 tblsp oil in skillet over medium-high heat. Add leeks; sauté about 5 min. Add leek mixture to cauliflower. Mix in matzo meal. Beat eggs; add 1 tblsp. parsley, 1 tblsp. dill, salt, pepper; mix well. Stir into cauliflower mixture. Brush large baking dish with 1 tblsp. oil. Pour in cauliflower mixture. Mix almonds, remaining parsley, dill, 2 tblsp oil in medium bowl. Sprinkle evenly over kugel. Preheat oven to 350°F. Bake kugel uncovered until set in center, about 35 min. Let stand 10 min. to set.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

PASSOVER SEDER CIRCA 1924

This photo, taken in a home on Gladstone Avenue in Toronto around 1924, shows my great-grandparents, Davis and Blumah Alexander (at the head of the table), and some of their 13 children with spouses and some grandchildren. Cohen, Kendall, Kigg and Lester are some of the families represented. Several in the photo are still with us, including Nina Kendall (Zlotkin), Phyllis Lester (Bryce), and Rose Gould Cohen, third from right, who recently reached the age of 100.

A standing ovation for Jewish campus staff

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I was privileged and honoured to sit in on a Hillel staff meeting at the University of Toronto's Wolfond Centre during Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW). My task was to give what is called chizuk, or strength, to those around the table, as it had been a difficult week.

I sat next to Zac Kaye, the director of Hillel and a steadfast and visionary leader. I looked out at all the campus staff members (about 15 of them) responsible for York University, Ryerson University and, of course, U of T.

I felt privileged and honoured to be part of that meeting, because I felt privy to something significant going on in the world – and everyone likes to sit next to important and courageous people.

I listened closely to the reporting. By then, I had read so much about IAW – much of it hyperbole – that hearing about this shameful event first hand, from individuals who had been eyewitnesses to it, was enlightening. I metaphorically put down the daily newspaper filled with sensationalism and listened to hear something authentic.

Around the table we went. A representative from one of the Jewish campuses (I will leave names out for security reasons) said that Jewish students were feeling intimidated on campus, especially during IAW.

Another staff said that a lot of IAW is well-organized and well thought through, and that there is a need to be concerned about its level of sophistication.

An entire spectrum of thought and opinion emanated from the meeting, reflecting fear of growing anti-Semitism on campus and the belief that Jewish students have friends everywhere. I was fascinated.

Mostly, however, I was proud of the people who were speaking. I realized as the meeting moved on that the people sitting next to me were walking the walk of activism – actually fighting the fight – and that they're integral for the preparation that's required for a 12-round battle against anti-Semitism.

Then came my turn to speak.

I told the staff that we in the community recognize the courage it takes to be a Jewish community worker on campus nowadays. I let them know that we know they are on the front lines of combatting anti-Semitism and are wading into perilous waters. "This has not gone unnoticed," I said.

I told my bold colleagues that we feel for them, knowing that they're taking the punches and under stress from forces both within the community and outside of it. I reported to them that Jews everywhere – Holocaust survivors and rabbis, as well as men, women and children up and down the Bathurst Street corridor, above Steeles and below Bloor Street – are indebted to them for their gallant leadership.

On behalf of the Canadian Jewish community, I say to campus staff and students thank you for your eternal vigilance as Jews and accolades for choosing community work as your livelihood, knowing the risks that come with it.

Unfortunately, you are now witnesses to the "oldest hatred": anti-Semitism. Your perception as Jews has likely changed, but today you are seasoned professionals, more so than yesterday. We need you. Let there be no mistake about that. We need you.

So as we forge ahead during these days when all Jews need to be awake and active, we listen closely to you on ways to stymie the hatred and on how to be strong when the night sets in and arrows of hatred are shot at us. We look to you for guidance and pledge support, in any way required.

Well done! May God always protect you, as well as Jews everywhere and all good people of the world. May the darkness you have come to see turn into light and let unity reign. Am Yisrael chai! The Nation of Israel shall live!

Montreal rabbi alarmed for Venezuela's Jews

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Montreal rabbi has returned from a 24-hour visit to Caracas, Venezuela, convinced that its small Jewish community is in danger and that the Canadian government must intervene.

Rabbi Adam Scheier of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim made the whirlwind trip with Rabbi Avi Weiss of New York and Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld of Washington, D.C., both of Amcha – The Coalition for Jewish Concerns, at the invitation of Venezuela's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Pynchas Brener.

Rabbi Scheier described Caracas' 15,000 Jews as "besieged" and said he's convinced President Hugo Chavez's government is to blame for recent attacks on Jewish communal institutions and is orchestrating an anti-Semitic campaign.

Rabbi Scheier said community members told him they are afraid and feel they are at risk for more "government-sponsored" persecution and violence. "They were very honest and open about the fear they are experiencing," he said, and they believe that Chavez is behind it.

"Nothing happens in Venezuela without Chavez's blessing."

He said they pleaded with the visiting rabbis to make their plight known and to urge their governments to act.

Rabbi Scheier visited the two Jewish institutions targeted this year: a synagogue that was vandalized and ransacked in January, and a community centre damaged by an explosive last month. He also spent time at the Hebraica School, which was raided by armed government agents in November 2004 on the pretext that they were looking for weapons.

Rabbi Adam Scheier embraces students at the Hebraica School in Caracas, which was raided by the Chavez government in 2004.

Please see related story on page 51

Nothing was found, Rabbi Scheier said, and the community views this incident as a turning point: the beginning of a state-sanctioned campaign to "terrify" the community.

The following month, Chavez delivered a Christmas Eve speech denouncing "the descendants of those who crucified Christ" who have "taken possession of the riches of the world."

Relations between Venezuela and Israel soured during Israel's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon in 2006, and Venezuela cut diplomatic ties with Israel after the Gaza conflict at the end of last year. Chavez, who came to power in 1999, has strengthened relations with Iran and the Arab world.

On the day he was there, Rabbi Scheier saw a newspaper with a front-page cartoon depicting a concentration camp with an Israeli soldier guarding it, reminiscent of the Nazi era. An accompanying article was headlined "The extermination of the Palestinian people continues."

Community mourns Hadassah-WIZO president

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — March 22 was to be an opportunity to celebrate Terry Schwarzfeld's recent election as the 20th national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) at a brunch in her honour. Instead, on March 20, she was honoured posthumously at a funeral attended by nearly 800 people.

Schwarzfeld succumbed to injuries she suffered during a brutal attack while vacationing in Barbados.

Along with her daughter-in-law, Luana Cotsman of Guelph, Ont., who is recovering from her injuries, Schwarzfeld was severely beaten Feb. 28 while the pair was walking along an isolated stretch of beach in the late afternoon. They were approached by a would-be robber, and when they told him they had nothing to give him, he attacked them with a piece of wood.

Terry Schwarzfeld

Schwarzfeld was taken to a hospital in Barbados, then airlifted to Ottawa Hospital, where she remained unconscious until she died on March 18. As yet, no one has been arrested for the attack.

The Ottawa Chevra Kadisha funeral parlour was not nearly large enough for the hundreds of people expected to attend Schwarzfeld's funeral. In fact, even the sanctuary of Agudath Israel Congregation couldn't contain the standing-room only crowd. Chairs had to be set up in the shul's foyer to allow the overflow crowd to view the ceremony on closed-circuit television.

The funeral was presided over jointly by Rabbi Charles Popky of Agudath Israel, where Schwarzfeld had been, until recent months, executive director, and Rabbi Steven Garten of Temple Israel, where Schwarzfeld and her family were members.

Anti-Zionists Speak

EDMONTON — A pro-Palestinian group invited anti-Zionist Neturei Karta rabbi Yisroel Dovid Weiss and U.S. history professor Norton Mezviny to speak at a free conference held earlier this week in Edmonton titled Zionism Exposed. A spokesperson for the International Palestine Awareness Committee told the Edmonton Sun that the event aimed to show "there's a big difference between Zionism and Judaism" and that "Zionism is a form of extremism." Gayle Tallman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, said the speakers are from "the furthest fringes of Judaism" and that the event would cause a rift between the city's Jewish and Arab communities.

Groups Criticized

TORONTO — More than 150 Jewish Canadians – including prominent names such as Ursula Franklin, Anton Kuerti and Judy Rebick – released a statement last week that said the mainstream Jewish community's alleged effort to suppress criticism of Israel recalls McCarthyism in the 1950s and deflects attention from what they call Israel's war crimes in Gaza. The group also alleged that B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress have tried "to silence criticism of Israel" on university campuses and in unions, and that Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney and Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff "unquestioningly echo" their views.

WORLD

Mason Defends Word

NEW YORK — Jackie Mason called U.S. President Barack Obama a "schvartze" during a performance in New York City, angering some audience members. The website TMZ reported March 15 that Mason used the term, which means "black" in Yiddish but is considered derogatory by some, during a show at Feinstein's at Loews Regency on March 12. "I'm an old Jew. I was raised in a Jewish family where 'schvartze' was used," Mason told TMZ. "It's not a demeaning word and I'm not going to defend myself."

Grants For Education

SAN FRANCISCO — A San Francisco foundation will provide millions of dollars in emergency grants for Jewish education in response to the recession. The Jim Joseph Foundation said last week that it would provide Jewish federations in the San Francisco Bay Area, Los Angeles, Washington, Boston and Boston's North Shore with funding for need-based scholarships and subsidies for children attending Jewish schools and summer camps over the next two years. The money will be distributed through local federations. "These grants are meant to make the difference between kids being able to afford to go to Jewish school and camp, and not going," said Alvin Levitt, the foundation's president. In each year of the grant, the foundation will give Boston up to $2 million; San Francisco, up to $1.75 million; Los Angeles and Washington up to $1.25 million; and Boston's North Shore, up to $250,000.

Rescue Plan In Peril

NEW YORK — Jewish aid officials are worried that a secret operation to take imperiled Jews out of Yemen could be in jeopardy after news of the effort was made public in the Israeli press. In the weeks since a Yemenite Jew was murdered by a Muslim in the northern Yemen city of Raida, Jewish groups have sped up their efforts to get Yemen's 280 or so remaining Jews out of the country, where anti-Jewish hostility appears to be on the rise after Israel's war in Gaza. So far, Yemen's president has taken several steps to protect Jews in his country. About three weeks ago, the Jewish Agency for Israel said it had brought 10 Jews to Israel, while the United Jewish Communities has been working secretly to arrange for 113 Yemenite Jews to come to the United States. The operation was a joint effort of the Satmar community of Rockland County, N.Y., as well as the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, UJA-Federation of New York and the U.S. State Department.

Pistons Owner Dies

DETROIT—Bill Davidson, owner of the Detroit Pistons basketball team and a major philanthropist, died March 13 at his home near Detroit at age 86. Among his gifts, Davidson and his wife, Karen, gave $75 million in 2007 to build the Sarah Wetsman Davidson Tower at Hadassah Hospital-Ein Kerem in Jerusalem. Davidson, who was inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame in 2008, had owned the NBA team since 1974, and won three championships. He also owned the NHL's Tampa Bay Lightning.

Bail Hearing In 1980 Shul Bombing Case

OTTAWA — The second bail hearing for a Lebanese-Canadian man arrested last fall for his alleged role in a 1980 shul bombing in Paris that killed four continued Monday. Hassan Diab, 55, was seeking release pending an extradition hearing.

Diab was arrested in November 2008 at the request of French authorities in connection with the bombing of the Copernic Street synagogue bombing. France is seeking to extradite him to stand trial for murder, attempted murder and the destruction of property. French judges believe he bought the motorbike used in the attack, and that he prepared explosives and placed them in a bag attached to the motorbike.

He was denied bail in December, but an appeals court reversed that decision, saying Diab, who doesn't speak French, couldn't understand documents submitted by France as evidence, Agence France-Presse reported.

Diab has denied links to the radical Palestinian group that's believed to have carried out the attack, and said French authorities are looking for a different man with the same name. He maintains he was not in Paris at the time of the bombing. Before his arrest last November, Diab was a part-time sociology professor at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa.

Kenney cuts funding to Arab group

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney is following through on a threat he made last month to strip the Canadian Arab Federation of federal funding coming from his office for programs aimed at settling immigrants.

Kenney had publicly mused about whether or not his department would renew the CAF's annual funding due to what he called its "promotion of anti-Semitism and terrorism."

He told the The CJN Feb. 26 that Canada "takes a zero-tolerance approach to expressions of anti-Semitism in the public square."

Last week, Kenney's office confirmed it will not renew its two contracts with the CAF – a $2-million program that supports the group's LINC (language instruction for newcomers to Canada) program, which ends this month, and another for $474,873 for a settlement program that runs until March 31, 2010.

CAF president Khaled Mouammar has said the non-renewal of funding will harm immigrants.

In a war of words last month, Mouammaraccused Kenney of being a "professional whore" for his vocal support of Israel.

Kenney shrugged off the remark, telling The CJN, "I've been called much worse by much better people."

Jason Kenney

He added: "But my point [in weighing whether to continue funding the CAF], is whether an organization … that distributes videos produced by Hamas and Islamic Jihad that glorifies terrorism [and] indoctrinates children into the cult of anti-Semitic hatred… is not an organization, in my opinion, that should be receiving taxpayer subsidies."

A March 19 report in the National Post said Kenney is calling for a review of all federal public service grants and the withdrawal of federal support from groups that advocate hatred or terrorism.

"I think there is a tendency to be a little bit naive in Canada. We're so self-congratulatory about the success of our model of pluralism and diversity that surely no one could really mean ill in Canada… We don't necessarily all subscribe to Canadian values, and we should be willing to recognize those that don't," Kenney told an audience at the University of Toronto last week.

Alykhan Velshi, a spokesperson with Kenney's department, confirmed to The CJN that Kenney had instructed his office to begin reviews for all its contracts.

When asked for a list of organizations the minister intended to review, Velshi said there was none yet.

"It's premature at this stage to name particular organizations, since the policy is to be applied generally, but I'm sure we're all familiar with the organizations that receive taxpayer support on the one hand while at the same time promoting anti-Semitism, hatred and terrorism," Velshi said.

"The minister has begun applying this criteria within his own department to organizations whose contribution agreements are up for renewal, buthe's also working with other ministers on creating a government-wide policy."

Israeli analyst surveys bleak landscape

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Yossi Klein Halevi, a contributing editor to the New Republic magazine and a senior fellow at the Adelson Institute for Strategic Studies of the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, is a respected Israeli political analyst known for providing a passionately moderate viewpoint.

In "Fearful, divided and outraged," a feature-length essay in the March 14 Globe and Mail, Klein Halevi, surveying the prevailing mood in Israel, described his country as "fearful for its survival, ready to do whatever is necessary for its basic security, and outraged at much of the world's judgment against its attempts to defend itself."

Klein Halevi wrote: "For decades, Israeli governments of both left and right maintained a strategic doctrine aimed at thwarting the emergence of terror enclaves on its borders as an existential threat. But with the creation of a Hezbollah mini-state in southern Lebanon and a Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip, that doctrine has collapsed. Not since May 1967, when Arab armies massed on Israel's borders and Arab leaders boasted about the imminent destruction of the Jewish state, have Israelis been so anxious about the very survival of the country."

Klein Halevi emphasized the psychological impact of the thousands of missiles that have fallen on Israeli towns and cities in the north under Hezbollah fire in 2006, and under Hamas since 2005 in the south.

He also reminded readers of the disillusionment of Israelis who've seen peace efforts fail: "Israel offered a Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital in 2000 and received in return five years of suicide bombings, the worst wave of terror in the country's history."

The result? "Increasingly, Israelis sense that there are no solutions to the country's security crisis. Peace efforts have failed… But military solutions are also elusive."

Still, Klein Halevi noted that "[i]n principle, most Israelis support a two-state solution – 70 per cent, according to a recent poll." But the lesson of the Gaza withdrawal has been too sobering. Israelis are not prepared to risk exposing their heartland to missiles in return for withdrawing unilaterally from the West Bank.

Klein Halevi drew attention to the core of the impasse: "For Israelis, the real obstacle to an agreement is the continuing refusal of the Palestinian leadership, and much of the Arab leadership generally, to accept the legitimacy of a Jewish state in any borders. Not even moderate Palestinian leaders such as [Palestinian Authority President] Mahmoud Abbas have told their people that the Jews are here to stay, that this land must be shared by two peoples. Instead, the Palestinian media – of Fatah as well as Hamas – continues to tell its people that the Jews are thieves and usurpers, and that eventually the entirety of the land between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River will belong to them."

Klein Halevi made no attempt to sugar-coat this bleak assessment. If anything, he warned that the current Egyptian effort to forge a Hamas-Fatah unity government might only result in the radicalization of Fatah.

No wonder many Mideast analysts caution that, in the near future, the most we can expect is conflict management, rather than conflict resolution.

Worth noting: in "Labels only obscure Mideast realities" (Toronto Star, March 10) Martin Regg Cohn pointed out some obvious hypocrisy emanating from campus groups targeting Israel.

"Amidst the sound and fury of Israeli Apartheid Week – denouncing Israel's attacks on Gaza while downplaying the rockets fired by Hamas militants – there was relative silence on campuses about last week's historic developments in Sudan, where the genocide in Darfur is in its sixth year," he wrote.

"Hamas, however, was anything but silent. Moussa Abu Marzouk, the second-in-command of Hamas, made a point of flying to Khartoum so he could stand by Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in his hour of need. Al-Bashir had just been indicted by the International Criminal Court for war crimes in Darfur, where more than 300,000 people have been slain and 2.7 million others displaced."

This hypocrisy was also exposed, in more detail, in the CJN's March 19 editorial, "The silent conscience of the anti-Israel activist." As the editorial made abundantly clear, the silence about Sudan's crimes encompassed the entire Arab world, including the Arab League which "has never once condemned or expressed disapproval of the al-Bashir government."

Networking event aims to help people find work

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Two young Torontonians are planning an event that they hope will help people who have lost their jobs because of the economic downturn.

Moshe Grunfeld, a 22-year-old legal assistant, and his friend Choni Fried, a 27-year-old development officer for Chai Lifeline, are bringing ParnasaFest to Toronto this Sunday evening. The name is a reference to the Hebrew word for livelihood.

The grassroots networking event has already spread to 10 locations. It was launched last month in the United States by Dave Weinberg, a Toronto-born, Washington, D.C.-based friend of Grunfeld's and Fried's, in response to layoffs in the Jewish non-profit world.

Following a pilot event Feb. 11 in New York, ParnasaFests have been held in Chicago, Washington, Detroit, Jerusalem, Long Island, Sacramento, San Francisco and London, England.

After a second ParnasaFest was held in New York, Grunfeld said he heard that one person was hired as a result of a contact made at the first event, and that seven people received interviews.

"This is not a job fair," said Grunfeld. Much of it will consist of "shmoozing," and there will be an opportunity for attendees to introduce themselves by name and area of work.

As well, networking consultant Ida Shessel (letusfacilitate.com) will conduct an "interactive skill builder" to help participants network more effectively.

Shessel, who is donating her time for the event, said she hasn't heard of any similar events, aside from some smaller Jewish networking groups.

Because of a limited budget, ParnasaFest has been promoted mostly through Facebook and has been attracting a younger crowd, but the event is intended for everyone – "all ages, all career levels," Grunfeld said.

"We just want a good mix, because you never know who knows somebody who knows somebody... We're especially looking for people who are hiring, and for sponsors."

As of last week, Grunfeld and Fried had one sponsor, Saveutel, a company that provides cellular phone consulting services. They also have the venue, the Toronto Zionist Centre, courtesy of the Marlee Shul, a young Orthodox congregation that meets in the building.

Choni Fried, top, and Moshe Grunfeld

Although Grunfeld is employed, he spent several months last year looking for a job following his graduation from Yeshiva University. Eventually, he said, a Facebook contact who saw that he was job-hunting provided the lead he needed.

"You never know whose grandmother's aunt's cousin is going to be working at an accounting firm that happens to have a job, even if it's not an accounting job."

Fried said he and Grunfeld "immediately got on board" when they heard about the project. "For me, it was recognizing that if we can make a difference, it was incumbent on us to do something," Fried said.

Like Grunfeld, he also heard about his job through someone he knew. "I think if we can help people network, it's imperative that we do this."

He and Grunfeld advise job seekers to bring their business cards but not their resumes to ParnasaFest. The dress code is business casual. "There's no formality," said Fried.

"They should just bring themselves, and a willingness to shmooze and meet new people," Grunfeld added.

Fried said he would encourage prospective employers or people who know of a job opening to attend even for a short time. Organizers are asking people to pre-register.

ParnasaFest Toronto will be held this Sunday, March 29, from 6:30 to 9 p.m. at the Zionist Centre, 788 Marlee Avenue. For further information or to pre-register, go to parnasafest.org and click on "Toronto."

No isolation from this cause

It is by now a hard blow to the solar plexus of the supporters of Israel. Irrespective of the facts or the context or the history or the truth of the conflict with the Palestinian people and the Arab world, the Jewish state and all who believe in the justice of its cause increasingly fight for the favour of public opinion that is simply not there.

An article that appeared last week in the New York Times illustrates the dilemma. It was headlined "After Gaza, Israel Grapples with Crisis of Isolation." The reporter wrote that Israel "is facing its worst diplomatic crisis in two decades." The reason for this is the increasing hostility it faces in the world. It can expect more hostility, he suggests, if the country installs "a hawkish right-wing government." Israel's foreign ministry has undertaken a campaign to "improve Israel's image through cultural and information diplomacy." But the effort would be futile, the author suggests.

"Of course, for Israel's critics, including those who firmly support the existence of a Jewish state, the problem is not one of image but of policy. They point to four decades of occupation; the settling of half a million Israel Jews on land captured in 1967; the economic strangling of Gaza for the past few years, and the society's growing indifference toward the creation of a Palestinian state as reasons Israel has lost favour abroad..." (our emphasis).

Such critics of Israel point to this noose-like string of knotted allegations, but they never point at all to the Palestinians or their leaders. The Palestinians have firmly entrenched themselves in the minds of Israel's critics as the hapless, pitiful victims of Israel's very existence. Remove the sovereign Jewish existence, their leaders tell them, and the victimization will end.

For these critics of Israel, the history of the conflict began only in 1967. There are no pages in the book before June 1967. Yet they mysteriously ignore some of the most revealing post-67 pages: the accords of 1993; the Camp David frustrations of 2000; the suicide terror unleashed against Israel; the Gaza withdrawal of 2005, and the unremitting genocidal war, despite the withdrawal, directed at the Jewish state by the rulers in Gaza and their distant sponsors.

Israel's critics absolve Israel's enemies from even minimal standards of decent, humane behaviour. A "minor" example illustrates the point: that Gilad Schalit was kidnapped by the Gaza regime; that he has remained captive for more than 1,000 days; that his Hamas kidnappers have refused the Red Cross to ever visit him, and that they taunt and torture his family without even a whisper of condemnation from Israel's critics betrays the futility and the moral recklessness of Israel adopting policies merely to please those critics.

We buckle at times to catch our breath and we are weary, too, from the constant, unabating anti-Israel condemnations from both the highest and the lowest stations of the intelligentsia. But Israel's enemies and its critics need to know that, though weary, we will neither despair nor withdraw from constant, unabating support for Israel's cause. There will be no isolation from this just cause.

U.S. Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Congressmen Tom Lantos and Benjamin Gilman introduced legislation to move the U.S. embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. Although they had support in both the House and the Senate, supporters of president Ronald Reagan opposed it, fearing it would hamper the country's role in the Mideast peace process.

Supplementary educational programs

The 30-plus supplementary programs throughout the Greater Toronto Area are concerned about the changes to Mercaz. While we have been assured that program grants from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto through the Mercaz will continue, the sudden loss of our Mercaz colleagues' experience and excellent consultative services, knowledge base and resources developed over many years will create great hardship for many of our schools and is likely to be detrimental to our educational community ("Federation downsizes Mercaz, cuts 10 jobs," CJN, March 12).

One of the unique and wonderful things about Jewish education in Toronto is that schools from across the denominational spectrum meet and work collaboratively, with everyone committed to providing the best possible Jewish education for their students. The future of continued educational collaboration is questionable without the support of a strong central agency for Jewish education.

In collaboration with the Mercaz, we have been developing a community standard for content, a work-in-progress that will be very difficult to continue to develop without outside professional support. Our staffing is far more limited than the day schools, and building capacity within the supplementary system is unlikely to be as effective or as efficient as what we were provided with by the Mercaz.

The loss of a central agency to work with us and the loss of the knowledge that the Mercaz staff has gained and shared with us will be difficult, if not impossible, to replace. We greatly appreciate the fine work of the Mercaz staff and are saddened by our sudden loss of their services and wisdom.

Reducing Judaism to pithy statements

It seems to me that when a rabbi is asked to write a guest article for The CJN, he or she should write to as broad a constituency as possible.The message found in the column "Orthodoxy as heterodoxy" (Rabbinic Reflections, CJN, March 12) reads more as a polemic than anything else. The author strives to exclude any expression of Judaism that does not conform to his personal ideology.

The writer begins with strict descriptions of Shabbat observance, the nature of seating in the synagogue and the laws of family purity. Then, he becomes liberal on other matters of Jewish practice: women's roles, the State of Israel and Holocaust commemorations, concerning some of which his own colleagues may disagree.

While Shabbat observance, synagogue practices and family purity laws are essential, I am concerned when anyone tries to reduce Judaism to pithy statements. There are many axiomatic reduction examples of Judaism in our tradition. For example, "the world stands on three pillars – Torah, service and deeds of kindness"; or "justice, truth and peace." The Talmud poses four questions that we will be asked before entering paradise that deal with business ethics, raising a family, setting times for Torah learning and paving the way for a better future. I would caution anyone to reduce the vastness of Judaism to a litmus test of a few basic categories.

Toronto Partnership Minyan

As one of the individuals who is investing energy in establishing the Toronto Partnership Minyan (TPM), I would like to point out that the minyan is not egalitarian ("A partnership with potential," CJN, Feb. 19). TPM seeks to maximize women's participation in the observance of mitzvot, with a focus on synagogue service, within the confines of Orthodox Halachah.

While "women can read from the Torah, receive certain aliyot and lead various parts of the service," there is halachic limitation on the extent of their participation. The notion is one of partnership, rather than of egalitarianism, and supports and respects the values of our emerging and engaged community.

His name was Benny Freedman, but he may be known as Benny Freeman, and he had a son called Earl. Benny Freedman was born in Russia in 1891, his siblings were my Grandpa David, who was his elder brother by 10 years, then Eli, Gersh and Jane (Jinnie), and there was another brother. My dad was Hymie Freedman.

Reflections on anti-Semitism

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

Canadian Jews have every reason to feel concerned about some recent manifestations of anti-Semitism in this country. However, Canadian Jewry still enjoys much greater security with respect to anti-Semitism than do the Jews of Great Britain and continental Europe.

A February 2009 report by the European Union's Agency for Fundamental Rights provides a summary overview of manifestations of anti-Semitism in the EU between 2001 and 2008. The findings are disturbing, with increases in the number and severity of anti-Semitic incidents, and popular attitudes about Jews and the Jewish "race" in many European countries premised on pernicious stereotypes that have in some cases been likened to those of 1930s Europe.

A confluence of traditional and new forms of anti-Semitism is at play in modern European society. These include the following:

• Holocaust Denial More than 60 years after the end of World War II, denial of the Shoah remains an integral part of the European collective psyche. For example, in 2008, Spain's Constitutional Court ruled that Holocaust justification should be punishable by imprisonment, but Holocaust denial should not be, because the latter falls within the domain of "freedom of speech." Similarly, in Poland, a regional court halted criminal proceedings against the public use of the Nazi salute, based on the argument that the gesture could also be "an ancient Roman salute."

• 'New Anti-Semitism' Left-wing European intelligentsia is the godfather of the new anti-Semitism. Having transformed Israel into what Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler has called "the collective Jew among the nations," European liberals no longer discriminate against Jews as individuals. However, using language and symbols borrowed from traditional anti-Semitism, they attack Israel's legitimacy and discriminate against the Jewish people's right to live as an equal member of the family of nations. Moreover, their pseudo-intellectual rationalizations provide the justification for wild street demonstrations throughout Europe by anti-globalization activists and assorted other extreme left-wingers whose actual goal, again citing Cotler, is to make the world Judenstaatrein, "free of a Jewish state."

• 'Disaffected Muslim Youth' According to the EU report, it is the "disaffected young Muslim," "person of North African origin," or "immigrant," who is viewed by many Europeans as the primary perpetrator of anti-Semitic incidents. A number of physical attacks on Jews in France and other European countries have been attributed to Muslims or North Africans. And anti-Israel street demonstrations calling for "death to Jews" and involving radicalized members of the local Arab and Muslim communities (and joined by militant left-wing and anti-globalization forces) often coincide with the outbreak of violence in the Middle East.

• The Extreme Right It has been the case historically that European right-wing extremists have responded to serious socio-economic upheaval by looking for a convenient scapegoat: the Jews. It should, therefore, come as no surprise that the current economic crisis affecting Europe has precipitated a discernible increase in xenophobic propaganda, as well as vandalism, harassment and physical assaults by "skinheads" targeting Jews. The situation is particularly serious in some of the former eastern bloc countries, although incidents also have occurred in western Europe and Great Britain. Extrapolating from European history, it can be anticipated that continued economic decline and unemployment will affect the scope of right-wing extremism targeting European Jewry.

There's no reason for Canadian Jews to assume that this country is immune to these trends and that the traditional and new forms of anti-Semitism currently threatening to erode Europe's soul (for the second time in less than a century) cannot infect Canadian society as well. In fact, elements of this illness are already readily apparent and festering.

However, what distinguishes the Canadian case from that of the European Union is the pace with which the political leadership is moving to prevent the illness from spreading.

Whereas European leaders have reacted to rising rates of anti-Semitism, Canada's leaders are taking pro-active and preventative measures, to make clear to anti-Semites (and all racists) that their hateful behaviour will not be tolerated in this country.

Prime Minister Steven Harper recently declared that anti-Semitism "is a pernicious evil that must be exposed, that must be confronted, that must be repudiated, whenever and wherever it appears. Fuelled by lies and paranoia we have learned from history it is an evil so profound... that is it ultimately a threat to us all."

A statement of such profound moral clarity should help make Canadian Jews feel confident about their status as Jews and as citizens of Canada.

By JAMES MORTON

In Jerusalem a few years ago, I re-read Theodor Herzl's The Jewish State (1896). Herzl was not a religious man and his early views were that Jews would simply integrate into modern societies as another religious group. But the experience of the anti-Semitic Dreyfus trial in France convinced Herzl that Jews would never be accepted unless they had a state of their own. Once there was a state, Jews would be just another group and accepted in the same way as, say, the Portuguese.

Herzl's solution was dramatic and simple: let the sovereignty be granted us over a portion of the globe large enough to satisfy the rightful requirements of a nation. The rest we shall manage for ourselves.

And so, after two world wars and years of struggle, modern Israel was formed. The foundation has been a success – there is a Jewish state. Overt anti-Semitism is not widely accepted in western countries today (other parts of the world are not so tolerant), but attacks on the legitimacy or very existence of Herzl's state are common enough, and indeed are getting more common day by day. And, if we're being honest, we can admit that such attacks are usually just thinly veiled anti-Semitism.

A poster typically seen during Israel "Apartheid" Week

If I mention to colleagues that I'm taking a trip to, say, Greece, they make polite noises about sunshine and food. But mentioning a trip to Israel – a similar country in a similar part of the world – and there is a pause, followed by anything from a quick change of subject to assurances that the listener believes in peace and one God for all people, to open hostility and anger.

Israel is not a nation like any other.

So how should we describe this phenomenon? Is it nothing more than anti-Semitism in disguise?

In fairness, one must admit that not all criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic. It's fair to disagree with Israeli policy on, say, the integration of its Druze citizens without being anti-Semitic. As Thomas Friedman of the New York Times has written, "Criticizing Israel is not anti-Semitic, and saying so is vile. But singling out Israel for opprobrium and international sanction – out of all proportion to any other party in the Middle East – is anti-Semitic, and not saying so is dishonest." As columnist and TV host Michael Coren has cleverly put it, not all criticism of Israel indicates anti-Semitism, but all anti-Semites criticize Israel.

The sad truth is that attacks on Israel have become little more than a smokescreen for attacks on Jews. Because modern western countries have social and legal obstacles that prevent the expression of anti-Semitism in its traditional form, prejudice toward Jews is now likely to be expressed through attacks on Israel. As a result, some bigots have embraced the anti-Israel cause as a way of making a statement about their attitude toward Jews. Suggestions that Israel's foundation was a tragedy or that Israel is merely colonialism in action mirror earlier attempts to call Zionism racist.

Canadian parliamentarians have recognized this.

Federal Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff has said that criticism of Israel is legitimate, but attempting to describe Israel's very existence as a crime against humanity is not.

Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney notes that Canadians are free to express different views about the policies of a foreign government, but the annual campus event called Israeli Apartheid Week is not about that. It's about a systematic effort to delegitimize the democratic homeland of the Jewish people, a country born out of the Holocaust. He says he finds the resurgence of the old slander that Zionism is racism to be very troubling.

Much criticism of Israel is merely thinly disguised anti-Semitism. Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz has set out some factors that indicate when a a particular criticism of Israel is anti-Semitic. Some of them include:

• Characterizing Israel as "the worst," when it's clear that this is not an accurate comparative assessment.

• Discriminating against individuals only because they are Jewish Israelis, without regard to their individual views or actions.

• Physically or verbally attacking Jewish institutions, such as synagogues or cemeteries, as a means of protesting against Israel.

• Discriminating only against Israel in its attempts to qualify for certain positions or status internationally, such as obtaining a seat on the United Nations Security Council or the International Court of Justice, or joining the International Red Cross.

In the United Kingdom, a place where Jews have long been safe and welcome, anti-Israel attacks have been expressly directed at Jews, making the anti-Semitic nature of the attacks clear. Jewish-owned businesses are subject to harassment.

In London, Starbucks – whose chairman, Howard Schultz, is Jewish – has been firebombed in allegedly anti-Israel attacks that are in fact merely anti-Semitic. A grocery delivery van owned by a Jewish firm was attacked by a gang of youths claiming to be protesting Israeli policy. The driver – surely no agent of Israel – was hospitalized with head injuries. Similarly, a Tesco supermarket was targeted, its windows smashed and "Kill Jews" daubed on the walls in paint. (The Tesco supermarket chain was founded by a Jewish immigrant to Britain.)

Here in Canada, recent incidents on university campuses, while not as violent, have shown the same tendency to attack Jews as Jews under the guise of attacking Israel. The conflation of anti-Israel with anti-Semitic is very clear.

There can be little room for doubt: the truth is that most attacks on Israel, and all attacks on Israel's existence, are anti-Semitic.

James Morton is a lawyer in Toronto.

Reviving the living

Too often, life gets buried under the details of living. The demands of daily life produce empty, pedestrian lives. Perhaps Thoreau put it best when he said, "The mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation." Much like caged gerbils running in the wheel, we run busily onward on the road to nowhere. And life squeaks along as we run from e-mail to errand to carpool to shopping list.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But details aren't the villain here. Someone needs to take out the garbage and change the baby's diapers. We need to tend to our basic needs, but we shouldn't get lost in them.

Humans are hard-wired to get lost in the here and now. We buy more groceries if we shop when we're hungry, and we drive more recklessly when we're late for an appointment. Parents at a bar mitzvah can be so distracted with making everything run properly that they neglect to savour the celebration. We're detail-oriented managers, and so we lose ourselves in minutiae, never to peer beyond and see the larger picture.

In chassidic thought, there are two stages of consciousness: "greatness" (gadlut) and "smallness" (katnut). In "smallness," we tend to the day to day. However, trivialities can narrow the spirit. True service of God occurs only in "greatness," when man focuses on the bigger picture.

Grasping the bigger picture is easier said than done. As the renowned Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Kotzk remarked, "I could revive the dead. I have much more difficulty reviving the living."

How do you revive the living? Well, it begins with just a few moments every day.

For example, how often do we appreciate everything we have? Even before I open my eyes in the morning, I tend to focus on all the tasks of the coming day, and in the process, my heart gets covered in a thick coating of "smallness," lacking appreciation for the blessing of a renewed life.

But there's a better way. It's customary to recite a short prayer called Modeh Ani immediately after waking up. The prayer says: "I offer thanks before you, living and eternal King, for You have mercifully restored my soul within me; Your faithfulness is great."

To achieve "greatness," we begin the new day with an appreciation for life. Recently, a Holocaust survivor remarked to me that after the experiences of Auschwitz "every day is gift." And this is true of everyone, whether or not we have endured a near-death experience. Every day is a blessing.

With Modeh Ani, you can touch "greatness" and, for a few short moments, revive the living.

Canada takes lead in fighting anti-Semitism

Canada is leading impressively in fighting modern anti-Jewish bigotry, even when it's camouflaged as criticism of Israel. The minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, Jason Kenney, has defined today's obscenely trendy form of anti-Semitism as "predicated on the notion that the Jews alone have no right to a homeland, the anti-Zionist version of anti-Semitism." Even though many Canadian campuses are polluted by systematic anti-Israel bias and most western countries are passive, Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservative government is building Canada's reputation for defending human rights. As well, Liberal party leaders such as Irwin Cotler, Bob Rae, and Michael Ignatieff have demonstrated that Canadians' commitment to fighting Jew-hatred is bipartisan.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Canada has distinguished itself by being the first country to boycott the upcoming "Durban II" meeting in Geneva. In 2001, anti-Israel forces turned its predecessor – the United Nations' conference against racism, held in Durban, South Africa – into an anti-Semitic, anti-Zionist hate-fest. Next month, the world's human rights abusers who bash Israel to cover their own sins are preparing a repeat. Canada will not join this outrage. At the recent Inter-Parliamentary Forum against Anti-Semitism in London, co-chaired by Cotler, the distinguished Canadian jurist and MP, Kenney mocked his European colleagues for dithering, saying, "I always thought Europe prided itself as having its own independent foreign policy aligned with its own values and interests."

Addressing the conference, Kenney singled out both the Canadian Islamic Congress and the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF) for fomenting anti-Semitism. Leaders of the CAF have circulated hostile e-mails demonizing Rae because of his wife's Jewish communal activism, and its president recently called Kenney a "professional whore" for Israel when he denounced supposed "peace" rallies that championed Hezbollah and Hamas terrorists. Ottawa cut nearly $500,000 in grants to the CAF, showing that an organization that insults Canadian leaders and demonizes fellow Canadians should not enjoy Canadian largesse.

In that same spirit, Ignatieff, the Liberal leader, denounced the week devoted to linking democratic Israel to the racist, apartheid regime that terrorized South Africans (repeating the week's name furthers the unholy attempt to link Israel and that evil). Boldly criticizing union forces in CUPE and elsewhere who perpetuate these lies, Ignatieff wrote that such a week on campuses "betrays the values of mutual respect that Canada has always promoted." This big lie moves beyond legitimate criticism to demonization, Ignatieff explained, because "international law defines 'apartheid' as a crime against humanity," so the false equation is an attempt "to undermine the legitimacy of the Jewish state itself."

In London last month, Kenney announced that he "would be delighted to host the next conference of the inter-parliamentary commission in Canada." Next year, Canada will showcase its best practices in fighting anti-Semitism to the world.

As the parliamentarians monitor their progress in fighting this scourge, the parallel "experts forum" should reconvene, tapping into North American expertise in building positive group identity and fighting bigotry. Harper could talk about how his government has chosen to be a proactive force in fighting anti-Semitism. McGill University political philosopher Charles Taylor could speak about multiculturalism and modern identity-building. Cotler could speak about Canada's contribution to the UN Human Rights Declaration and the fight against genocide. South African refugees could describe apartheid's true nature and explain how false analogies minimize the systematic racism that South Africans endured.

Ottawa police officials could describe their unique community outreach efforts in fighting bigotry. Leaders of different faith communities could discuss their own struggles against prejudice and how they co-operate to achieve social harmony. Canadian Jewish leaders could describe how they foster a rich Jewish identity while fighting bigotry and contributing to the broader community. Bringing these kinds of local insights would enhance the discussions that took place this year in London on fighting Internet hate, stopping systematic demonization, changing the dynamics on campus and cataloguing hate crimes.

Ideally, by next year, such a conference will be unnecessary. But as long as it's needed to combat discrimination, leaders such as Harper and his bipartisan colleagues should be hailed for refusing to stay silent amid this new outbreak of an ancient, but persistent, plague.

And now for the good news...

Several years ago, just before he began training as an officer in the Israeli navy, my nephew Yoni visited us in Canada for the first time. He grew up in Be'er Sheva, in the heart of the Negev desert, so our tourism with him focused on water sites: Niagara Falls, the Toronto Islands, the Beaches. My husband even took him on a whirlwind canoeing circuit in Algonquin Park – seven lakes in one day. But wherever we took him, the trip home always occasioned the same comment.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

We live near a major intersection in Toronto that sports a giant advertising billboard atop a lowrise commercial property. For several years running, the billboard always carried fundraising ads for a philanthropic organization. During Yoni's visit, the ad on the billboard featured photos of several frowning people with sad, imploring eyes, mostly children. I no longer recall the precise caption, but it read something like "Israel: They need your help." Each time we passed it, Yoni's annoyance increased. As an Israeli, he felt the billboard poster diminished him, depicting him as needy, dependent and unresourceful, reliant upon the charity of others. He called it the yisraelim miskenim poster – the poor Israelis poster.

The billboard and those who commissioned it meant Yoni and his countrymen no unkindness. On the contrary, its goal was to inspire kindness, to support projects that would benefit Israel and its inhabitants. And Yoni, of course, was not its intended audience.

But the poster's designers understood that bad news sells. It sells newspapers. It elects political candidates. It sells organizations. It promotes group cohesion. It has the power to unsettle us, fascinate us, make us anxious, rock us from our complacency and mobilize us to action. In fact, to our credit, when we hear bad news, most of us want to do something about it.

But bad news can be too good a tool for mobilization, whether for political action, fundraising or identity affirmation. And, in the imperfect world we inhabit, there's always something alarming going on for us to glom onto and enlist to our cause.

But there's a price for utilizing this powerful tool. The short-term gains may be great, but long term, it costs us. Take anti-Semitism, for example. A touch of anti-Semitism in the air, I have heard it argued, is "good for the Jews," because the feeling of beleaguerment strengthens the sense of Jewish identity. Indeed, Jean Paul Sartre observed in the mid-1940s that Jews will remain Jews so long as hatred against them persists. Because of the anxieties it stirs, our concern with anti-Semitism can be exploited.

I'm not suggesting that we should not name anti-Semitism when and where we see it, and work against it. Indeed, as I have argued previously in these pages, the "oldest hatred" endures in our times. Its deadliest manifestation is still in living memory of our community, and we must treat it as a real threat.

But sometimes I feel that the issue of anti-Semitism takes over our channels of thought and communication, so much so, that we forget to emphasize that – pace Sartre – Jews remain Jews not because others denigrate us, but because Judaism and Jewish culture is a source of spiritual and ethical values, a rich font of texts, culture, and history that inspire and challenge.

While bad news has the power to rally us, putting it at the centre of our religious, cultural or organizational lives can stunt us as a community. We need to celebrate our accomplishments, whether in education, culture, science, community building or helping ourselves and helping others. Affirmation, not fear, should lead our Jewish commitments. Not anxiety, but joy.

Having fulfilled his commitment as a naval officer, Yoni will be visiting us again this spring. Last time I checked, the billboard nearby carried an ad for women's clothing.

The coast is clear.

It's time for some good news.

Israel marks 30 years of formal peace with Egypt

Israel's historic peace treaty with Egypt, signed and sealed 30 years ago this week in Washington, D.C., has weathered a succession of storms, yet it remains a cold peace.

Egypt's bold, trail-blazing decision to establish formal diplomatic relations with the Jewish state after three decades of mutual hostility and four wars was preceded by secret Israeli-Egyptian talks, the unprecedented visit to Israel of Egypt's president, Anwar Sadat, in November 1977, and the signing of the Camp David accords – which created a framework for peace – in September 1978.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On March 26, 1979, Sadat and Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin, affixed their signatures to the treaty, which both sides needed to develop their respective economies. The master of ceremonies was the president of the United States, Jimmy Carter, who had worked tirelessly to make it happen. Sadat, keen to resolve the Palestinian question, declared he had not signed a separate peace with Israel. But this was the real meaning of Egypt's treaty with Israel.

In short order, Israel and Egypt set up embassies in Cairo and Tel Aviv. Egypt thus became the first Arab country to recognize Israel. By 1981, the international force that was to monitor the provisions of the treaty – the Multinational Force and Observers – was up and running in the Sinai Peninsula, which Israel had captured, for the third time, in the Six Day War.

Regarded as a harbinger of peace in the Middle East, but roundly denounced by the PLO, Iran and such Arab states as Syria, Iraq and Saudi Arabia, the treaty left Egypt – the pre-eminent Arab power – virtually isolated in the Muslim world for some years to come.

The treaty has benefited both sides.

Although Israel gave up territorial depth for the sake of peace, it removed Egypt as a potential military threat. Egypt, which fought wars with Israel in 1948, 1956, 1967 and 1973, has been neutralized as an enemy. Yet the majority of Egyptians are still hostile to Israel and regard it as a usurper of Palestinian rights, while Islamic fundamentalists have called for the cancellation of the treaty. For Israel, the treaty was a landmark, breaking its isolation in the Arab world and opening the road for its rapprochement with the PLO in 1993 and Jordan in 1994.

By making peace with Israel, Egypt retrieved the Sinai Peninsula, a vast, pristine wilderness brimming with oil and gas fields and tourist potential. Egypt was also able to channel scarce resources to nation building and reestablish ties with the United States, all at the expense of the old Soviet Union. By forming something of an alliance with Washington, Egypt made itself eligible for U.S. aid packages, totalling almost $2 billion per year, and the latest American weaponry to modernize its armed forces.

The treaty has endured despite a series of crises: Sadat's assassination in 1981 at the hands of Muslim radicals, the formation of a new government headed by Hosni Mubarak, Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982, Palestinian uprisings in 1987 and 2000, the Second Lebanon War in 2006 and, most recently, Israel's war with Hamas in the Gaza Strip.

Two of these events prompted Egypt to recall its ambassador in Israel. Saad Mortada, Egypt's first envoy, was recalled in 1982 in protest over the Sabra and Shatila massacre in Beirut. He did not return. His successor, Mohammed Bassiouny, Egypt's longest-serving ambassador to Israel, was ordered home shortly after the eruption of the second intifadah in 2000. Four years passed before a replacement, Assem Ibrahim, presented his credentials in Israel.

During the war in Gaza, Mubarak was pressured to recall Ibrahim. Mubarak kept Ibrahim in Tel Aviv, having accused Hamas of igniting the war by breaking the ceasefire that Egypt had painstakingly arranged six months earlier, and is now trying to resurrect.

Despite its mercurial relationship with Egypt, Israel regards the treaty as a strategic prize to be nurtured and honed.

Apart from its geo-political dimensions, the treaty has been mutually advantageous in commercial terms.

Israel's economic relations with Egypt rest on two pillars – the sale of Egyptian natural gas to Israel and the presence of Qualifying Industrial Zones in Egypt. (In the past, Israel has also bought oil from Egypt).

In 2005, in a $2.5-billion deal, Israel agreed to buy 1.7 billion cubic metres of natural gas from Egypt over 15 years.

Egyptian nationalists and Islamists tried to torpedo the deal, claiming that Egypt was selling its gas too cheaply. A lower court halted the flow, but last month, a higher court suspended that ruling.

Five years ago, Israel and Egypt signed a trade agreement, brokered by Washington, establishing Qualified Industrial Zones in Cairo, Alexandria and Port Said. Under the pact, Egypt may export clothes and textiles, its chief exports, to the United States on a duty-free basis as long as they contain Israeli manufactured segments.

The agreement has created at least 15,000 jobs in Egypt, no small feat for a poverty-stricken Third World nation that suffers from chronic unemployment and underemployment.

Egyptian president Anwar Sadat and Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin exchange views during Sadat's first visit to Israel in 1977 [I.P.P.A. photo]

Egypt reaps profit from the unsullied beauty of the Sinai, thanks to the Israelis who vacation there in droves, in contrast to the minuscule number of Egyptians who visit Israel.

Islamic terrorists, aided by Bedouins, bombed hotels in Taba and Sharm el-Sheikh in 2004 and 2005, killing and wounding scores of western and Israeli tourists. These incidents have scared off some travellers, but the Sinai is still a big draw.

Israel's expertise in agriculture, particularly in arid area farming, has been useful to the Egyptians. Israel has built experimental farms in Egypt, helping Egyptian farmers increase their crop yield.

This level of co-operation and normalization has been sorely lacking in professional, political and cultural exchanges, which are practically non-existent.

Examples abound.

The Egyptian government blocked Ali Salem, one of Egypt's most eminent playwrights, from personally accepting an honorary degree from Ben-Gurion University. Amr Waked, an Egyptian actor, was reprimanded by the actors' union for appearing in a U.S. miniseries opposite an Israeli actor.

In 2004, a Cairo judge banned the formation of an Egyptian-Israeli friendship society. In the same year, the speaker of Egypt's parliament rejected an Israeli invitation to address the Knesset to commemorate the 25th anniversary of the peace treaty. Last year, opposition politicians protested when the Israeli ambassador suggested that Hebrew be added to the list of foreign languages in the Egyptian school curriculum. Meanwhile, several members of parliament campaigned to stop an annual Israeli pilgrimage to the grave of a famous Moroccan-born rabbi buried north of Cairo.

The Egyptian media, both state-owned and private, have regularly carried anti-Israel and anti-Semitic content, bashing Israel for its settlement policies in the West Bank and its treatment of the Palestinians. Egyptian school texts have defamed Israel and Jews. In 2002, Egyptian state television broadcast an inflammatory series, Horseman without a Horse, adapted from the Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Keenly aware of anti-Israel currents, Mubarak has never visited Israel, except for a three-hour trip in 1995 to attend prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's funeral.

Anti-Israel feeling has also been whipped by Israeli reports that 250 Egyptian prisoners of war were shot during the Six Day War, by the convictions of Egyptians accused of spying for Israel and by Israel's refusal to give up its nuclear arsenal and sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Despite the acrimony, Israel and Egypt are committed to preserving the treaty, realizing that its abrogation would serve no one's interest and could be destabilizing. Three decades ago, the Middle East turned a corner when Israel and Egypt made peace, but Israel must surely wonder whether the Arabs will ever produce another figure like Sadat.

Rabbi leads multifaith vigil at Queen's Park

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

For some, St. Patrick's Day was a time for revelry. But for a faithful few under a tent on the lawn of Queen's Park at noon on March 17, it was an opportunity to remind Ontario MPPs that their impending budget should not forsake the province's homeless, impoverished and malnourished.

It was a message delivered as part of a month-long prayer vigil outside the legislature, organized by the Interfaith Social Assistance Reform Coalition (ISARC). The vigil, which began March 3, ends today (March 26) with the reading of the provincial budget. The vigil was officiated each day by a leader of one of the participating faith communities.

Last week, it was Congregation Darchei Noam's Rabbi Tina Grimberg's turn. She led nearly 50 members of her congregation and other ISARC supporters through an hour-long service of prayer and quotes derived from a range of Jewish sources addressing the need for tikkun olam and tzedakah. Her message included passages from writings in the Torah, Talmud and learned Jewish scholars and rabbis from throughout the ages.

Speaking to The CJN just prior to her homily, Rabbi Grimberg recalled her youth living in Soviet-era Russia, saying that although there were many problems with Communism's "follies," one thing that the government did right was ensure that every person had a fixed address.

"Certainly, [in North America] we have democracy, free economy, the ability to earn… but our inability to sustain those in need is a bushah – in Hebrew this means a shame," she said. "At the level of civilization in which we live, this should be eradicated. A roof over one's head is not a privilege, it's a right."

Rabbi Grimberg said she remembered her father telling her that he was part of a volunteer group that made the rounds each winter night to take "drunks" back to their homes.

"Yes, they sometimes shared a stove or [facilities] with 10 or 12 others in a building. Still, they had somewhere to go. Here, there are people who are still literally freezing to death on the street."

Rabbi Grimberg said she believed the vigil would have an impact regardless of whether MPPs inside Queen's Park consider themselves religious or not.

"How can [the vigil] not have an effect if there are dedicated, caring people praying in a loving way, asking that the [topic] of our most vulnerable in society be brought up to our lawmakers?" she asked.

She added: "Even if this doesn't work [directly on the MPPs], we will still defy. Those who pass by and see us… we don't know how many people we touch when we do goodness in this world. I refuse to believe that we don't do good here. This is a mitzvah."

Ryerson University political science professor Myer Siemiatycki, chair of Darchei Noam's social justice advocacy committee, said he saw the "call for social justice as central to our understanding of Judaism."

Members of the First Narayever Congregation on Brunswick Avenue were scheduled to attend the vigil on Tuesday (March 24), when the shul's spiritual leader, Rabbi Ed Elkin, was slated to lead it.

Also on hand at last week's vigil was Susan Eagle, chair of ISARC and a United Church pastor in London, Ont.

Rev. Eagle said the vigil represented "a witness and a presence" that "unites us in the care and concern of our neighbour."

She said this latest provincial budget is "critical," adding that ISARC members were "praying to strengthen the resolve of our elected leaders to understand how serious this budget is."

Although MPPs did not officially respond to the vigil, Rev. Eagle said she noticed a few who "wandered out" to thank participants.

The closing ceremony for the vigil will include the lighting of candles for each MPP, and each legislator will be presented with one as "a reminder we've been offering prayers for them," Rev. Eagle said.

Participating faith leaders will also take candles back to their houses of worship to remind their congregants that "although our vigil here is over… much more needs to be done. Because we're not naive enough to think that everything that needs to be done will be covered in this budget," she said.

Israel has a bad electoral system: professor

Arye Naor

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

The people may have spoken but the politicians, it seems, cannot hear them.

More accurately, it is Israel's political system that is deaf.

"The people spoke more than a month ago but the prime minister-designate is still waiting outside the delivery room," Prof. Arye Naor observed in a recent talk at York University. "Why does it happen? Why does it happen again and again?"

The reason for Israel's perennial political paralysis, Naor bluntly put it, is "a very bad electoral system."

A professor of public policy and administration at Ben-Gurion University, Naor is visiting professor of Israel studies at York. His talk was the inaugural lecture in the Israel studies program, part of York's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies.

In most parliamentary democracies, the prime minister is the leader of the party that receives the most seats in the legislature. But that didn't happen in the Feb. 10 Israeli election, in which Tzipi Livni's Kadima party won 28 seats to 27 for Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud party. Netanyahu was chosen to form a government because a majority of members of the Knesset said they favoured him over Livni.

Naor blames a "multiplicity of parties" for the mess. Israel employs an electoral system called party-list proportional representation, based on the strength of political parties across the spectrum. In the last election, 33 parties vied for 120 seats. Twelve of them actually won seats thanks to a rule that a party needs at least two per cent of the popular vote to win a seat.

With that kind of patchwork, it's little wonder that every government in Israel's history has been a coalition, said Naor, who served as cabinet secretary to former prime minister Menachem Begin. As a result, Israel is in "permanent crisis" politically.

"It leads to government dysfunction. It is very difficult to function properly when the decision-making group is divided from the inside and competing all the time with each other."

Major decisions surrounding the peace process and national budgets often suffer as a result, he said. "It's impossible to run a country under these circumstances."

Compromise is "usually the worst solution because it is 'neither nor.'" But political compromise may be the only solution, and it would "find the necessary compromise inside parts of Israeli society."

While radical change in Israel "is out of the question," Naor recalled two old reformist ideas. One, formulated by the country's founding fathers, suggested dividing Israel into 120 "constituencies," similar to the British riding system. The plan was rejected by founding prime minister David Ben-Gurion's own party.

Another is fashioned on a German model. It would divide Israel into 30 or so electoral regions, each choosing three or four members of the Knesset. "That's been under discussion for 40 years," Naor said.

A third is to turn Israel into a republic that elects a president via direct popular vote. Another, and more realistic approach, is to allow the leader of the party with the most seats to begin acting as prime minister right away, which would put pressure on other parties to enter a coalition quickly.

Like other pundits, Naor predicted that Netanyahu will cobble together a narrow right-wing unity government.

The controversial Avigdor Lieberman, leader of the rightist Yisrael Beiteinu party, which won 15 seats in the election, the third-highest total, was designated as foreign minister last week in a coalition agreement with Netanyahu.

Naor said Netanyahu's "real difficulties will begin" when he forms a coalition, tries to balance cabinet posts among his partners, and may have to sacrifice his policies. "When politics and policies collide, you know which one prevails," Naor said, noting that it was Netanyahu who, as a hardline former prime minister, ceded the West Bank town of Hebron to the Palestinians.

But as a young nation, Israel "is a society and a country still in the making."

Israel targets 'sophisticated travellers' in 2009

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Coming off of one of its most successful tourism years on record, Israel is launching a new ad campaign aimed at more affluent travellers, and it's expanding its marketing reach in Canada by striking deals with travel agents who serve communities that have rarely thought of the Holy Land as a destination.

On a visit to Toronto's Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) last week from New York, Arie Sommer, Israel's tourism commissioner for North and South America, outlined to the media some of the strategies that Israel is using to build on the success of its 2008 campaign.

"We've set a goal to bring 1,000,000 North American tourists to Israel in 2012," Sommer said, adding that last year, Israel attracted 3,000,000 tourists from around the world. Of those, approximately 700,000 were from North America, including 70,000 Canadians.

He said Israeli tourism officials had forecast an "even better" year in 2009, but the war in Gaza and the global economic downturn have dampened expectations. Now, Sommer said he'd consider the year a success if there was only a 20 per cent drop in tourism this year.

Sommer stressed that while he continues to value traditional Jewish and Christian travellers, he said it's time for Israel to become a "real tourist destination" and go after the "sophisticated traveller" market.

He described the latter as people who have more disposable income and who like to spontaneously visit destinations for pleasure, not necessarily for religious reasons.

Arie Sommer

"We believe we can divert these travelers and their families... to Israel" instead of going to Europe and Asia, he said. "Israel must increase its share of these travellers."

Reporters were shown a series of 2009 TV commercial spots and poster ads put together by Israel's tourism ministry as part of a campaign that cost $4.5 million.

Titled "You'll love Israel from the first 'Shalom'" and "Israel: No One Belongs Here More Than You," the various TV ads range from one focusing on a young couple making their first visit to the Holy Land and being greeted with robust "Shaloms" by smiling Israelis to one featuring a family exploring Israel's many wonders together.

Sommer also spoke at length about how the Canadian market is expanding due to recent, local public relations campaigns that paint Israel in a new light as a safe and fun travel destination.

He said Israel's tourism offices have been working hard to "bring in new wholesalers" to sell Israel to Canada's Chinese and Indian communities, among others.

"For years, we neglected our retail travel agents because we worked [primarily] with the Jewish and Christian communities. But we realized we're lacking the sales force to sell Israel," Sommer said. "We're now conducting seminars with travel agents [representing various ethnic communities], and I think gradually these agents are realizing it's worthwhile to sell Israel as a travel destination."

Oded Grofman, director of the IGTO in Canada, said his office has heard from its new partner travel agents that "they're receiving more calls" from their communities regarding travel to Israel.

In addition to promoting celebrations of Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary this year, Sommer said his office is also planning to use the Pope's upcoming trip to Israel in May to drum up more interest in the country among Catholics.

"Unfortunately, we don't see too many Catholics visiting Israel. They prefer [travelling to] the Vatican," he said jokingly.

On another front, Sommer said Israel has also increased its trips for journalists to Israel in order to increase the country's positive exposure in the worldwide media.

"We have hundreds of journalists visit each year," he said.

According to the IGTO, 25 Canadian journalists have travelled to Israel already this year.

Sommer said that many major travel publications are enquiring about Israel, and he noted that enRoute, Air Canada's in-flight magazine, is looking into a piece about Israel for publication in the near future.

New Haggadot arrivals

From the editor's desk...

No festival in our calendar more firmly anchors in us a collective sense of memory and inter-connection than Pesach.

This is how it has been ever since Moses imparted God's directions for the very first Pesach night rituals to the soon-to-be-freed slaves some 3,500 years ago and our beloved sage rabbis centuries later created and then enhanced the order of procedure (the seder) for retelling and re-enacting that nervous, wonderful, historic first Passover night.

No religious work has been more illustrated, decorated or reproduced than the Haggadah, the liturgical text that enshrines that memory-sustaining and people defining seder.

As has become my custom on the "eve" of Pesach, I enjoy bringing to our readers' attention to some of the new Haggadot that come across my desk in time for the holiday.

The Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem has recently published two stunning Haggadot. A non-profit organization dedicated to the advancement of pluralistic Jewish education in Israel and Europe, the institute is also associated with the Conservative movement.

The Lovell Haggadah is a testament to the soaring places that the human imagination can touch when the heart combines devotion to text with devotion to esthetics.

Rabbi Matthew Berkowitz of Boca Raton and Jerusalem is the illuminator, translator and commentator of this Haggadah. He is supremely talented. And we are the beneficiary of his talents.

Rabbi Berkowitz provides three distinct entry points to the mystery and wonder of the seder experience for the user of this Haggadah: the book's liturgy, its artwork and commentary. Each is its own magical pathway to new thoughts and reflections on our participation in the story of the Exodus.

The production values of the text are of a very high quality. The layout calls us to each page. The inter-relationships among space, illustration and text is pleasing and provocative. The cream colour and quality of the paper immediately set this Haggadah apart. Moreover, and perhaps especially, Berkowitz's drawings are bold and deeply evocative.

The Haggadah takes its name from the sponsors of Rabbi Berkowitz's project, Dedee and Stephen Lovell, who are his students and who provided the chief motivation for him to undertake this rare artistic achievement. The softcover work sits lightly and delightfully in the reader's hand.

The Schechter Haggadah is also a three-channelled exploration through art, history and commentary of the Haggadah.

Joshua Kulp, the co-founder of the Conservative Yeshiva in Jerusalem, provides the translations and the commentaries in the Haggadah. David Golinkin, president and the Jerome and Miriam Katzin Professor of Jewish Law at the Schechter Institute, has selected and annotated the 115 eye-catching colour illustrations in the book.

A hardcover work of 350 pages, the Schechter Haggadah is a tall textbook conceived as a sourcebook and reference guide for the myriad aspects of enquiry into the origins, meanings and evolution of the many-layered text and rituals of the seder.

The text is cross-referenced throughout the Haggadah. The illustrations reach as far back as the year 1300 CE, and the commentary section is itself a banquet of some 40 different discussions and elaborations.

This Haggadah is both a comprehensive seminar into the entirety of the lore and instruction of the seder and a eye-catching travelogue back through time and space that our sages originally intended the seder to be for us and our children.

The JPS Commentary on the Haggadah, (The Jewish Publication Society Philadelphia) follows in the footsteps of all the JPS publications: serious and scholarly.

The actual text of the Haggadah seder, finely printed in clear, square Hebrew font, is accompanied by traditional, exegetical commentary.

But the magnet of this Haggadah attracting inquisitive minds and curious hearts is the 70-page introductory essay by renowned scholar Joseph Tabory, professor of Talmud at Bar-Ilan University in Israel and an Orthodox rabbi. The essay is titled The Haggadah and its Ritual. Its wide-ranging explorations are akin to a plunge into the middle of the lake of scholarship into the history of the Jewish people's attachment and relationship to this most seminal and beloved of sacred texts: the Haggadah. It is an excellent and exciting feeling.

The story of Pesach is the story of the Jewish people. These new Haggadot recount that story, our story, in new, ever-instructive ways.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

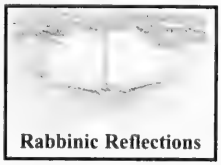
Blessing the sun, blessing life

By RABBI AARON LEVY



I'm not a morning person, but on April 8, I'll actually be excited to wake up before dawn. Yes, it's the morning before Passover begins, and I'll still have a long to-do list of cleaning and cooking to purge our home of chametz and prepare for the seders, but that's not why I'll rise with alacrity. Rather, it's the once-in-a-generation opportunity to say Birkat Hachamah – the blessing of the sun – that has me enthused.

The Talmud quotes an earlier rabbinic source that teaches: "One who sees the sun in its season says: 'Blessed is the One Who makes creation – Baruch oseh bereishit.'" The timing of "in its season" is explained as being when the sun returns to the same position it held at the start of its existence, on the fourth day of creation, which re-occurs every 28 years on a Wednesday in the spring. (Mark Mietkiewicz referenced some websites that elaborate on the technical details behind this calculation in his Jewish Highway columns in the past two issues of The CJN.)

Later Jewish law specifies the full text of this blessing – "Blessed are You, Eternal our God, Sovereign of the universe, who makes the work of creation" – and that this blessing should be recited upon observing the sun at sunrise or soon thereafter, until noon at the latest. Over the centuries, a short service grew around the blessing to include poetic selections from the Torah, Prophets, Psalms, Talmud, and the siddur.

Admittedly, part of my eagerness for Birkat Hachamah derives from the mere obscurity and infrequency of this mitzvah. Although I'm traditionally observant and make many blessings each day, I've never performed this ritual before, and I won't be able to do so again for quite some time. However, the identical words are also prescribed for viewing scenes of exceptional natural beauty such as lightning, mountains and rivers. As an avid hiker and traveller, I have felt inspired by my surroundings to pronounce this same blessing many times before. So the overall experience of Birkat Hachamah will be new for me, but its central component, the blessing, will not.

My excitement about Birkat Hachamah really stems from something deeper than its novelty. It's the Jewish opportunity and obligation to recognize how reliant we are on the sun – and by extension, God – for everything we have on our planet. In lighting our world, the sun provides a steady rhythm in time upon which humanity plays our great variety of tunes.

In Genesis, God says, "Let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate day from night; they shall serve as signs for the set times – the days and the years." It would be difficult to overstate the necessity of the sun. As science writer Oliver Morton recently put it in the New York Times, "An unending spate of pure luminous energy pours from the sun in all directions. Eight minutes downstream at the speed of light, part of this extraordinary flux crashes down on the Earth in a 170,000-trillion-watt torrent… It is this sunlight, endlessly refreshed, that allows the grass to grow, the birds to sing – and you to live."

Like all Jewish blessings, Birkat Hachamah can raise our consciousness of both the physical and the spiritual dimensions of life and sensitize us to the majesty of the natural world, which the Torah directs us to "serve and protect."

It'll be well worth waking up early to say Birkat Hachamah.

Rabbi Aaron Levy is organizing a new, grassroots, downtown Jewish community at the Kiever Synagogue in Toronto's Kensington Market.

Adding value to Pesach preparation

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

With Passover just around the corner, most of us are overwhelmed with our "to do" lists, guests lists, shopping lists, recipe lists and the piece of paper jammed into our pockets with our miscellaneous list. It's possible that only once we feel things are under control will we begin to remind ourselves that this is a holiday of freedom and was meant to be a celebration. Unfortunately, we usually feel things are under control just hours before the holiday begins.

When the preparation becomes more important than the holiday itself, we need to stop and ask ourselves very real questions about Jewish value and meaningfulness, and then infuse our preparations with these same values and meanings.

Many Jewish homes will gather their chametzdik goods and store them away securely out of sight. Some homeowners will sell their stored chametz by filling out a form with a Jewish institution, allowing a collective sale. Other homeowners may have non-Jewish friends that are familiar and comfortable taking part in a sale transaction for the food. Once Passover has ended, the sold goods revert back to their original owners and the chametz comes out of storage.

Much of the preparation for Passover is spent gathering all this chametz, finding the proper storage place and then stacking and securing all the foodstuffs. This is an ideal place in our preparations to have Jewish values inform the routine labour by introducing the value of tzedakah, charity.

Tzedakah is a large part of the Passover ritual. Near the beginning of our seders, we declare: "Anyone who is hungry should come and eat, anyone who needs [to participate in a seder] should come and celebrate Pesach with us." Our homes, doors and tables are ready and eager to welcome anyone in need. It makes perfect sense, since the holiday celebrates the change in destiny of those who were in most need to those who were most redeemed.

In fact, not only does it make perfect sense, but the very word for charity in Hebrew, tzedakah, doesn't actually mean charity, it means justice. It's not just that some people have more than they could ever use, while others don't have basic essentials. When we give tzedakah, we're contributing to justice in the world by attempting to strike a balance.

It has been widely practised in Jewish communities that when we're doing our Passover shopping, we pick up a few extra boxes of kosher-for-Passover food to donate to a Passover food drive. If we don't buy food, we make a financial donation. It's certainly an essential part of bringing value to our preparations, yet at that point, we have likely already put away our chametz.

The value of tzedakah can begin much earlier in our preparations. Rather than pack away our unopened chametzdik foods, we should consider donating these foods to a municipal food bank. We all know that financial times have made it more difficulty for families in need to feed themselves and their children. Instead of storing and selling, perhaps it's time to contribute to tzedakah and donate the chametz of our preparations and then continue with tzedakah as we donate Passover goods when we shop.

Passover isn't about keeping everything we have and creatively figuring out how to sell it. In fact, it's about understanding that freedom involves letting go of the things that encumber us in order to gain a broader view. What greater Jewish value can inform our preparations than the value of justice?

And, of course, Jewish text has already shown us the connection between Passover and tzedakah when it states that the midwives of Egypt not only disobeyed Pharaoh by not killing the baby boys as instructed, but they "kept them alive." The midrash explains the meaning of this by saying that the midwives were carrying tzedakah from house to house. When a wealthy woman gave birth, food was given from that house and brought to the house of a poor woman.

Within the tremendous injustices of Egypt, a tiny flicker of tzedakah informed our story, so it's only just that it inform our own Passover preparations.

Archeology in Israel, Part 2

By ALEX GROPPER

Jewish interest in the archeology of Israel began as early as 1913, in the last days of Ottoman rule, when the Jewish Palestine Exploration Society first met. (This organization became the Israel Exploration Society in 1948).

Before the founding of the Jewish Palestine Exploration Society, the investigation of the material remains of ancient Israel had been the exclusive preserve of foreign scholars. World War I put a temporary halt to the fledgling institution's aspirations. But by 1920, the society once more reconstituted itself under the British Mandate and began to vigorously pursue its goals.

Past Forward

The society set up committees of financially supportive Jews in the United States, London, Paris, The Hague, and even Egypt. By the mid-1920s, it was involved in a number of excavations, including Jerusalem, where archeologist Eleazar Sukenik, the father of archeologist Yigael Yadin, started working under its auspices.

It was this era between the two world wars that would see the start of what would become the foundations of Israeli archeology. Besides Sukenik, other scholars such as Benjamin Mazar (formerly Maisler) of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which had been formed in 1925, would undertake the excavation of a number of crucial Jewish sites. All of this was going on despite Arab uprisings between 1929 and 1931.

Mazar began his career excavating the sites of Ramat Rahel, outside of Jerusalem, and Beit Shearim, noted for housing Jewish catacombs from the time of the Sanhedrin. Mazar, along with Sukenik, would go on to become one of the founders of the renowned Institute of Archaeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He would also go on to become one of the university's early presidents. But it was his excavation of the Temple Mound in the late 1960s and '70s that would gain Mazar worldwide recognition.

His whole family was infused with his passion. His nephew, Ami, is a renowned archeologist who became the head of the Institute of Archaeology at the Hebrew University and his granddaughter, Elat, is also quite well-known in archeological circles and beyond. She has continued her grandfather's work in Jerusalem, where she is heading some of the excavations at the City of David. She has recently found a structure that has been touted by some as being King David's palace.

In its early years, in addition to its excavations, the Jewish Palestine Exploration Society was also involved in other important work, such as publications, lectures, conferences and gathering artifacts for what would become the basis of the Israel Museum's important collection. Barely 10 years after its establishment, the society released a number of important publications, including two volumes of the Qobetz series and a detailed study of the 160 caves in the Jerusalem region. By 1933, the Qobetz series was replaced by Yediot, or the Bulletin of Jewish Palestine Exploration Society. In 1968, it in turn was replaced by Qadmoniot, or the Quarterly for the Antiquities of Eretz-Yisrael and Bible Lands.

Despite the onset of World War II, and the real danger of a possible invasion of Palestine by Rommel's Afrika Korps, the various activities of the archeological community continued uninterrupted throughout the war years. There was even a major conference in Jerusalem in 1943, attended by scholars and the general public. The archeological community's activities also continued during the turmoil surrounding the birth of the State of Israel in May 1948. With the achievement of independence in 1948, the society, under the leadership of Benjamin Mazar, officially became the Israel Exploration Society.

The newly created Jewish state was poised to undergo an explosion of archeological activity shortly after its birth. Archeological excavation would become a national pastime in Israel, and the excavators themselves would become household names in the new Jewish state.

Variations on flour and water

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Flour and water. How complicated could a matzah be? Plenty.

Many of us grew up crunching through boxes of square wheat-flour matzah. Nowadays, however, supermarket shelves are laden with many varieties of matzah. Today, a Passover Matzah Primer. (The laws of Passover are particularly complex. If you plan to deviate from your usual practice, consult your local rabbi and if necessary, your allergist.)

The Jewish Highway

(1) What does the Torah say?

It all started in Exodus where we are commanded to "eat matzah for seven days. By the first day, you must have your homes cleared of all leaven." (Exodus 12:15) Sounds simple enough. [tinyurl.com/matzah02]

(2) What if I can't stomach wheat flour?

For many years, wheat was virtually the only flour used in commercial matzah. However, the Torah actually also allows matzah made from barley, rye, oats and spelt. This can be a relief for people who are not able to digest wheat gluten. [tinyurl.com/matzah04]

GlutenFreeOatMatzos.com makes matzah from completely gluten-free oats grown in Scotland. Closer to home, LakewoodMatzoh.com sells gluten-free out and spelt matzah. [tinyurl.com/ matzah06] And just because you can't stomach gluten doesn't mean you have to be without matzah balls. Here's a recipe that substitutes matzah meal with almond meal and potato starch. [tinyurl.com/matzah16]

(3) I'm fine with wheat. But what can I do to avoid chemicals and pesticides?

I found only one reference to organic matzah online, at Chicago's Shmura Matzah Factory. [tinyurl.com/matzah03] When I last checked the factory's website, it wasn't working, but I found an archival copy of the site. [tinyurl.com/matzah05]

(4) What about egg matzah?

Much has been written about the symbolic meaning of matzah. "The characteristic of leavened dough (chametz) is that it rises and swells, symbolizing pride and boastfulness. A matzah, on the other hand, is thin and flat, suggesting meekness and humility. Passover teaches us that chametz – arrogance – is the very antithesis of the ideal of Torah." [tinyurl.com/matzah07] Tied into this issue of humility, Jews are required to eat plain flour and water matzah in order to fulfil the mitzvah on seder nights. But what about the rest of the holiday? Here's where things get complicated, since there are different rules for Ashkenazi Jews (more restrictive) and Sephardim (less restrictive). [tinyurl.com/matzah01]

(5) Does matzah have to be so hard?

For Ashkenazim, yes, that's the tradition. Once again, it seems that Sephardim have the edge here with soft matzah. [tinyurl.com/matzah10] I came across one blogger who describes the texture and taste of soft matzah. One key difference is that "they come frozen, and you are not supposed to let them defrost until five minutes before you are going to eat them, or else they will go stale." [tinyurl. com/matzah09]

(6) How much do I have to eat?

On the seder night, the minimum amount is based on the volume equivalent to that of an olive, known as a "kezayit." A kezayit is roughly two-thirds of a square matzah or one half of a handmade round matzah. [tinyurl.com/matzah11] If that sounds like more than you want to eat, you may be in luck. Researchers from Bar-Ilan University's archeological botanics lab have been analyzing ancient olives. They maintain that the ancient Syrian and Nabali strains were smaller than today's olives. If rabbinically endorsed, this would be good news for those who have trouble digesting too much of the unleavened bread. [tinyurl.com/matzah13]

(7) How much weight will I gain?

A single one-ounce plain matzah contains approximately 120 to130 calories. It has about one gram of dietary fibre, little fat and no cholesterol or sugar. A single whole-wheat matzah has about 100 calories and three grams of dietary fibre. [tinyurl.com/matzah12]

(8) Are there any good matzah jokes?

A Jewish man was eating his Pesach in the park. A blind man came by and sat down next to him on the bench. Feeling neighbourly, the Jewish man passed a sheet of matzah to him. The blind man ran his fingers over the matzah for a few minutes, looked puzzled, and finally exclaimed, "Who wrote this nonsense?" [tinyurl.com/matzah14]

Teaching without being too 'teachy'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sara Borer, a music therapist by profession, has been a madrichah for Birthright Israel and a counsellor at Camp George.

"They are our teachers..."

Now she brings informal education to her teenage students at the First Narayever Congregation. "Basically we sit around a table in a circle, or on the floor," Borer said in an interview. "The students come in, take off their shoes and they plunk themselves down."

Her ability to communicate through music "enriches her teaching significantly," said Rabbi Ed Elkin, the shul's spiritual leader, who hired her. As well, he said, she brings "great warmth and enthusiasm" to the two groups of teenagers she meets with once a week at the downtown synagogue.

A graduate of United Synagogue Day School and Earl Haig Secondary School's music program, Borer – now the 29-year-old stay-at-home mother of a one-year-old daughter – was president of the Jewish Students' Association when she attended Wilfrid Laurier University.

From a Jewish perspective, high school was a formative experience for her, she said. Going from a Jewish environment to a mostly non-Jewish one forced her to make decisions about issues such as taking time off for Sukkot when most of the other Jewish students weren't, and when most of her teachers had never heard of the holiday.

A lesson from the teacher: "I prefer to think of teaching as mentoring, in a way. I think students will learn a lot more from what they see me do rather than from what I say. They can see that I'm excited about Judaism, and that's a positive thing."

Borer has continued her Jewish education informally over the years though lectures, talks and discussions. She and her husband, Terry, whom she met at Earl Haig, try to keep up with Israeli pop culture and politics, she said.

In Rabbi Elkin's view, Borer models for her students "that a Diaspora Jewish person can master Hebrew and live a life here that is filled with love for the Hebrew language" and for Israel.

Borer said she does a lot of singing with her students. Although she plays piano and guitar, and dabbles in flute, viola and percussion, her voice is her "major instrument," she said.

"I bring in songs that are adaptations of prayers. We would learn the songs, then talk about the prayers."

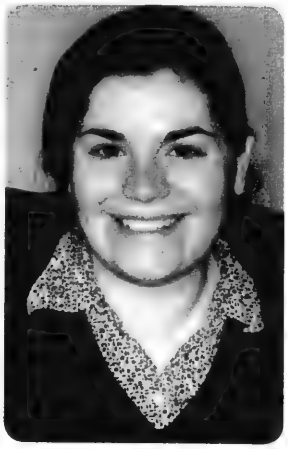
A favourite of hers is Debbie Friedman's Asher Yatzar/Elohai, which combines the blessing recited after using the bathroom with a daily morning prayer thanking God for one's soul.

She sees it as a good springboard for discussion about Judaism not "denying the body in order to nourish the spirit."

As an informal educator, her biggest challenge is "actually teaching students something in a way they don't feel is too 'teachy,'" Borer said.

"Informal education is not linear. You see pockets of knowledge that aren't connected... It's tempting sometimes to say, 'Let's go back to the basics and fill in the gaps.'"

"We do the pockets of knowledge, and as much as possible we try to connect them."



Sara Borer

Borer hopes that her efforts will inspire students to seek further knowledge.

Every so often, she runs an "everything you wanted to know about Judaism but didn't have time to ask" class. As a rule, she finds teens are most interested in contemporary issues and how Judaism fits into life.

Although her classes are small – she has one group of four 13-, 14- and 15-year-olds, and another group of seven 16-to-18-year-olds – Borer said she believes it's "worth nurturing" even very small numbers of kids.

Greater Toronto Area

Mercaz cuts hurt Jewish unity, continuity

By JACK LIPINSKY

Guest Voice

I used to feel such anticipation before the annual city-wide professional development day for teachers sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Mercaz/ Board of Jewish Education.

Of course, this day provided the opportunity to learn from noted Jewish and non-Jewish intellectuals and educators, as well as a forum for discovery and the discussion of new approaches to student engagement. But best of all was the energy that filled the room from the diversity of the Jewish day school educators who attended. Men in kippot srugot (crocheted kippot) sat next to women in jeans, while observant women with a variety of head coverings mingled with men with uncovered heads.

There was unity in our diversity.

On those annual PD days, one could see the multiple faces of our community and the broad agreement among very diverse polities on the seminal role of Jewish education.

This idyllic portrait of Jewish education will soon be a memory.

In an entirely unanticipated move earlier this month, the federation eviscerated the Mercaz, the communal co-ordinating agency and clearing house that has served our community for almost 60 years — most of those years under its previous moniker, the Board of Jewish Education.

What the Mercaz lacked in coercive power was compensated for by the creativity of its leadership. They pioneered and co-ordinated events that showcased Jewish education's best product – our students and their many talents. The showcases included events such as the Chidon Hatanach (Bible Contest), Zimriya, Rikudiya and creative writing contests. In short, the Mercaz ensured a celebration of our children's intellectual, artistic and physical talents in ways that rose above communal segmentation.

The Mercaz also constantly strove to improve teacher training, curriculum delivery and professional knowledge to ensure that Jewish day and supplementary teachers could deliver Jewish studies in a vital manner that engages students.

This is the bedrock of Jewish survival in the Diaspora.

As if this were not enough, the Mercaz was also in charge of teacher training and categorization, which determines the salaries of a large number of Jewish day and supplementary school teachers.

Against these facts, the decision to eviscerate the Mercaz was both poorly planned and organizationally imprudent.

The federation informed the community in its news release that their decision was the result of ongoing discussions and had nothing to do with the economy. The federation emphasizes this: that what they called "restructuring" and what I consider to be the destruction of the vital underpinning of Jewish continuity in our community was carefully planned and had nothing to do with the horrible state of the economy.

The claim that the schools themselves will somehow take on extracurricular activities is belied by the educators interviewed in The CJN's story about the cuts. All of them seemed surprised by the downloading of services. It seems that federation planners overlooked consulting with these key stakeholders.

What the federation hails as "capacity building" is simply duplicating services without offering a central planning agency. Indeed, "capacity building" only fuels an institutional desire, if not also a need, to expand to incorporate the service delivery that has been newly delegated to them.

Federation president David Koschitzsky explained: "Our new approach demonstrates confidence in Toronto's excellent day schools. Our modern, dynamic educators have reached the point where they do not need us to deliver services."

This is news to me.

I have considerable experience in education. I've won three teaching awards, earned a doctorate related to pedagogy, and written a textbook and curriculum. When the day comes that I don't need professional development, it will be time for me to quit the profession. Even experienced teachers – in both day and supplementary schools – constantly need the tools to help place before our students a vision of why being Jewish is relevant. We are the classroom defenders and champions of Jewish continuity!

But why should federation ask the stakeholders in the classes when it apparently did not ask the main funders of education either – that is, the parents of children in the schools? Surely parents paying thousands of dollars for their children's' education are also concerned about the standards and quality of the education in the various schools that were supported by the staff of the Mercaz.

No one at federation has spoken about the future of the Board of License beyond vague statements that perhaps York University's Faculty of Jewish Education might get involved in this and some other functions of the former Mercaz.

The Board of License is responsible for evaluating most Jewish studies teachers' credentials. It attempts to ensure professional standards and establish remuneration categories for teachers. Teachers go to the board to obtain their teacher category when they graduate from teacher training or arrive in Toronto. Many return frequently to be re-categorized after taking professional development courses often under Mercaz auspices.

I am a member of the board. We spent almost a year completely updating teacher categories to reflect important changes in teacher training both here and in Israel. Who will do this in September?

'Seder for solidarity' serves diverse population

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee is hosting its 10th annual Passover seder on April 9, the night of the second seder.

Jacqueline Stein, who is organizing the event in collaboration with Habonim Congregation, said she expects between 125 and 130 people, both Jews and non-Jews, the majority of whom live on the streets or in subsidized housing.

The theme of the event is a "seder for solidarity" she said.

"I want the Jewish public to know that unified communities where religious and cultural differences are not only accepted but also celebrated is a model of the present and of the future."

The traditional, kosher seder – most of the food is donated – will be led by Habonim's religious leader, Eli Rubenstein, and will be inclusive, she said. "It gives people a better understanding of Jewish culture and history."

In keeping with the theme, she is planning a photo exhibition to be displayed at the seder about Toronto's diverse communities.

"We're having a photographer go out and take pictures throughout the city. We want the people to have a sense of what's going on in the city and who their neighbours are."

The seder has a strong following, and many of its guests look forward to it each year. "People do come because of the meal, but they also come because they have an appreciation for the event and what it stands for," she said.

"There is no assigned seating, because we want friends to sit together. With entertainment for the children, there is an air of liveliness throughout the evening."

She has spread word about the seder at shelters throughout the city, and agencies such as Jewish Family & Child pass on information to their clients, said Stein.

To find out more about the seder – there are a number of spots available for synagogue members and paying guests – call 416-964-7698.

PESACH PREPARATIONS: Pesach preparations are in full swing at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus. Last week, senior kindergarten students teamed up with their Grade 6 buddies to create papier-mâché seder plates that will have pride of place at their family seders. Mercaz should not be eviscerated

Every significant academic study has linked Jewish education with Jewish continuity. In a world where Googling competes with and threatens the authority of traditional modes of educational delivery, we must package Jewish education in as many wrappings as possible to maximize "buy-in" among students and parents alike. Federation's concern for Jewish continuity should translate into policies that strengthen Jewish education. The Mercaz decision weakens education in our community.

Administrators struggling with declining enrolment, diminishing budgets, differentiating their programs from others, and the challenges of running their own institutions lack the time and vision to plan for the whole community.

Teachers "in the trenches" who spend hours marking and planning also lack the time and expertise for central educational planning.

We need the Mercaz. It may have to be streamlined, but not eviscerated. Jewish continuity deserves better.

McGill students defy anti-Israel environment

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — In a campus atmosphere frequently permeated by anti-Israel sentiment, students came together to celebrate Israel and its culture.

Some 100 McGill University students recently gathered for I-Fest, an annual festival sponsored by Hillel McGill. Students enjoyed Israeli food and music at Gert's, the campus bar, while improving their knowledge of Israel.

Although the event took place during Israeli Apartheid Week as a response to the anti-Israel organizations that sought to cast the Jewish state as a racist entity, organizers of I-Fest stressed that the event was not meant to be political or religious.

Seen beside the Israeli hall of fame at the recent Hillel-sponsored I-Fest are Arielle Strub, left, and Victoria Shore.

"We did it on purpose during Israeli Apartheid Week, so there would be another option," said Shayla Young, a second-year business student from Toronto who co-chaired the event.

"It caused people to think about Israel in ways other than religion or politics," added Alison Currie, a second-year sociology student who just started attending Hillel events this year.

"It's a rare occasion for people to celebrate Israel, not in a religious or political sense. It was just to have fun," Currie said.

The evening featured free falafel and an acoustic performance by Tara Hall, a McGill-based band, who performed in front of a backdrop for Mike's Place, a well-known Jerusalem bar. The venue was decorated with Israel-related displays, including a model of the Western Wall and an Israeli hall of fame that included poet Yehuda Amichai, architect Moshe Safdie and filmmaker Ari Folman.

Other activities included printing Hebrew T-shirts and getting a bookmark with one's Hebrew name. The event also featured displays by MASA and the Bronfman Israel Experience Centre, organizations that facilitate travel to Israel and helped defray the costs of the event.

This year's I-Fest was the fourth annual event of its kind, and the second to be held at Gert's. According to the event's organizers, the venue was chosen for its proximity and convenience.

"We decided to do it in Gert's because it's on campus and people know about it. It's also a smaller place and more intimate," said Sara Collis, a second-year management student from Toronto who helped organize the event.

Although some of the event's organizers thought that the publicity for next year's I-Fest could be improved, by and large they were happy with the turnout. According to their estimates, about half of the attendees were newcomers to Hillel-sponsored activities.

"We thought it was a great turnout, especially considering the Israeli Apartheid Week activities that have been taking place," Young said.

"I think it went great this year," Collis added. "There were plenty of new faces, both Jews and non-Jews. But I'd like to see even more people out next year."

Joint project discussed

MONTREAL — The agriculture departments of McGill University and Hebrew University of Jerusalem are discussing the creation of a joint project that would help the impoverished African country of Malawi feed itself.

Eli Feinerman, dean of Hebrew U's faculty of agriculture, food and environment, was in Montreal recently for talks with Chandra Madramootoo, dean of McGill's faculty of agricultural and environmental sciences.

Principal funding for the project is expected to come from the Canadian International Development Agency. McGill and Hebrew U's agriculture departments have not engaged in formal co-operation in about 20 years.

McMaster initiative seeks to lessen tension

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — As universities across the country try to defuse hostilities between pro-Palestinian groups and Jewish students, McMaster University in Hamilton has brokered a peace deal that it hopes will lessen tensions.

The "McMaster Peace Initiative" was signed earlier this month by university president Peter George and representatives of McMaster Muslims for Peace and Justice, the Jewish Students Association, the Muslim Student Association, Israel on Campus and the McMaster Jewish Faculty Association.

The groups have agreed that in the event of any hate or intimidation incidents, the promotion of hatred, property damage or acts endangering the safety of others on campus that a joint response will be issued to condemn the act. The agreement also includes plans to foster balanced discussion on Mideast issues.

> 'We decided to bring groups together'

"We decided to do something no one else had thought to do before: speak to the groups and bring them together," said Milé Komlen, director of McMaster's office of human rights and equity services. "Instead of demonization and dehumanization, this puts a face on the other. It engages the groups to move to understand each other."

Komlen said future steps might include course work on the Middle East conflict or summer sessions on peace studies, as well as engaging the mainstream campus community in a "solution-finding process."

Hamilton police ran a hate crimes investigation into incidents last year at McMaster during Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW). Held annually at campuses around the world, the event likens Israel's treatment of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza to South Africa's treatment of non-whites during the apartheid era.

At McMaster, pro-Palestinian students handed out what was perceived by many Jewish students to be "inflammatory" literature. Orders for a banner to be removed led to demands for free speech from anti-Israel event organizers, who held a protest rally over the issue.

At the rally, protesters allegedly intimidated a number of Jewish students, with some people yelling slogans such as, "Death to Jews" and "Viva jihad." Some students were also allegedly accosted in the library by protesters.

Police couldn't proceed with charges, however, as they couldn't gather enough proof of individual identity or motive.

This year's IAW events earlier this month at McMaster were toned down, which some attribute to the peace initiative.

But Dr. Lawrence Hart, a CJN columnist as well as an associate professor in the school's faculty of health sciences and president of the McMaster Jewish Faculty Association, is troubled by the very name of the event.

"We had difficulty trying to impress upon the administration the abomination of the terminology 'Israeli apartheid' and how offensive and hurtful it is to Jewish students," said Hart, who is a native of South Africa. "If they are not willing to move aside from that, until then, no document is going to be enforceable."

Komlen described the IAW event as a way for student groups to bring attention to their issues.

"It may be offensive to certain communities, but it's in the context of a university and freedom of expression," he said.

Despite his concerns, Hart signed the peace initiative document and said that he hopes it will help the university community "get away from the demonization and delegitimization of Israel and move on to scholarly discourse."

He added that "it indicates a commitment on the part of the administration to do things differently" and said "great credit goes to the administration for taking part in this process. We really made some progress – as long as the principles and spirit of the document are respected."

He cautioned that the litmus test will be whether the document is enforced.

With news last week that York University is forming a task force to find ways to solve conflicts between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian factions on that campus, Komlen hopes McMaster's initiative will be a model for other institutions.

"We are eager to provide an example of what can be done when groups come together in a good faith effort to embrace their differences and engage in difficult discussions," he said. "People at McMaster are optimistic it may promote a lot of hope for students and the broader community. The hard work begins now."

York to probe clashes

JTA

York University announced last week that it will launch a probe into recent clashes on campus relating to the Middle East.

On March 16, York president Mamdouh Shoukri announced the creation of the Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community. It will be composed of seven faculty members and seven students and/or alumni from the university. It's slated to deliver a preliminary report to Shoukri by Aug. 31.

York University said it formed the task force "to review concerns about the student environment" on campus.

The move was welcomed by Jewish students and communal leaders.

Jewish students have complained of a toxic atmosphere on campus arising from Israel's recent military incursion into the Gaza Strip.

On Feb. 11, about 100 anti-Israel protesters barricaded Jewish students in a Hillel lounge and shouted anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs. Police were forced to escort Jewish students from the lounge to ensure their safety.

Other anti-Semitic incidents, including graffiti and verbal attacks, continue to be reported on campus.

"Recent events on campus have raised serious concerns over whether our most cherished values and commitments are being undermined by excessive conflict, intolerance and even intimidation," said the task force's terms of reference.

"We are pleased that the university hastaken into account the deep concerns expressed by our community," said David Koschitzky, chair of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"We will lend support to this task force with the expectation that it will lead to a campus that respects civil discourse and the fair enforcement of the rules," said Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel at York.

"We also urge the York administration to address the immediate safety concerns affecting Jewish students on campus prior to the Aug. 31 deadline of this task force," he said.

Speaking to The CJN last week, Rob Tiffin, York's vice-president of students, said the university is encouraging students and alumni who are interested in serving on the task force to submit letters of intent by Friday, March 27.

Patrick Monahan, the dean of Osgoode Hall Law School who will become York's provost on July 1, will lead the task force.

According to the university's terms of reference, the task force's primary mandate will be to develop "principled recommendations that reflect this university's unwavering commitment to fundamental values of free expression, free inquiry, and respect for genuine diversity of thought and opinion."

The terms of reference lay out the following questions for the task force to answer:

- "Are the university's current policies and practices adequate to ensure that the free exchange of ideas can occur in an environment free of discrimination, harassment or intimidation?"
- "Are there measures that can and should be undertaken to enhance the learning environment for students at York, both inside and outside of the classroom?"
- "How do we provide opportunities for students to be intellectually challenged, exposed to provocative issues and discussions, and encouraged to examine their beliefs and decisions?"
- "Are the university's current policies and practices regarding the use of community space by individuals and groups appropriate?
- "How should the university respond to incidents or behaviours that do not meet the community's expectations with respect to tolerance of and respect for diversity of views of members of the York community?"

Student elections held at York

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Elections for the York Federation of Students, held March 17 to 20, resulted in the defeat of candidates for York Forward, a slate that had opposed members of the old YFS executive for supporting the recent 12-week strike by York University teaching assistants and for having what slate members said is an anti-Israel bias.

All but one of the 16 candidates who ran for YFS positions under the York Forward banner were defeated.

Based on an unratified vote count, the slate Students First – led by outgoing YFS vice-president of equity Krisna Saravanamuttu, who was running for council president – won all the key executive positions, YFS chief returning officer Casey Chu Cheong said Monday.

Official results and vote tallies were unavailable at The CJN's deadline.

Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel at York and a York Forward candidate, won his race to represent the Schulich School of Business on YFS. He said he's happy he won, but suggested that "the integrity of the electoral process" was compromised.

"Many of the concerns stem from the use of a paper balloting system, which has few checks and balances. The ballots aren't numbered, and the elections process is administered by those that are currently in government and not an independent third party," Ferman said.

"People also mysteriously disappeared from the voters list. Many people were told they voted when they had not. In one case, a student was told they voted at a time when they purchased something downtown and have the receipt to prove it."

Ferman added that York Forward is evaluating its options before making a decision about appealing the results or demanding a recount.

MIND, BODY, ATTITUDE: Girls from three local BBYO chapters took part in the group's "Mind, Body, Attitude" overnight program on March 7 at BBYO's teen lounge in North York. Designed to promote physical, mental, and emotional well-being, the teen-led program covered self-defence, conflict management, and healthy lifestyle choices.

A SPECIAL HAGGADAH: Junior kindergarten students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive dressed as characters from the Passover story and learned about the holiday by re-enacting different scenes from the story. Pictures of each scene were taken and will be used to illustrate a special child-friendly Haggadah that the students will use at their model seder on March 31 and bring home for use at their family seders.

Everyday relations are chilly

Rabbi Scheier said this is not unusual. Almost 350 anti-Semitic or anti-Zionist articles have run in the Venezuelan media over the past year.

The Jews that Rabbi Scheier met also feel their everyday relations with fellow citizens have become chilly, and they feel isolated. They reminisced about a time not many years ago when they enjoyed warm relations with non-Jews. The Jewish students even played sports with local Muslim children.

The arrests of 11 suspects, including seven police officers, that were made after the Jan. 31 attack on the Tiferet Israel Synagogue was only for the sake of appearances to the world, Rabbi Scheier thinks.

Despite Chavez's denial that he is anti-Semitic and that the government is behind the incidents at Jewish institutions, Rabbi Scheier believes Chavez "clearly does not like Jews" and with his "messianic ambitions," he is a dangerous figure.

Rabbi Scheier is calling on the Canadian government to register an official protest with the Venezuelan government, condemn the Venezuelan government in international forums, and demand an independent investigation of the attacks on the Jewish community. Canada should also consider economic sanctions against Venezuela, he said.

He noted that the declaration of the international parliamentary conference on anti-Semitism, held last month in London, England, calls on governments to respond to violations of the rights of Jews everywhere.

Rabbi Scheier said he has spoken with his local MP for Westmount-Ville Marie, Liberal Marc Garneau, to discuss his concerns, and has asked for a meeting with Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon and Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs (Americas).

Rabbi Scheier was a student of Rabbi Weiss' Yeshivat Chovevei Torah in New York. Rabbi Weiss, who heads the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in the Bronx, is a veteran Jewish activist and the founder of Amcha. Rabbi Herzfeld is the spiritual leader of Ohev Sholom, known as the National Synagogue, in Washington. Both have warned recently in the Jewish press against staying silent about the perilous situation facing Jews in Venezuela.

The Jews, they say, are the most vulnerable in Chavez's campaign to intimidate any possible opposition to his regime.

Rabbi Scheier arrived in Caracas at midnight and left the following midnight. He was accompanied by private security for his entire stay.

In conversations with not only the Jewish community, but ordinary people such as hotel workers and airport staff, Rabbi Scheier said got the impression that Venezuela has become "a lawless society," with things getting so bad that people drive through red lights at night because to stop might invite criminals.

The three rabbis held a press conference while in Caracas, which was attended by representatives of local and foreign media, although Rabbi Scheier is not aware if any of it was reported.

They requested a meeting with a government official, but did not hear back from anyone, he said.

'Terry belonged to entire community'

"We gather here because Terry belonged to all, to the entire Ottawa Jewish community and beyond," Rabbi Garten said.

Rabbi Popky spoke of Schwarzfeld as a true Woman of Valour and outlined her qualities by quoting from the words of the prayer and applying them to how she had lived her life.

Originally from Regina, Schwarzfeld was the eldest child of the late Abel and Elaine Schwarzfeld – her mother and grandmother were both CHW members – she had lived in Vancouver and graduated from the University of British Columbia prior to moving to Ottawa with her husband, Stephen Cotsman.

The large number of people paying tribute to Schwarzfeld came from all areas of her very active life. In addition to many family members, there were friends and colleagues from CHW, including some who had travelled from Montreal and Toronto, and those who had accompanied her when she went hiking, cross-country skiing, dragon boat racing or any of her other favourite activities. Also in attendance were Glyne Murray, high commissioner to Canada for Barbados, and Leroy McClean, Barbados' consul general in Toronto.

Schwarzfeld's childhood friend, Toronto lawyer Ruth Mesbur, spoke movingly of their lifelong friendship, noting that even in their childhood games, Schwarzfeld always took a leadership role.

Other fond memories were shared by Schwarzfeld's sister Audrey, son Adam, and her CHW friend and colleague, Debbie Baylin.

Tributes to Schwarzfeld were read by Toby Yan, honorary national vice-president of CHW; Marla Dan, first vice-president of CHW who was appointed national president of CHW upon Schwarzfeld's death; and Helena Glazer, president of World WIZO.

In her memory, the organization has named a project in Acco, Israel, after her: the Terry Schwarzfeld Ottawa Day Care Centre. Donations to the centre can be made through the Ottawa office of CHW at 613-798-7644 or at www.chw.ca.

Schwarzfeld is survived by her husband, Stephen; her sons David, Adam and Simon; David's wife, Luana, and their son, Benjamin; and by her four siblings and their families.

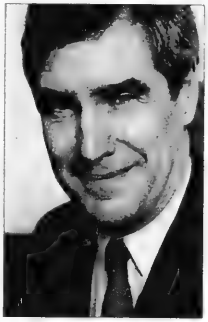
'You are not alone,' Ignatieff tells students

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Federal Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff told Jewish university students that he understands their pain when Israel is condemned unfairly, but he urged them to "not close down" and to reach out to those whose opinions differ from theirs – although he drew the line at those who accuse who equate Israel with apartheid.

Ignatieff was the guest at a March 13 Shabbat dinner hosted by the Hillel students association, part of a series of activities highlighting Israel that Hillel is sponsoring on campuses during March in the wake of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW).



Michael Ignatieff

A week earlier, Ignatieff published an article in the National Post condemning IAW as unfair criticism because it portrays the very existence of the Jewish state as illegitimate.

He echoed that opinion at the dinner, saying that accusing Israel of practising apartheid is not only false but a "delegitimization" of the state, and therefore unacceptable.

He said it's the responsibility of university administrations to ensure that those students who support Israel can do so comfortably, and of elected officials to speak up, adding that writing his article "did not take much courage."

Ignatieff, a former academic, told the students that in a multicultural society, they must accept that there are going to be people who do not agree with them and that "intellectual freedom works both ways."

He said he realized this might be hard for young Jews to accept criticism of Israel when they bear the knowledge that their people were "incinerated" for being Jews.

In any event, Ignatieff said he doesn't believe Jewish students will turn inward, because the Jewish people have continued to be open to others, despite having been persecuted through their history.

His basic message, he said, is, "You are not alone."

Ultimately, he said his concern is that Canada "work" despite the challenges of a diverse population.

In other parts of his off-the-cuff talk, he deplored the "state-sanctioned anti-Semitism" of the Iranian and Venezuelan governments.

During a question period, he declined to outline any specific policies on Jewish settlements or the status of Jerusalem. He said that the resolution of those issues is up to the people directly involved, Palestinians and Israelis.

Canada can only "facilitate" the process, he said.

One student asked under what conditions the Liberal party would condemn an Israeli government action, and why he should vote Liberal instead of Conservative. Essentially, Ignatieff responded, the Liberal party's policy on the Arab-Israeli conflict has not changed in 50 or 60 years, which is that it favours a two-state solution.

Palestinians, like Israelis, must also feel secure within their final borders, he added.

Personally, he said, he has grappled with the problems of the Middle East for 40 years.

Ignatieff was clear that Canada must not deal with Hamas because of its terrorism, but it must help rebuild Gaza because it is not in Israel's interest to have a "devastated" neighbour where more radicalism can arise.

Ignatieff opened his talk by expressing a profound admiration for Jews' attachment to their traditions and for Jewish values. He deplored any expression of anti-Semitism.

About 200 people attended the dinner held at the downtown Opus Hotel, which was co-sponsored by Liberal Concordia, the Quebec-Israel Committee and National Jewish Campus Life. Also among the guests were Montreal Liberal MPs Irwin Cotler, Marc Garneau and Marlene Jennings, and Senator Yoine Goldstein.

In introducing Ignatieff, Samantha Banks, president of Hillel Montreal, said that many Hillel members "endure a constant struggle against those who seek to demonize the State of Israel. For those of us who choose to speak out in defence of the Jewish homeland, the importance of public support and encouragement from a Canadian leader of Mr. Ignatieff's status cannot be overstated.

"Through his outspoken criticism of IAW, Mr. Ignatieff has shown tremendous courage and extraordinary compassion in advocating for the right of Jewish students to enjoy a campus life free of harassment and intimidation."

A small group of protesters, identifying themselves as members of Young Jews for Social Justice, picketed outside the hotel before the dinner. They handed out flyers criticizing Ignatieff for supporting "the Israeli government's violations of basic Palestinian human rights" and "pandering to right-wing Jewish groups like B'nai Brith and the Quebec-Israel Committee, which don't represent all Jews."

Canadian Jews and the Six Day War with Harold Troper
University of Toronto, Ontario Institute for Studies in Education
Sunday, March 29 | 7:30 pm

The 1967 Six Day War was a watershed event in Israel's history, dramatically affecting Jews in the Middle East as well as around the world. Award-winning Professor Harold Troper will explore how Canadian Jews experienced the events preceding, during and following the Six Day War, and will explain how those experiences altered that community. This lecture commemorates the yortzayt for Elka Klein z"l (1965-2005), a historian who specialized in medieval Jewish history.

Sex, drugs, rock 'n' roll was mifgash's theme

Compiled by CJN staff

Members of Eastern Canadian Region United Synagogue Youth gathered at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue recently for their annual Winter Mifgash.

This theme of this year's Winter Mifgash, held from March 13 to 15, was Sex, Drugs, Rock 'n' Roll: The Issues That Change Our World.

United Synagogue Youth (USY) is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ).

Among mifgash attendees were representatives from chapters of eastern Canadian region across Ontario and Quebec. Event co-chair Kylie Katz is part of the Beth Jacob USY chapter in Hamilton, and co-chair Simcha Walfish is a member of the Agudath Israel chapter in Ottawa.

As part of USY tradition, participants raised money for their Social Action Tikkun Olam (SATO) projects. SATO provides money to charitable causes USYers chose, as well as summer-program scholarships. Participants at Winter Mifgash raised money for Libi, an Israeli organization that provides support to members of the Israel Defence Forces, and for Feed the Children.

The teens also participated in a special program with Jewish Women's International, When Push Comes to Shove, dealing with dating violence. The teens learned about breaking stereotypes around dating and domestic violence and learned valuable skills for helping their peers and recognizing dangerous situations.

The topics discussed at the conference, including smoking, body image, homosexuality and abuse, were chosen by the USY board and co-chairs.

Rabbi Jennifer Gorman, director of Youth Activities for the Canadian Region of USCJ, said that "USY provides a safe space for Jewish teenagers to share issues and values that are important to them, learning without judgment."

It wasn't all learning, though. Participants were treated to a night out at the eZone, a sports and entertainment complex, plus they viewed a program on music censorship called Banned in Britain, created by the convention's co-chairs.

British MP banned in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Organizers of the tour that was to feature outspoken British MP George Galloway say they will launch a court challenge to overturn a decision by the Canadian Border Services Agency (CBSA) to bar the controversial figure from entering Canada.

Laith Marouf, national branches coordinator of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, told Canadian Press that "our hope is the decision will be overturned in the courts when it actually looks at the merits of the decision of the government."

The Federal Court challenge was to be launched earlier this week. A spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney said the minister would not exercise his discretion to exempt Galloway from the CBSA decision to bar him as a security risk.

Marouf said that should legal efforts fail, Galloway supporters will attempt to accompany the MP over the border from the United States, where he is on a speaking tour.

"One way or another, we will bring George Galloway to Canada," Marouf said. "We have already been overwhelmed by messages of support, and we're currently planning a delegation of MPs, lawyers and activists to escort Mr. Galloway from the United States across the Canadian border. We plan to challenge this ban directly."

In a news release, James Clark, a spokesperson for the Toronto Coalition to Stop the War, called the decision to bar Galloway "a full frontal attack on free speech in Canada and one that all supporters of civil liberties must challenge. Kenney's ban is an unprecedented move to censor someone whose views are critical of our own government's foreign policy. We will not accept this ban, and we plan on defying it."

Kenney's spokesperson, Alykhan Velshi, said that "the minister will not give a special exemption from Canada's security laws to Mr. Galloway, nor will he provide special treatment to a man who brags about giving financial support to Hamas, a banned terrorist organization in Canada, or who offers sympathy for Canada's enemies in Afghanistan."

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada supported the government's position on the British MP, who was banished from Britain's governing Labour party in 2003 and now sits as a representative of the Respect party.

B'nai Brith said Galloway "glorifies terrorism" and "defends the very terrorists trying to kill Canadian forces in Afghanistan.

"By logical extension, those who support the pro-terrorist agenda of groups like Hamas and Hezbollah, whose avowed aim is the destruction of the Jewish state, should not be given public platforms to spew their vile message."

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said the decision to bar Galloway "is not a free speech issue. He is free to speak and say whatever he wants. It's easy to find everything he says on the Internet. This is completely about his support for terrorist organizations. He has said publicly that he raises money for terrorist organizations."

Farber said the CBSA "determined he would be here to raise money for terrorist organizations. That's what he does."

In an article on the Guardian website titled "Canada can't muzzle me," Galloway described Kenney's decision as "the way the right wing, last-ditch dead-enders of Bushism in Ottawa conduct their business."

He called NATO policy in Afghanistan "a profound mistake," "a blunder" and "with increased regularity it is a crime."

Galloway was scheduled to speak at four events in Canada: on March 30 in Toronto, March 31 in Mississauga, April 1 in Montreal and April 2 in Ottawa.

Palestinian school texts poison minds, says PMW founder

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Itamar Marcus, the founder and director of Palestinian Media Watch, will tell Canadian parliamentarians in Ottawa this week that school texts produced by the Palestinian Authority are poisoning the minds of some one million children and adolescents and thereby undermining the prospects for peace with Israel.

In a bipartisan event arranged by Liberal MP and former federal justice minister Irwin Cotler, Marcus will say that PA school books in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip portray the Arab-Israeli conflict as a religious and existential struggle rather than as a territorial one.

In an interview in Toronto last week, Marcus said that the only chance for long-term peace is if the PA presents the conflict strictly in territorial terms.

"Then we can negotiate over borders," noted Marcus, whose organization monitors the PA's media and education system.

Marcus, who was invited here by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said the PA's skewed presentation of the Arab-Israeli dispute stands as "the greatest impediment to peace."

He said he will tell MPs that Canada – a financial contributor to the PA – should not fund "hate education" and thus perpetuate the conflict.

According to Marcus, Palestinian school texts in every grade deny Israel's right to exist and demonize Israel.

"This creates hatred," he said. "Why would Palestinians want to make peace with Israel?"

He cited a sentence in a grade 12 text, Arabic Language, Analysis and Criticism: "Palestine's war ended with a catastrophe that is unprecedented in history, when the Zionist gangs stole Palestine and expelled its people from their cities, their lands and their homes, and established the State of Israel."

Marcus also cited a PA educational television program on geography recently that described Eilat, Haifa, Ashkelon and Ashdod as "Palestinian ports," Mt. Meron as the highest mountain in Palestine and the Sea of Galilee as a Palestinian lake.

Nor is there a map of Israel in any Palestinian school book, he added.

"The PA is building a picture of a world in which Israel does not exist," charged Marcus, who was appointed in the late 1990s by then-Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu to represent Israel at a trilateral forum on incitement that was attended as well by delegates from the PA and the United States.

Itamar Marcus

Accusing the PA of repackaging anti-Israel messages in its latest batch of school texts, Marcus nonetheless acknowledged that the PA has removed "viciously anti-Semitic" passages from them.

He pointed out that PA texts, which also accuse Israel of inflicting genocide on the Palestinians, are used by the current Hamas government in Gaza.

Fatah, the largest faction in the PA, has grown more extreme, he warned, citing an interview with former Fatah security commander Mohammed Dahlan.

Dahlan, in a reference to Fatah's ongoing bitter rivalry with Hamas, told PA TV on March 16: "I want to say for the thousandth time, in my own name and in the name of all my fellow members of the Fatah movement: we do not demand that the Hamas movement recognize Israel. On the contrary, we demand of the Hamas movement not to recognize Israel, because the Fatah movement does not recognize Israel even today."

Dahlan went on to comment that the PA recognized Israel "not out of conviction or sincerity, but in order to receive the needed help of the international community."

Marcus expressed optimism that Netanyahu, the Israeli prime minister-designate, will address the issue of Palestinian incitement after he takes office. "I expect to work closely with him," he said.

Contrary to statements made by Israel's outgoing prime minister, Ehud Olmert, Marcus claimed that Israel has no peace partner in PA President and Fatah member Mahmoud Abbas.

"Fatah is not yet a peace partner, because its leadership is producing these inflammatory school texts."

Marcus criticized Olmert for not taking up this issue.

"Some Israeli leaders say they'll deal with it in the future. We say we have to deal with it now."

In closing, Marcus – a resident of the West Bank settlement of Efrat – suggested that Israel should keep areas of the West Bank, such as Gush Etzion, where substantial numbers of Jews have lived since the Six Day War.

But striking a conciliatory tone, he said, "If there was someone on the other side we can talk to, and if we knew that the [West Bank] would not be used as a springboard to attack Israel and Ben-Gurion Airport, we would be very forthcoming on territorial issues."

חדשה בקנדה

נינה שנהב

"הבאנו את התמונות מהמסיבה!" קורא הבן שלי, כשהוא נכנס הביתה. הוא מושיט לי מעטפת צילום מלאה בתמונות מיום ההולדת שזה עתה חגגנו לו. אני נירגשת. המון זמן לא הצטלמנו. אני חושבת שאולי פעם, פעמיים בקנדה. פעם, כשירד שלג, והיינו המומים מנס הטבע שעין אדם שנולד במדבר לא ראתה, ופעם שנייה, כשהקטנה ניצחה באיזה משחק. באותה הפעם גם נשברה המצלמה, ומאז לא הצטלמנו.

אני פותחת את המעטפה ונאנחת בשמחה למראה משפחתי החמודה. אני מצלמת אותם נהדר. הנה שלושתם ליד עץ, הנה בקניון, הנה שני הילדים שלי ניצבים ליד דודה שמנה וחיוכנית, הנה שוב אותה דודה שמנה מחבקת את הילדים שלי... הנה הפרה הזקנה מחבקת את הבעל שלי...רגע! מי זו הדודה השמנה הזו?!

מאיר מחבק אותי בשאני בוכה. "את לא כל כך שמנה, ניני," הוא מנסה. "באמת. רק קצת במותניים, בירכיים, בישבן ובפנים. אבל זה הכל."

אני מביטה בתמונות שלי ולא מאמינה. תבינו, אני תמיד הייתי החתיכה של החבר'ה! זאת שכל הגברים היו מתלהבים למראיה, למורת רוחו של בעלי הסבלן, זאת שהתלבשה הדוק ופרובוקטיבי, זאת שהבנות שנאו! אני רוצה שוב שהבנות ישנאו אותי!

"אולי שלושים, מקסימום ארבעים פאונד עלית." מנחם אותי בעלי, ומוסיף בנדיבות: "בקילוגרמים זה יישמע לך פחות."

ביוני אנחנו נוסעים לישראל. מה ינידו עלי? מה ירכלו? זאת אומרת אני יודעת מה ירכלו. מה יהיה?

למחרת, אני נרשמת לחוג הרזייה במתנ"ס הקרוב. עוד אף פעם לא הייתי בחוג כזה, ואני מסוקרנת. שמונה דוגמניות צמרת נכנסות לחדר, עוד שלוש נשים רגילות (רזות יותר ממני) ושתי שמנות. אחת מהן המדריכה, השנייה, אני.

אנחנו שותות קפה ומדברות על הצרות שלנו. אחר כך השיחה נסובה למתכונים. המדריכה מציעה תבשיל שנשמע נורא, אבל בהפסקה אנו מתנחמות בכך שבתוספת כמה כפות מיונז, בצל מטוגן וקוביות גבינה צהובה, התבשיל יהיה אכיל. גם בקינוח יש בעייה מסויימת, אבל ניתן לתמיין אותו בליווי רוסב שוקולד סמיך.

שכחתי לספר שגם נשקלים. תודה לאל, ממש לא ברור לי כמה פאונדים זה קילו (אני מקווה שבסביבות ארבעה, חמישה), ובבקשה שאף נשמה טובה לא תשלח לי באימייל מספר מדוייק. אין לי מושג כמה אני שוקלת, אבל אני יודעת שבערך כפול מידידותי הרגילות, פי שלוש משמונה הדוגמניות (ביחד), ואני ממש רזה יחסית למדריכה.

אחרי זמן מה בקבוצה (שתי פגישות), אני מסיקה שהתכנית לא בשבילי. אמנם מאיר צוחק עלי שאחם ביזבזתי כסף, אבל כשאני מורה לו שאחר על גבי לבן (הג'ינס הכהה על הבטן הלבנבנה שלי) שרק עליתי במשקל, הוא מרפה.

אני נכנסת לקבוצה מסוגרת שקוראת לעצמה "אכלני יתר כפייתיים", ומייד מרגישה כמו מסוממת חשרת אונים. החבר'ה פה הם כולם רזים בלי יוצא מן הכלל, דיכאונים על סף התאבדות, והחלק הנחמד היחיד הוא, שכל פעם שאני פותחת את הפה לוידוי קטן וחכרחי ("הייי, אני נינה, ואני אכלנית יתר כפייתית"), מריעים לכפייתיות שלי באהבה ללא תנאים, וגם מחבקים אותי הרבה. מצד שני, מרוב לשמוע כמה הבחור האנורקטי שלצידי חסא, חלל קערה שלמה של נבטים חלטיים (אחרי שהחבר שלו עזב אותו לאנורוחת), כל מה שבא לי לעשות זה לרוץ החוצה בצעקה צרודה ולהתנפל על דוכן הנקניקיות הקרוב.

אחרי שני ניסיונות נוספים, ועוד זוג מכנסיים שקטן עלי. אני מחליטה ללכת על דיאטה מאוד פופולארית, מהטלוויזיה.

בטלוויזיה ראיתי איזו שחרחורת זקנה שצועקת שהיא נורא צעירה, ומראה תמונות מעברה חשמנמן, הצעיר והיפה. מראים גם תמיך בלונדיני שמביא לה הביתה אוכל, ונגמר עניין. מרזים.

קודם כל, אין אמת בפירסום. לי דווקא מביא את הארוחות אחד ממש לא תמיך, בטח שלא בלונדיני (אין הרבה בלונדינים בסין).

אבל חוץ מזה הכל בסדר. האוכל טעים. אני שמה במיקרו, אוכלת, שמחה, ואחרי שבועיים רואה ששמנתי רצת. לאף אחד אין מושג למה. הרי הכל כך מדוייק במאזן הקלוריי של כל ארוחה. "תתבעי אותם!" מייעץ הבן שלי, שיהיה עורך דין, כשיגדל.

"נורא מוזר." מסכים מאיר. אני שותקת. נכון, אני אוכלת בדיוקות את מה שהשליח מביא. עד 12 בצהריים. אחר כך אני פנוה למקרר הביתי, ואוכלת כרגיל...

למישהו יש עוד רעיונות בשבילי? יוני מתקרב באמדי ענק!

Abbas prefers security fence to killings: expert

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas told former prime minister Ariel Sharon before Israel built the West Bank security fence that he preferred it over targeted killings as a way of fighting terror, a former Israeli Defence Forces military prosecutor said here earlier this month

Amos Guiora – a former Israeli Defence Forces military prosecutor in the West Bank Military Court, as well as a former judge in the Gaza Strip Military Court and legal adviser to the Gaza Strip military commander – spoke about Israel's position in the Middle East in a talk at the Canadian Mennonite University on March 8.

Amos Guiora

While approximately 200 members of the Mennonite community came to hear anti-Israel speaker Jeff Halper on Jan. 25, only about 25 members of the Mennonite community came to hear Guiora.

Having been personally involved in the legal and policy aspects of Israeli counterterrorism efforts, Guiora said that before Sharon authorized the building of the security fence, "he went to Abbas" and said that Israel could conduct "more targeted killings" of terrorists or it could "build the fence," and Abbas told Sharon he "preferred" the fence.

Guiora, now a law professor the University of Utah, added: "The fence is effective… for the Palestinian Authority. It enables them to come to Israel and say we've minimized Palestinian terrorism into Israel."

Guiora also said that "Sharon's plan had been to release [jailed Fatah leader] Marwan Barghouti," who has been convicted of murdering Israeli civilians in terror attacks and is in an Israeli prison. Guiora said that Sharon was willing to release him, with the idea he would eventually become PA president, because the head of the PA would have to be "a ruthless tough leader," capable of controlling the West Bank. In Guiora's view, Abbas, who he said he has met, is not tough enough for the position.

Guiora added that although it has been "kept a secret," there have been some Israeli Arabs who have served in the IDF, "not in desk jobs, but in combat."

According to Guiora, the Palestinian Authority leadership understands that if it wants a state in the West Bank, it needs to conduct itself "diametrically differently than Hamas." He said that Palestinians in the West Bank "took to the streets only once" during Israel's recent Gaza operation, because they know "better than anyone else that Hamas has brought them nothing."

Guiora said that although he had been a "longtime supporter of a two-state solution" who had voted for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in 2006, he no longer thinks a two-state solution is on the horizon, especially given Hamas' control of Gaza.

"Rather than build a liberal society" after Israel pulled out of Gaza in 2005, "all Hamas has done is lob 600 missiles into Israel in the last three years," Guiora said, adding that the "Palestinians are masters of their own victimization."

In considering the extensive terror infrastructure Hamas has built and the level of support Hamas enjoys in Gaza, Guiora said people need to "think long and hard" about who were really "the victims" of Israel's military operation in Gaza.

Speaking of the wider region, Guiora said that once President Hosni Mubarak is no longer leader of Egypt, his son, Jamal, will likely take over, but it's an open question "whether the [Egyptian] army will be loyal to him, and whether he will be as ruthless [as his father] toward Islamic extremism."

Guiora, whose recent books include Fundamentals of Counterterrorism and Global Perspectives on Counterterrorism, said Russia's support of Iran is "extremely concerning."

He added, "Does [Russian Prime Minister Vladimir] Putin not realize that what can be aimed one way [toward Israel] can also be aimed the other way [toward Russia]?

He also said that "Iranian threats are getting stronger every day" and "we in Israel believe everything they [the Iranian government officials] say" when they threaten the Jewish state.

Guiora was unsure, however, whether Israel would decide to strike Iran. He added that he is also "losing sleep" over the fact that Pakistan has "100 nuclear warheads" and, in his view, "the regime isn't stable."

Chocolate Passover birthday cake is easy to make

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

My son, my daughter, my brother-in-law and at least four of our young cousins were born in March or April, so there's always an excuse for us to have a birthday cake at the seder.

Although I enjoy preparing elaborate desserts once in a while, it makes more sense for me to use easy recipes now that my husband and I have begun hosting our 40-person family seder.

A couple of years ago, I found two online recipes – one for a brownie cake, the other for a chocolate glaze – that I adapted slightly and combined to create a Passover birthday cake.

The cake ingredients are mixed in one bowl, a bonus on Passover, when many recipes call for eggs to be separated and beaten in two bowls.

Once the cake is baked and cooled, it should be cut in half into two equal rectangles and frozen until you are ready to assemble it.

Instead of using icing to write "Happy Birthday" on the cake, I inscribe a message with melted white chocolate on an upside-down chocolate bar. Prepare the chocolate bar first, so you can position it before the glaze has set.

I use a piece of wax paper, folded and taped into a cone with a small hole at the bottom, as an "icing bag" for the melted white chocolate. It's helpful to practise writing on a piece of wax paper before attempting to write on the chocolate bar.

Small cake serves crowd

A toothpick is handy to remove tiny bits of extra white chocolate if the writing is not as neat as you would like.

The cake looks small, but it will feed more people than you expect, especially if you are serving other desserts as well. It's very sweet, so large servings aren't necessary.

PASSOVER BROWNIE CAKE

5 eggs
2 1/2 c. sugar
1 1/4 c. oil
1 1/4 c. cake meal
1/2 c. unsweetened cocoa powder

Preheat oven to 325. In large bowl, beat eggs and sugar. Add oil. Mix in cake meal and cocoa. Pour batter into greased 9x13-inch pan. Bake at 325 for about 35 minutes. Underbake so it will be moist. Check at about 30 minutes.

CHOCOLATE GLAZE

1/3 c. sugar
1/3 c. cocoa
3 tbsp. hot water

Combine and stir well. Yield: 1/2 cup.

DECORATION

1 6-oz. Passover chocolate bar, plus four squares of chocolate, divided into two double squares white chocolate or white chocolate chips strawberry or raspberry jam or jelly strawberries
approximately 3 to 6 oz. chocolate or chocolate chips, or more, for dipping strawberries

TO ASSEMBLE THE CAKE:

1. Put one cake layer on a serving plate, top side up. The cake should still be frozen or semi-frozen – soft enough to cut when you put the second layer on, but frozen enough that it's easier to glaze.
2. Place four wide strips of wax paper under each of the four sides of the cake, overlapping the corners and extending each one outward onto the plate. When you glaze the cake, the excess glaze will go onto the wax paper, and the plate will stay clean.
3. Spread cake top with jam or jelly.
4. Top with other half of cake, top side down.
5. Trim sides of cake if not even, using a long serrated knife or a sharp paring knife.
6. Gently brush off excess crumbs. Pour glaze over the cake, and use a spatula or long knife to smooth glaze along top and sides, covering the cake as completely as possible.
7. To position the chocolate bar, decide where you want it, and angle the top (the long side above the writing) upward so it will be easier to see.
8. Position a double square of chocolate under the back of the chocolate bar to support it, and then use a second double square to raise the chocolate bar a little higher. Use the glaze as a "glue" between the pieces of chocolate.
9. Once the glaze has had time to set, use a knife to separate the glaze from the bottom of the cake where it runs onto the wax paper, and carefully remove the wax paper strips.
10. At serving time, arrange chocolate-covered strawberries (prepared in advance) around the cake.

Passover Food Ideas

Plan and cook your seder meal in advance

By DENISE PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

Seder night is a great family occasion, and planning ahead is the answer to a perfect evening. The recipes in this menu will not spoil should the seder go on longer than anticipated. Salmon and ginger fish balls can be prepared ahead and so too, can the beef tagine. To complete the meal, a fat-free orange and almond cake will freeze so that last minute preparations can be reduced to a minimum.

SALMON AND GINGER FISH BALLS

Boiled fish balls are a popular recipe. Instead of making them with a mixture of white fish, I have used fresh salmon with ginger. It's a delicious combination flavoured with scallions and fresh dill. They can be eaten hot, warm or cold and will not spoil if made in advance or if left in warm water while the seder service seems to have gone on a little longer than anticipated. You can vary the size from cocktail to larger main course portions; however, I recommend that when cooking, you should keep them all to one size so that they finish cooking at the same time.

In addition, they are extremely healthy, as there is no added fat and they are very low in cholesterol; only egg white is used to combine the mixture.

I like to serve them with chrain, beetroot relish or mayonnaise with salad, or hot with vegetables. Preparation time, 15 minutes, cooking time, 15 minutes.

2 lb. fresh salmon, skinned and cubed
1 in. fresh ginger root, peeled and finely chopped
2 tbsp. fresh dill – or use parsley, chives or cilantro if preferred or more available
5 scallions, peeled and trimmed
2 egg whites
sea salt and freshly ground black pepper

Fish Stock
1 bay leaf
2 peppercorns
4 cups water – or enough to cover the fish
2 tsp. salt
garnish: 2 lemons – cut into slices

Place the salmon, ginger, dill and scallions in the food processor. Whizz until smooth. Season very well as they need plenty of flavour and the addition of egg white weakens the seasoning.

While the food processor is running, slowly add the egg white. Remove the mixture and place in a dish. With wet hands take 1 to 2 tablespoons of mixture – size according to preference – and roll into balls.

Place all the stock ingredients in a large, deep saucepan. Bring to a boil and reduce heat so that stock is simmering. Carefully drop the fish balls into the simmering stock, cover with a lid and cook for about 5 minutes. They are cooked when they rise to the surface.

Using a slotted spoon, remove and transfer to a serving plate. To serve the stylish way, garnish with sprigs of fresh dill and slices of lemon. Serves 6.

BEEF TAGINE WITH PRUNES

This is the ideal recipe for seder night, as it can be cooking slowly while the service is taking place, or alternatively, frozen and reheated. Large numbers are easier to cater for and serving is simple. I like to accompany this recipe with either sliced roasted potatoes or mashed potatoes. Dried fruits are plentiful in the kosher supermarkets during Pesach and this dish makes good use of them and allows a small amount of beef to go a long way. Preparation time: 20 minutes, cooking time: 2-1/2 hours.

2 lb. chuck beef steak cut into cubes
3 tbsp. fine matzah meal
2 tbsp. vegetable or olive oil
4 onions, peeled and sliced
2 cups dried prunes, stones removed
1 in. ginger root, peeled and grated
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 1/2 cups sultana raisins
1 cup red wine
2 cups beef stock
salt and freshly ground black pepper

Garnish
sprigs of fresh cilantro
3 tbsp. whole almonds
3 tbsp. pistachio nuts

Low fat pareve cake is a healthy choice

For the mashed potatoes
4 lb. large potatoes, peeled and roughly chopped
3 tbsp. margarine
1 tbsp. olive oil
pinch of nutmeg
freshly ground sea salt to taste

Heat the oil in a large deep skillet. Fry the beef until browned. Add the onions, cinnamon, ginger, matzah meal, salt and pepper to the skillet and continue to fry for a further 5 minutes. Add the red wine, stock, prunes and sultanas. Bring to a boil. Cover and reduce the heat to simmer for 2 hours.

Preheat oven to 400. Place the almonds on a baking tray. Put them in the oven and toast until golden. This will take about 10 minutes but keep an eye on them as they will burn!

Cook the potatoes until soft. Drain. Use a fork or potato ricer to mash the potatoes. Return the potato to the saucepan. Add the margarine, olive oil, nutmeg and salt. Stir and season to taste.

To serve the stylish way, place a generous helping of mashed potato on a warm plate and pour over an individual helping of beef stew. Garnish with sprigs of cilantro and toasted whole almonds and pistachio nuts. Serves 6.

ORANGE AND ALMOND CAKE

It's always difficult to find suitable low fat desserts that are not just fruit. This recipe has no fat and transforms some every day ingredients into something very delicious. The secret of its divine flavour is in the simmering of 2 whole oranges for 2 hours and then incorporating them into the mixture. This cake recipe also ticks all the boxes for a flexible cake, it can be made in advance, it's pareve and it's ideal for Pesach. Preparation time: 20 minutes. Cooking time: 3 hours 30 minutes plus cooling.

2 large oranges
1 1/4 cups sugar
1 cup ground almonds
1 tsp. almond extract
6 eggs
1 tsp. Passover baking powder
3 tbsp. of split almonds

Put the oranges in a pan and cover with cold water. Bring to a boil, turn down the heat and simmer for 2 hours. Top up with more water if they start to boil dry.

Line an 8-in. cake tin with non-stick baking parchment paper.

Preheat the oven to 150. Remove the oranges from the water. Using a sharp knife, carefully remove the outer orange layer. Cut orange in half discarding any pips. Place in the food processor with the sugar, eggs, ground almonds, almond extract and baking powder. Blitz until smooth.

Transfer the mixture into the prepared cake tin and sprinkle the almonds over the top.

Bake in the preheated oven for 1 hour and 30 minutes, covering with foil half-way through should it start to burn on top.

Leave cake to cool and then cut into slices. Serves 8 to 10.

To serve the stylish way, dust the plate with some confectioner's sugar and serve the cake with orange sorbet or Passover ice cream.

Passover Food Ideas

Food memories of Passover

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

For me, the best recipes are the ones that stand the test of time, favourite family recipes that are passed down from generation to generation. I have very vivid memories of the Passover of my childhood.

My mother would buy at least 15 dozen eggs, and boxes and boxes of matzah, farfel, cake meal and potato starch. Mom would make chopped liver, homemade gefilte fish that she ground herself (she would never use a frozen leg of gefilte fish, God forbid), and her matzah balls that were as puffy as clouds. She made farfel kugels, matzah meal latkes, roast chicken, Pesach potato knishes and sweet carrot tzimmes with a kneidl. My mother never made brisket because she hated it. For dessert, there was always Pesach komish broit, fruit compote, baked apples, jelly roll and light-as-a-cloud sponge cake that used almost a dozen eggs. Leftover sponge cake would be sliced, dipped in egg and transformed into French toast for breakfast. Fried matzah was fried in either schmaltz or butter and no one seemed to worry about cholesterol levels!

We complain about how difficult it is to prepare for Passover, despite the fact that today's modern kitchens are outfitted with a wide variety of appliances to ease preparation. Disposable foil containers can be used for brisket, turkey and kugels, and many people use fancy disposable paper plates and cutlery for large crowds, making cleanup a snap.

Miami ribs

A huge variety of prepared and packaged foods makes the task easier for those who don't want to cook or don't have the time because they work full time. Supermarket displays showcase a wide selection of exotic fruits and vegetables from all over the world. So many choices!

Caterers advertise their Passover menus weeks in advance for those who are looking for easier options. Other people close up their kitchens and go on a Passover cruise or make reservations at a hotel offering a special seder menu, to avoid the task of cleaning and cooking for Pesach.

You can imagine how fascinated I was when I read this detailed description of Pesach in Israel in the '30s from Sara Finkel's wonderful cookbook: Simply Delicious: Winning Recipes for Every Day and Holidays (Targum). I've also included her delicious recipe for Pesach Vegetable Casserole from her book.

Finkel writes: "I have often wondered how my Aunt Esther, who lived with her family in Jerusalem about seven or eight decades ago, managed to prepare for Pesach, not only for her family but for the countless guests who came from many miles around.

"There were no refrigerators, gas ranges or freezers, not to mention food processors, blenders or electric mixers. No one even knew the meaning of the word microwave oven, nor could they in their wildest imagination dream of either an electric dishwasher or a clothes dryer. Laundry was done in a washtub in the yard over a scrub board. In order for the family to have clean clothing and clean tablecloths to last the entire holiday, it had to be done on the day before Pesach…

"Staples were scarce and rations were meagre. Fish was considered a luxury, and the lowly potato was expensive. Potatoes were grated, drained and dried and made into potato starch. It was a special treat for a family to get an apple or even an orange. Few vegetables were around – eggplant,

Recipes that stand the test of time

squash and maybe some tomatoes – they were all prepared in many different ways to provide variety to meals and sometimes to replace chicken or fish.

"Serious preparations for Pesach began with the approach of the Sukkot season when plump, juicy grapes ripened. Because wine was not yet commercially produced, it was made by almost every household. With feet scrubbed clean, everyone, including the children, happily trampled the juice from the grapes. Sugar was added and the whole lot was poured into barrels to ferment. The results were sweet red wine, white wine and grape juice.

"Even schmaltz was prepared on Chanukah for Pesach because geese were fattest at that time of year. Griebene with matzah and a glass of tea was a special evening meal they ate with relish. Russel borsht, left in barrels to age, was relished during Pesach, and eaten along with a plate of boiled potatoes."

Here are some special dishes that my "Pan Pals" from near and afar will be making for the seders this year. Enjoy in good health and have a happy and delicious Passover!

PESACH VEGETABLE CASSEROLE

From Sara Finkel, Jerusalem

This light vegetable casserole is a welcome change from the high-protein dishes that dominate the Pesach menu.

1 large onion, diced
1 stalk celery, diced
1/2 cup sliced mushrooms
5 tbsp. olive oil
3 to 4 carrots, grated
3/4 cup matzah meal
16 oz. frozen chopped spinach, thawed and drained
3 eggs, beaten
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper

Saute onions, celery and mushrooms in oil until tender. Remove from heat. Stir in remaining ingredients. Pour mixture into well-greased loaf pan and bake in a preheated 350-degree oven for 45 minutes. Serves 10 to 12.

Pamela Reiss of Winnipeg is the author of Soup: A Kosher Collection (Whitecap). Trained in her parents' catering company, Desserts Plus, Reiss loves nothing better than to dish up kosher fusion dishes that draw people together in celebration of good food and good company. Her recipe for Passover Miami Ribs from her personal recipe collection is an excellent example of her culinary creativity. When I asked about the availability of black currant jam, she said: "778 makes it for Passover, although grape jam would make a fine substitute. And Lieber or Pereg have a wide variety of Passover spices."

PASSOVER MIAMI RIB

From Pamela Reiss, Winnipeg

Combining black currant jam and tomato paste in a sauce may sound unusual, but the final flavour is outstanding. These taste even better if they're made a day ahead and reheated before serving.

2 lbs. short ribs (Miami cut)
salt and pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil
1 small onion, peeled and finely chopped
2 large garlic cloves, crushed
1 tbsp. sweet red paprika mixed with a little oil
2 tbsp. tomato paste
2 cups chicken stock
1/2 cup black currant or grape jam

Line a baking sheet with aluminum foil. Cut the Miami ribs into pieces, between each bone, and lay them on the pan (they can overlap).

Season on both sides with salt and pepper. Cover the pan completely with foil, and place into a 350-degree oven, on the middle rack. Bake for 1/2 hour, then remove from the oven. Pour off all the excess fat and liquid. Set aside.

In an oven-safe pot or Dutch oven, heat the olive oil over medium heat. Add the onion and sauté until wilted, 4 to 6 minutes. Add the garlic, paprika and tomato paste and cook for another minute, stirring. Add the chicken stock and jam, stir everything together and bring to a simmer.

Add the ribs and return the pan to the 350 oven. Bake, uncovered, for 45 minutes, stirring the pot every 15 minutes. Serve right away or chill and reheat when you're ready to serve them. Yields 4 to 6 servings. Recipe multiplies easily.

Note: Miami ribs are short ribs (flanken) that have been sliced really thin, usually about 1/4-inch thick.

My friend Gail Gordon Oliver of Toronto is the owner, publisher and editor of an fantastic magazine, Edible Toronto (www.edibletoronto.com). The following recipe for Stewed Cabbage with Meatballs was first published in the Winter 2007 issue of Edible Toronto. This is her take on stuffed cabbage, providing all the flavour without all of the work. The combination of sauerkraut and cranberry sauce creates a delicious sweet-and-sour dimension. This dish can be served as an appetizer or main course.

STEWED CABBAGE WITH MEATBALLS

From Gail Gordon Oliver, Toronto

Meatballs
2 lb. lean ground beef
2 eggs
2 tbsp. ice water
3 tbsp. matzah meal
2 tsp. garlic powder
2 tsp. kosher salt
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper

Cabbage Stew
3 cups tomato juice
1 cup water
1 small head green cabbage, coarsely chopped
2 medium onions, halved and sliced
1 jar (750 ml or 1 litre) sauerkraut, drained
1 (16-oz.) can jellied cranberry sauce
1/3 cup granulated sugar, plus more if needed
lemon wedges

Combine ground beef, eggs, ice water, matzah meal, garlic powder, salt and pepper. Set aside.

In a large Dutch oven or stockpot, put the tomato juice, water, cabbage, onions, sauerkraut, cranberry sauce and sugar; stir well to combine. Bring to a boil, stirring occasionally. Push down on the solids until about an inch of liquid covers the top. Reduce the heat to medium.

Form the meat mixture into 1-in. balls and add them to the pot in a single layer. Cover the pot, reduce the heat, and simmer for 20 minutes. Gently stir the meatballs into the cabbage mixture. Cover the pot and continue to simmer until the meatballs are cooked through and the cabbage is tender, about 40 to 50 minutes. Taste and add sugar, if needed. Serve with lemon wedges. Yield: 6 main-course servings.

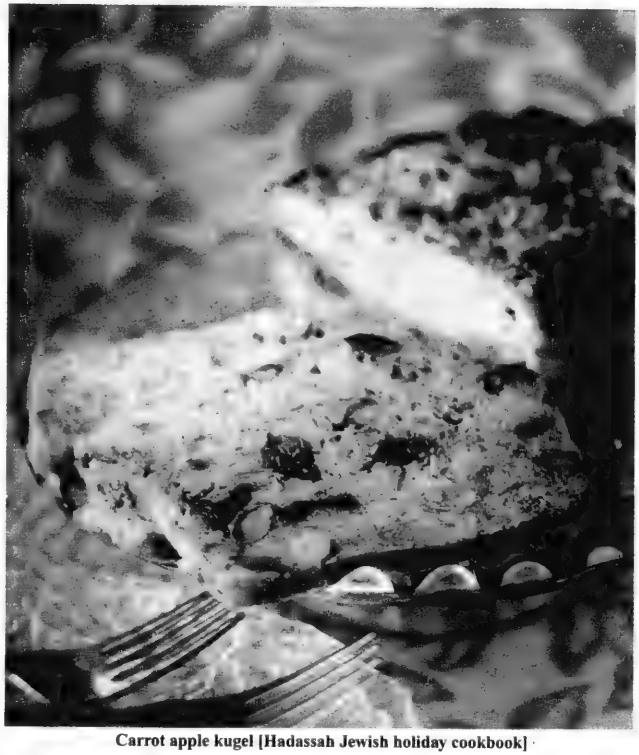
Marc Gordon of Thornhill shared the recipe for this simple and delicious Passover kugel with me – it's one of his favourites. Marc got the recipe from his late mother, Bev Gordon, who loved to cook and bake for her family. My friend Bev often helped me test recipes and would share many favourites with me from her recipe files. I'm so happy that her son Marc has continued his mother's tradition, keeping her memory alive through treasured food memories. When I told him I was including his mother's recipe, he replied: "Thank you – I hope my mom's treasured recipe finds its way onto many tables."



Carrot apple kugel [Hadassah Jewish holiday cookbook]

MUM'S FABULOUS FRUIT KUGEL

From Marc Gordon, son of the late Bev Gordon, Thornhill, Ont.

1 grated apple
1 cup grated carrot
1 cup grated potatoes
1/2 cup chopped pitted prunes
1/2 cup raisins
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/2 cup oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly grease an 8 x 8-in. sq. glass baking dish. Combine all ingredients in a large bowl and mix well. Spread evenly in baking dish.

Bake uncovered in a preheated oven for 45 minutes, until golden. Makes 9 servings. Reheats well.

Passover, Israeli style

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Passover is one of the most exciting times of the year. Almost no one works in Israel during chol hamoed, the four intermediate days of Pesach. Most offices are closed for the week and the businesses that are open generally close early.

The weather is beautiful, spring is in the air, the countryside is filled with wildflowers, and it seems like the entire population is outdoors – hiking, camping and picknicking. It's as though everyone was coming out of hibernation.

Picnic grounds are packed with extended families enjoying the holiday. And where else in the world can you see an ice cream truck parked next to the picnic grounds selling matzah along with the ice cream?

Some Israelis picnic by bringing along what seems like their entire kitchen. They bring pots, pans, tables and chairs and cook their meals on site! I prefer my picnics western style, bringing all the food ready-made in a cooler and eating on a blanket on the ground.

Whether you're off on an outing with your family or hanging around the back yard, you'll love these easy dishes that will get you out of the kitchen in a hurry.

MATZAH MEAL PANCAKES

I like to make matzah meal pancakes to use as sandwich bread. They can also be served as a breakfast dish with syrup, cranberry sauce or applesauce. And they can be baked on a parchment paper-lined baking sheet in a 350-degree oven until golden brown.

3 eggs
1/2 cup cold water
1/4 teaspoon salt
1 cup matzah meal
1 medium onion, grated
melted butter, margarine or oil for frying

Beat eggs and combine with cold water, salt, 2/3 of the grated onion and enough matzah meal to make a stiff batter that will drop from the spoon.

Heat the butter, margarine or vegetable oil in a heavy skillet and add remaining onion for flavour. Drop batter from spoon to form round cakes and fry until brown before turning over to brown on underside. Lift out one at a time and drain thoroughly on paper towel, before serving.

PASSOVER CHICKEN SALAD

This is an excellent way to use up leftover chicken from the chicken soup, and makes delicious picnic fare.

3 to 4 cups shredded cooked chicken
1 1/4 cups finely diced celery (about 4 stalks)
3 carrots, peeled and grated
1 tbsp. grated onion
salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
3/4 cup or more mayonnaise

Combine ingredients, transfer to an airtight container and refrigerate. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

TUNA PATTIES

Here's another great picnic food, based on a recipe from Ruth Baks of Jerusalem. You can add chopped bell pepper, parsley, salt and pepper. They're delicious hot or cold. You can also make them ahead and freeze.

4 eggs
3 cans drained tuna
1/2 cup matzah meal
1 small onion, minced
1 stalk celery, minced
3/4 cup additional matzah meal for dredging oil for frying

Combine ingredients and chill for at least one hour. Scoop out 1/4 cup portions and shape into patties. Gently dredge patties in matzah meal, coating sides evenly. Pat lightly so the crumbs adhere well. Because the mixture is soft, the patty may flatten slightly during breading; use fingertips to gently restore shape and return thickness to about 2 3/4 inch. Set aside breaded patties on tray to rest, then pan fry in hot oil. Makes 12 patties.

PASSOVER APRICOT SQUARES

1/2 lb. butter or margarine
1 cup sugar
1 tbsp. lemon rind
2 egg yolks
2 cups matzah cake meal
1/4 cup lemon juice
1 tsp. vanilla
1 lb. jar apricot preserves
1 cup chopped walnuts or almonds

Preheat oven to 325. Cream butter and sugar together. Add lemon rind and yolks and beat until light in colour. Add the matzah cake meal and mix well.

Press three-quarters of the dough into a greased 9 x 13-in. pan and freeze the remaining dough. Bake crust for 20 minutes. Remove from oven.

Quick take-along suggestions

Combine lemon juice, vanilla and preserves and spoon over hot dough. Sprinkle with nuts and grate frozen dough over the top. Bake for an additional 35 minutes. Cool and cut into squares. Makes 24 squares.

CHOCOLATE-COVERED MATZAH

A delicious take-along or for any-time noshing.

6 tbsp. butter or margarine
1/2 cup dark brown sugar
4 sheets regular matzah
8 tbsp. semisweet chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 400. Line 2 baking sheets with foil.

In a small saucepan, melt the butter or margarine. Add the sugar and stir well.

Place two matzot on each baking sheet. Divide the butter and sugar mixture among the sheets of matzah – about 2 tablespoons for each one. With a rubber spatula, spread the mixture over the entire surface of matzah.

Bake the matzot for 6 to 7 minutes or until the topping is bubbly and brown.

Remove the sheets from the oven and immediately sprinkle each with 2 tbsp. of the chips. Let them sit for 30 seconds, then use a metal palette knife to spread the chocolate evenly.

Transfer the matzah to wire racks. Remove the foil from the baking sheets and set the racks on the sheets. Refrigerate for 30 minutes so the chocolate solidifies. Can be broken into uneven pieces. Makes 24 squares.

Russia signs deal to supply Iran with air-defence missiles

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Russian news agencies say a top defence official has confirmed that Russia has already signed a contract to sell S-300 air-defence missiles to Iran but that none of the weapons have been delivered.

Russian officials have consistently denied claims that the country has provided some of the powerful missiles to Iran, and they have not clarified whether a contract exists.

The state-run ITAR-Tass and RIA-Novosti news agencies and the independent Interfax quoted an unnamed top official in the Federal Military-Technical Co-operation Service as saying last week that the contract had been signed two years ago.

Service spokesperson Andrei Tarabrin told the Associated Press he could not immediately comment.

Iran's possession of the S-300s would markedly change the military balance in the Middle East.

In related developments last week, American sources told the Saudi newspaper Al-Watan that Israel Defence Forces chief Gabi Ashkenazi provided fresh intelligence to the United States concerning Iran's nuclear facility in Arak during his visit to Washington earlier this week, according to Israel Radio.

Ashkenazi said that while Israel was interested in exhausting diplomatic options against Iran's nuclear program, the army must nevertheless prepare itself for a military attack.

He decided to cut short his trip in order to take part in a special cabinet session on negotiations for a deal to release abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

Considered one of Iran's key nuclear sites, Arak is believed to contain a heavy water reactor. A Washington think-tank issued a report on Tuesday saying that ballistic missiles could be Israel's weapon of choice against Iranian nuclear facilities if it decides on a pre-emptive attack and deems air strikes too risky.

Israel is widely assumed to have Jericho missiles capable of hitting Iran with an accuracy of a few dozen metres from the target. Such a capability would eliminate the main drawbacks of warplanes – limits on fuel and ordnance, and danger to pilots.

During a visit to Washington, D.C., Ashkenazi met with Dennis Ross, the designated U.S. envoy to the Persian Gulf, and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, to discuss the Iranian issue.

The IDF chief told Ross that Israel would not tolerate a nuclear Iran. He said a diplomatic approach to Iran's contentious nuclear program must be taken first, but added that Israel must also prepare for other possibilities.

Durban II draft resolution amended, still displeases critics

JTA

JERUSALEM — Specific criticism of Israel has been dropped from a draft resolution prepared for a United Nations-sponsored anti-racism conference.

The new draft resolution for the Durban II conference, the followup to the 2001 World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in Durban, South Africa, is to be distributed to government ministers this week. It does not single out Israel for criticism but still speaks of concern about negative stereotyping of religions. It also does not include a provision backed by Muslim countries that criticizes "defamation of religion."

The new draft, obtained by JTA, comes amid recent threats from the European Union, Germany and Australia to boycott the Durban Review Conference to be held April 20 to 24, unless the resolution is more balanced and avoids the high level of anti-Israel sentiment associated with the first Durban anti-racism conference.

Israel and Canada already have said they will not attend the conference. The United States and Italy also have said they will not attend unless the resolution is more balanced.

The original resolution singled out Israel as having racist policies and called it an occupying power. The draft also included five paragraphs devoted to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The elimination of references to Israel and other specific countries, and the striking of the "defamation of religion" passage do meet some of the Barack Obama administration's conditions for participation in the conference laid out in late February. But the new text reaffirms the concluding document of the first Durban conference, which singled out the "plight of the Palestinian people under foreign occupation."

"A significant effort has been made to clean up the text, but problems remain," Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, said on a Jewish Community Relations Council of New York conference call Tuesday afternoon.

Neuer said, however, that the changes would likely make it easier for some countries that had been considering boycotting to make the decision to participate.

Hezbollah may be behind Haifa bomb attempt

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A senior source in the Palestinian Authority told Ha'aretz last Sunday that he suspects Hezbollah or another organization with links to Iran was behind the attempted bombing of the Lev Hamifratz shopping mall in Haifa on Saturday night.

According to the source, the PA holds definitive intelligence that Hezbollah has been trying for some time to recruit members of Fatah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad in an attempt to get operatives of those terror groups to carry out an attack in Israel.

The aim of the Lebanese Shiite group is to carry out a massive terrorist attack that would avenge the assassination of its mastermind terrorist, Imad Mughniyeh, in Damascus in February 2008, the Palestinian source said. Hezbollah blames Israel for Mughniyeh's death.

Last week, two police officers were killed in the Jordan Valley, and an anonymous caller claimed responsibility in the name of the Mughniyeh Units.

In recent weeks, there has been a slight increase in the number of attempted attacks on both sides of the Green Line (the pre-1967 border), leading security forces to examine the possibility that some of the events may be linked. All the same, a Shin Bet security service official said there was nothing to suggest an overall upsurge of terror.

"During the past months there have been warnings for pending attacks," the source said yesterday. "But we do not identify an unusual trend suggesting a renewed wave of terrorism."

The investigation of the attempted bombing, some details of which are still under a gag order, suggests that it was an unusually sophisticated plan, and officials suspect the know-how came from abroad.

The terror attack was thwarted when police sappers disarmed a bomb weighing dozens of kilograms in a car outside the mall Saturday night. An organization calling itself the Galilee Freedom Fighters claimed responsibility Saturday, but security officials said they doubted the veracity of the claim.

The bomb had the potential to cause enormous destruction, said Yossi Malka, a police sapper involved in defusing the bomb.

"We can compare the potential blast to 15 suicide bombers exploding at once," he said.

As a result of the bombing attempt, security at malls and public institutions throughout the city was stepped up Sunday.

Sappers said one part of the device had gone off prematurely and another had failed to detonate.

The first sapper to reach the car bomb said there were dozens of kilograms of explosives and metal balls in a bag, which "were packed into various packages that included all the components of a bomb." He identified the car as containing a "live bomb," rather than merely a vehicle that aroused suspicion, and got into the car to disable the explosive immediately. He was joined by three other sappers several minutes later.

"The immediate urgency of dismantling the bomb and the presence of so many people in the area meant that we had to feel and smell the explosive, physically deal with the components rather than doing it from a distance with a robot," said the sapper. "Most of the bomb was dismantled by hand."

The entire operation lasted about half an hour, though the lab analysis of the evidence and the search for suspects in the area took longer.

Arab League rejects ICC warrant

By ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

WASHINGTON — The Arab League rejected an international arrest warrant for the president of Sudan.

Omar al-Bashir will be able to attend an Arab League summit in Qatar this month after both the Arab League and Qatar rebuffed a request by the International Criminal Court to adhere to the warrant, Associated Press reported.

Omar al-Bashir

Member states must arrest individuals indicted by the court once the person enters the country, but only three members of the Arab League are court members – Jordan, Djibouti and Comoros.

"The court asked Qatar and the Arab League at the same time, but our legal position on the matter does not allow what the International Criminal Court is requesting," said Arab League head Amr Moussa during a visit last week to Syria.

Moussa said arresting Bashir might negatively affect stability and security in Sudan, and that the Arab League is co-operating with the African Union in a bid to delay prosecution of the Sudanese president for at least a year. The United States opposes the move.

The court issued an arrest warrant for Bashir on March 4 for war crimes and crimes against humanity based on the government-backed genocide in the Darfur region. Bashir responded by ejecting 13 international humanitarian aid groups from Sudan.

On March 17, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Bashir would be "responsible for every single death" that occurs due to his expulsion of aid groups. U.S. President Barack Obama last week named retired Air Force officer Scott Gration as his special envoy to Sudan.

Israeli commandos operated at Syrian reactor: Swiss paper

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Israeli commando unit carried out a reconnaissance mission at an alleged Syrian nuclear reactor that was later destroyed by the Israel Air Force.

The August 2007 reconnaissance mission was reported by the Swiss daily Neue Zuercher Zeitung last Thursday.

The 12-man unit was dropped by two helicopters onto the site, according to the report, where they proceeded to take soil samples and photographs. The clandestine operation reportedly took place, about a month before the IAF strike on the al-Kabir reactor in the country's eastern desert, said the article.

The piece was written by Hans Ruehle, former chief of the planning staff of the German Defence Ministry.

Ruehle also reported that a top-ranked Iranian defector told the United States that Iran was financing North Korean moves to make Syria into a nuclear weapons power, leading to the Israeli air strike.

The article goes into detail about an Iranian connection and fills in gaps about Israel's Sept. 6, 2007, raid that is said to have knocked out Syria's reportedly nearly-completed reactor.

Ali Reza Asghari, a retired general in Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards and a former deputy defence minister, changed sides in February 2007 and provided considerable information to the West on Iran's own nuclear program, the paper reported.

The biggest surprise, however, was his assertion that Iran was financing a secret nuclear project of Syria and North Korea, he said. No one in the American intelligence scene had heard anything of it. And the Israelis who were immediately informed also were completely unaware.

Ruehle, who did not identify the sources of his information, publishes and comments on security and nuclear proliferation in different European newspapers and broadcasts and has held prominent roles in German and NATO institutions.

U.S. intelligence had detected North Korean ship deliveries of construction supplies to Syria that started in 2002, and American satellites spotted the construction as early as 2003, but regarded the work as nothing unusual, in part because the Syrians had banned radio and telephones from the site and handled communications solely by messengers – medieval but effective, Ruehle said.

"The analysis was conclusive that it was a North Korean-type reactor, a gas graphite model," Ruehle said.

Other sources have suggested that the reactor might have been large enough to make about one nuclear weapon's worth of plutonium a year.

Just before the Israeli commando raid, a North Korean ship was intercepted en route to Syria with nuclear fuel rods, underscoring the need for fast action, he said.

On the morning of Sept. 6, 2007, seven Israeli F-15 fighter bombers reportedly took off to the north. They flew along the Mediterranean coast, brushed past Turkey and pressed on into Syria. Fifty kilometres from their target, they fired 22 rockets at the three identified objects inside the Kibar complex, according to Ruehle.

"The Syrians were completely surprised. By the time their air defence systems were ready, the Israeli planes were well out of range. The mission was successful, the reactor destroyed," Ruehle said.

"Israel estimates that Iran had paid North Korea between $1 billion and $2 billion for the project."

Israel has refused from the beginning to comment on, confirm or deny the strike, but after a delay of several months Washington presented intelligence purporting to show the target was a reactor being built with North Korean help.

Iranian officials were not available for comment because of a national holiday. In general, Iran has been silent about the Syrian facility bombed by Israel. Syrian officials could not be reached for comment. But Syria has denied the facility was a nuclear plant, saying it was an unused military building. It has also denied any nuclear cooperation with North Korea or Iran.

The International Atomic Energy Agency earlier this year said United Nations inspectors had found processed uranium traces in samples taken from the site.

Syria has suggested the traces came from Israeli ordnance used to hit the site, but the IAEA said the composition of the uranium made that unlikely. Israel has denied that it was the source of the uranium.

Venezuela Jews rebuild after synagogue attack

By JASMINA KELEMEN
JTA

CARACAS — The quiet on a residential street in this eastern Venezuelan city is shattered by construction crews as workers perched on a scaffolding place panels of marble on the external wall of a two-storey synagogue.

The construction occurs under the watchful eye of local police, who monitor the street around the clock. From its post on the corner, the police van has kept surveillance over the site since late January, when an older synagogue in the rundown Mariperez district of Caracas was attacked and desecrated.

Committed to their future here, the city's Jews are building a new synagogue to replace the 50-year-old Sephardi synagogue that was attacked.

Hugo Chavez

They must do so under police protection.

On Jan. 30, more than a dozen assailants invaded Tiferet Israel, overpowering two security guards and disabling the surveillance system. They desecrated holy objects, stole a computer database with the congregation's personal information and put this city's Jews on edge.

"It's something that is really shocking and that has never been seen before in Venezuela. Never ever," said Federica Palomero, who curates a small museum at Tiferet Israel. "In Venezuela, there's a tradition of coexistence, tolerance, respect and mutual admiration."

Synagogue members say that anti-Semitic graffiti began to appear on the temple's exterior walls in January, after President Hugo Chavez expelled the Israeli ambassador from the country to protest the Israeli military operation in the Gaza Strip.

As Chavez ratcheted up his rhetoric against Israel, calling it a genocidal state, the official media followed suit, calling for a boycott on local Jewish businesses unless they publicly denounced Israel.

Venezuelan Jews, who first arrived here in the 1700s, say an unprecedented wave of anti-Semitism has followed.

"People are being taught to hate," said Venezuelan Chief Rabbi Pynchas Brener. "Venezuela has never seen anything like this before."

"We've never had any kind of political or social problems in Venezuela," he went on. "Venezuelans are extremely tolerant – they accept differences."

Other attacks and outbursts of hostility followed the Tiferet Israel attack. In February, unknown assailants lobbed a small explosive into a Caracas Jewish community centre.

A local production of Fiddler on the Roof was even caught in the maelstrom, after the orchestra chairman pulled out of the musical, possibly because of the play's Jewish content.

The play's producer, Michel Hausmann, said Manuel Torres, who had performed in Fiddler in the past, felt that to do so this year would be politically offensive and threaten his financial support from the state.

Torres refused to comment about the case when reached by JTA via telephone. But in an interview several days earlier with a local daily, the chairman denied being pressured and said the orchestra was concentrating on other events.

For its part, the government has been erratic in its response to the attacks on the Jewish community.

At first, Chavez and other members of his government denounced the attack on Tiferet, promising the assailants would be quickly apprehended. But Chavez also blamed government opponents for the raid and told the Jewish community not "to allow themselves to be manipulated."

Then the Interior Ministry arrested 11 people, saying robbery was their real motive and that it simply was disguised as a "bias" crime.

While local Jewish leaders have publicly expressed their gratitude toward the government for prioritizing the investigation, many in the community quietly express doubt that the real perpetrators of the attack will be brought to light.

As Tiferet's Palomero guides a visitor through a small exhibit of pictures showing the destruction caused by the attack she says the attack does not reflect the attitudes of Venezuelans toward Jews "but rather those of a small group" that is "small, but active, dangerous and supported."

Like many Jews here, Palomero declined to say who she believes is behind the attacks. But Jewish leaders from overseas have made clear who they believe is to blame.

"Now that I've been here and seen this with my own eyes, I have no doubt that direct responsibility for the attack on the Tiferet Israel synagogue goes directly to the door of Hugo Chavez," said Rabbi Shmuel Herzfeld of Congregation Ohev Sholom in Washington after a recent visit to Caracas.

"The attack couldn't have happened without the permission of Chavez," he said, noting the technical sophistication used to break into the synagogue and crack safes inside.

Herzfeld, who was part of a four-person delegation from North America, said he is pressing U.S. Democratic congressman, Eliot Engel, chairman of the House foreign affairs subcommittee on the western hemisphere, to assemble a congressional commission on religious freedoms in Venezuela.

Israel also is using its diplomatic muscle to keep the spotlight on Venezuela's treatment of the Jewish community. Its Foreign Ministry has asked 15 countries with ties to Venezuela to bring up the issue with Chavez, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

"There has been a significant outbreak of anti-Semitism there, and we wanted to send messages to Venezuela's president through several different channels in order to clarify the gravity with which we view the situation," a senior government source told the paper.

Israel Briefs

IDF investigates allegations

Israel's military will investigate claims that some soldiers didn't behave appropriately during the recent military operation in Gaza. The Israel Defence Forces' Military Advocate General, Brig.-Gen. Avichai Mendelblit, instructed the Criminal Investigation Division of the IDF Military Police to investigate the claims made regarding alleged actions of soldiers during the war. The announcement came after soldiers at a military academy, the "Rabin" Preparation Program in Oranim, claimed during a post-operation conference that some Israeli soldiers violated rules of engagement. The content of the conference discussions was released, prompting the announcement of the investigation. Two major Israeli newspapers, Ha'aretz and Ma'ariv, began reporting soldiers' stories last week and said they would publish more. The soldiers described instances in which soldiers opened fire too hastily on civilians and destroyed Palestinian property indiscriminately.

Coalition effort extension

President Shimon Peres last Friday gave prime minister-designate Benjamin Netanyahu a 14-day extension to form a government. Netanyahu said he needed more time in light of the headway his Likud party made in talks with Labor leader Ehud Barak. Netanyahu will meet with Barak despite Netanyahu's original hope to have formed a right-wing cabinet by this past Monday. Seven of Labor's 13 MKs object to Barak's proposal to join Netanyahu's government. At least five say they intend to vote against a unity government, even if the party membership approves it.

No Schalit talks

Hamas said it has suspended talks to free Gilad Schalit and would increase its demands when they resume. The kidnapped soldier's parents said they would end their "Save Me" campaign. The campaign ended last Saturday, Schalit's 1,000th day in captivity. Noam and Aviva Schalit conducted an 11-day protest living in a tent outside the prime minister's office in Jerusalem. "All we can do now is wait for a miracle," Noam Schalit told reporters. A senior Hamas source said Hamas is willing to turn Schalit into a new Ron Arad, an Israeli airman who has been missing since 1986. "We can demand much greater numbers than the 450 prisoners," the source told Ynet. "If they want the soldier, they need to pay. If they don't want to pay, their soldier will remain imprisoned by us for eternity."

Hamas arrests in West Bank

Israel arrested 10 Hamas leaders in the West Bank last week. The Israel Defense Forces said the arrested men were "terror operatives" who have been "the leaders of the ongoing effort to restore the administrative branch of the Hamas terror organization in the region while attempting to strengthen the power and influence of Hamas." The arrests came two days after Egyptian-mediated talks stalled then halted between Israel and Hamas on a prisoner swap to free kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit.

Dahlan: Fatah never recognized Israel

A longtime Fatah leader says the group has never recognized Israel's right to exist. Mohammed Dahlan, former Fatah security commander, made the remarks during an interview with a Palestinian Authority-controlled television station. He was responding to a question about Fatah's reported insistence that Hamas recognize Israel's right to exist as a precondition for the establishment of a Palestinian "unity government," the Jerusalem Post reported. Dahlan, who was recently tapped to serve as an adviser to Fatah's leader, PA President Mahmoud Abbas, said the PLO, an umbrella organization of Palestinian groups that has been headed by Fatah's leader, did recognize Israel. "We acknowledge that the PLO did recognize Israel's right to exist, but we are not bound by it as a resistance faction," he said.

New mayor looks to Diaspora to revitalize Jerusalem

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

JERUSALEM — Hanging over his desk, Nir Barkat keeps a large framed photograph of himself running the Jerusalem half-marathon. The city's new mayor is quick to remind a visitor he also runs full marathons.

That's good: He's going to need the perseverance of a long-distance runner to pull off his ambitious plan to save Jerusalem.

Though Israel's capital and one of the world's oldest and most revered cities, Jerusalem is also the poorest city in Israel, with high housing prices, a shrinking non-Orthodox population and a dwindling middle class.

In an interview with JTA at his office atop the municipal building, Barkat expounded on his plans to revitalize Jerusalem.

Boyish looking at 49, Barkat cuts an earnest figure in a charcoal gray suit, sky blue Oxford shirt and no tie. The former paratrooper, who made millions in high-tech, has been in office for three months after defeating veteran haredi politician Meir Porush and others.

Secular and modern Orthodox Jerusalemites greeted his election with great hope, thinking Barkat might be able to lift the city from its current rut. (Most Arab residents boycotted the election, as they do most years, in protest against Israeli sovereignty over the city.)

Barkat will be travelling to the United States, where he hopes to reach out to American Jews and make them partners in revitalizing Jerusalem. To use his language, he sees them as "shareholders" in the city.

"I know there is not one Jew who does not care about the future of Jerusalem, and what I propose is a partnership," he said.

Barkat's plan is to create special economic zones in Jerusalem that are focused on culture, life sciences and tourism. He will make his pitch in visits to New York, Boston, Los Angeles, Washington, San Francisco and Florida.

Barkat is hoping Diaspora Jews will be investment partners in joint business ventures. For example, he says, Jews in Los Angeles might invest in Jerusalem's fledgling film industry, and biotech engineers in Boston might invest in biotech in a city that hosts Hadassah Hospital and the prestigious Hebrew University.

The global financial crisis is no deterrent, he says.

"I believe in the short term, it will be more of a challenge because people have less than they had in the past or less than they want, but I'm not talking about short term," Barkat told JTA. "I want to build relationships. It's the way we do business together."

As part of the mayor's campaign to develop the city, Barkat was recently named honorary chair of the Jerusalem Foundation, the non-profit organization founded by former mayor Teddy Kollek in 1967 dedicated to the physical enhancement of the city and to social and educational enhancement of its people.

Barkat and the foundation have committed themselves to working together in co-operation to further strengthen the capital of Israel. He closed down the New Jerusalem Foundation, an initiative of Ehud Olmert when Olmert was mayor of the city, whose mission overlapped with the older, more recognized foundation established by Kollek. In doing so Barkat sent a clear message to philanthropists around the world in support of the Jerusalem Foundation and its central role in the city's rejuvenation and development.

Canadian national president of The Jerusalem Foundation, Julia Koschitzky, recently met with the new mayor of Jerusalem, Nir Barkat, when he addressed the Keren Hayesod-UIA leadership last month in Jerusalem.

But Barkat's direct, unabashed approach towards his work has raised the ire of some observers. He tussled verbally with visiting U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton earlier this month over his plan to demolish some 80 Arab houses in the neighbourhood of Silwan, just outside the walls of the Old City, to make way for an archeological park. Clinton called his plan "unhelpful" and a violation of peace efforts, while Barkat dismissed the criticism as based on "disinformation."

The dispute is one of Barkat's first tests as mayor.

The neighbourhood slated for demolition is comprised of houses built illegally by Palestinian residents of Jerusalem on land that had been set aside 20 years ago as open green space for an archeological garden.

Under three previous city administrations the houses were never removed, but recently the development plans for a park were revived.

Critics of the plan claim the issue is about politics. Not only will it displace some 1,000 Arab residents, they say, but it's part of a wider, ideologically motivated plan to secure the future of a united, Jewish Jerusalem in negotiations with the Palestinians.

Barkat, who favours settling Jews in Silwan – several dozen families have moved into the largely Arab area in recent years – rejects such criticism and says the people who live there will be relocated.

"If you have a group of people trying to plan housing in Central Park, what do you think Mayor [Michael] Bloomberg would do?" Barkat asked rhetorically. "And this park has more importance than Central Park because of its historical significance."

As for the relationship between the municipal and national governments, Barkat said he foresees a good working relationship with Benjamin Netanyahu and his staff when Netanyahu becomes prime minister.

"I know the people, and I believe they want to develop and improve Jerusalem," the mayor said. "There is good chemistry."

Barkat hopes the new government will provide a stimulus package for the city, which previous governments have promised but never delivered.

To keep the young and middle class in Jerusalem, Barkat is hoping his economic cluster zones will bear fruit and that more jobs in high-tech, life sciences, tourism and culture will keep people in Jerusalem.

"When you make Jerusalem a special economic zone, it will start raining on everyone, and with more jobs, the city comes out of its poverty," Barkat said.

He has also called for construction of more affordable housing, not just the luxury projects aimed at Diaspora Jewish buyers with money who have been predominant in recent years. Barkat wants the absentee Diaspora homeowners to rent their apartments inexpensively to local university students.

"You own an apartment, you subsidize students, help the economy and decrease the price of other apartments," he said with his trademark smile. "It's a classic win-win."

See real 'stars' at Grandview Delta Resort

Spa Life
By Kathryn Kates

Beautifying wishes do come true on the shores of Fairy Lake at Amba Health & Beauty Spa at the Delta Grandview Resort in Muskoka, Ont., minutes away from downtown Huntsville.

"People come to Muskoka for relaxation, so I try to keep the spa intimate with top-quality services and products," says spa owner/operator Corrinna MacConnell, a British-trained beauty therapist and esthetician.

The spa décor has modern elements with warm earthy tones enhanced with glowing candles.

The Amba Spa offers three treatment rooms, including a double massage room suited to couples and girlfriend getaways, and a separate area with two manicure and pedicure stations. The oversized comfy pedicure chairs are state of the art, with a massaging mechanism to die for.

In addition, there is a retail/reception area and a new guest lounge suite facing the lake – well suited to wedding parties and special groups – equipped with a kitchenette to serve buffet lunches to hungry spa-going groups preparing for a big event.

The staff at the spa numbers six, including one full- and one part-time registered massage therapist, two estheticians, a nail technician and a reflexologist.

The Amba Spa offers a number of services. Facials offered are an Aromatic Facial; Liftosome for lifting and anti-fatigue; Beaute Neuve – an exfoliating facial; the deep-cleansing Hydradermie Facial that purifies, moisturizes and oxygenates the skin with a galvanic current; the Men Spa Facial designed just for him; and the Express Facial. Facial add-ons include paraffin-wax treatment for the hands and feet, and scalp, eye or neck treatments.

Also offered is an array of massages, including hot stone and aromatherapy; reflexology; back treatments; manicures and pedicures; body wraps, including the European-Rose Body Mud and the Black Baltic Body Mud. For special occasions, including weddings, top-notch hairstylists are brought in and make-up artistry is available.

The spa offers three packages, including the two-hour Pure Balance, the five-hour Ultimate Spa Sensation and the most popular package according to MacConnell, the three-hour Retreat to Nature, which includes the Hot Rocks Foot Treatment, Deluxe Pedicure, Express Facial, Aromatherapy Hot Towels with Body Polish and European-Rose Body Mud Wrap, as well as a massage incorporating Swedish massage and the hot-rocks treatment.

"We have packages with the resort that offer guests accommodations, some meals and a $50 spa credit, including the romance package with champagne and chocolate truffles in the room," MacConnell says.

The resort's couples business is growing, but the clientele now is about 70 per cent women – 80 per cent are hotel guests and the rest locals. This year, MacConnell plans to offer women's wellness retreat packages. She will be putting this relaxation package together with the help of a psychotherapist.

Since 1911, the Delta Grandview Resort has been welcoming guests who are seeking the quiet serenity of the countryside. The all-year-round resort offers an array of accommodations consisting of 125 cosy signature rooms and one-, two- and three-bedroom spacious luxury suites, all uniquely decorated. A number of the suites feature a whirlpool bath, fireplace and full kitchen with picturesque views of Fairy Lake.

There is plenty to do when not rejuvenating at the Amba Spa, including staying fit at the recreation centre, where you will find an exercise facility, a hot tub, a sauna, an indoor pool and even an indoor tennis court with racquets and balls provided. In warmer months, Delta Grandview's heated outdoor pool overlooking the lake attracts guests.

During the winter, guests can do some cross-country skiing on well-groomed trails, tobogganand snowshoe, and they don't have to worry about equipment – it's provided by the resort. There is also an outdoor man-made ice rink for those who bring their skates from home.

In the summer, the Delta Grandview's many activities include tennis, mountain biking, basketball, frolicking along the sandy beach, boat cruises, sailing, windsurfing, kayaking, canoeing, pedal boats, nightly bonfires and KidZone – a supervised, structured program for youngsters – perfect for kids while Mom and Dad partake in services at the spa. Guests have exclusive access to ClubLink's on-site Mark O'Meara Golf Course and, for aspiring golfers, there's a nine-hole Academy Golf Course.

At many luxury resorts, you can often spot a celebrity, but at the Delta Grandview you can see real "stars" close up, when you book an evening at Ecco Valley Observatory – Canada's first astronomical resort-based observatory. Resident astronomer Thomas Kovacs takes guests on a journey through the solar system from one of the highest points in Muskoka.

The cold, dark days of winter are almost behind us and the warm, light days of spring are about to arrive. It is time to change your wardrobe and makeup and prepare yourself for the most beautiful months that lie ahead. The bright red lips and heavy eyebrows are gone, and the hottest makeup look involves larger false eyelashes, soft smoky eyes with hues of violet, green, yellow, blue and gold and flawless complexions. Eyebrows are softer and more natural. For spring 2009, blushes are in shades of soft peaches, roses and pastel plums. Lipstick is back in a large way. Nude and pale lip colour is in, as well as pinks, salmons and rich berry hues. Lip gloss is still hot but only to add shine.

FIORIO – "Spring is here!" Maurice Fiorio says. Toss off your toques and let your hair flow free. Sexy movable hair is a must this season, from bouncy layers to tousled waves. This look is easy to wear and makes every woman feel fresh and gorgeous. Spring 2009 will bring back long and medium-length hairstyles that soften the face and appear more feminine. Expect to see tone on tone and bright, clean hair colours, keeping things very monochromatic. Improving the texture and enriching the colour will help the hair appear beautiful, healthy and natural. After a long winter of constricted hair, reinvent yourself with this refreshing trend.

Every woman wants to enjoy a salon experience that leaves her hair feeling healthy, nourished and deeply pampered. New SEAH HAIRSPA Ocean Mineral from Schwarzkopf Professional empowers women to revel in deep, indulgent care and get long-lasting voluminous results. Now taking care of fine hair becomes a daily luxury!

MOROCCANOIL is a revolutionary line of lightweight hair-care products specially formulated with argan oil. By hydrating and protecting, it effectively revives weakened hair without weighing down strands.

Do your friends say you look angry or tired all the time, when really you're not? You may not know it, but your eyebrows could be the culprit. Badly defined brows can put a permanent expression on your face – without you batting an eye. Define your brows before they define you with Tweezerman Professional's acclaimed eyebrow products.

Long considered windows to the soul, eyes can reveal a lot about you; they are powerful and natural indicators of your personality and style. For those looking to amplify their eyes, look no further than legendary and trusted personal grooming brand Tweezerman Professional. Offering a specialized selection of tools that beautifully groom eyebrows and lashes, the trusted line will bestow gorgeous results to your face and prompt others to wonder how you got those pretty peepers. Be sure to try the Folding ilash Comb, Classic Lash Curler, Super Curl Eyelash Curler and a Brow Shaping Brush.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA AND SKIN CARE: Reveal your best you: uncover smoother, younger skin with Dermaglow's Glycolic Smoothing Moisturizer – skin appears revitalized and hydrated even after the first treatment.

Lancôme launches a triple-action anti-wrinkle cream: High Résolution Refill-3-XTM, a major anti-wrinkle breakthrough. The exclusive technology of Lancôme's Refill-3XTM complex helps boost the synthesis of the three key natural skin fillers – collagen, hyaluronic acid and elastin – in order to fight wrinkles.

In 2008, Clarins launched the HydraQuench skin-care line. In 2009, two new amazing products are being added to this successful range. HydraQuench Cream Mask is especially designed for dry and dehydrated skin. It provides moisture and hydration to the skin within five minutes of application. Lips need special attention of their own. They need hydration, protection and softness. Moisture Replenishing Lip Balm is designed to provide all this.

Lancôme's research and innovations laboratories are once again pushing back the frontiers of anti-age care for men's skin with Age Force, Global Anti-Age Treatment. Effectively fighting the signs of aging in men over 50, the active substances in Age Force have been selected for their ability to work on two levels, giving men's skin a global, all-round solution to their skin's problems.

Skin is precious. Reward it with Estée Lauder's Re-Nutriv Intensive Lifting Collection, which is introducing the new Re-Nutriv Intensive Lifting Lotion, a luxe, lightweight version of the crème with exceptional lifting benefits, to create luminous, visibly younger-looking skin.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

CONCEALER & FOUNDATION: Are you tired of those dark circles and the look of fatigue? Well, don't look any further. Yves Rocher Couleurs Nature introduces Complexion Concealer Palette and Radiance Corrector Pen, two amazing products that can help erase these problems.

The time has come to reverse all the damaging effects of the winter. Clarins decided to launch a supplement product that is specifically designed for mature skin. Super Restorative Foundation is the foundation for those who want to have the look of a luminous and colourful makeup in natural or artificial lights. The skin is protected, younger looking, firmer and smoother.

Estée Lauder is proud to present the Nutritious Vita-Mineral Makeup Collection. Nutritious Vita-Mineral Liquid Makeup is the newest way to get your mineral makeup every day and provides additional moisture.

Yves Rocher creates the first makeup line inspired by nature. Each product contains a natural active botanical ingredient that marks its originality and guarantees its effectiveness. As of April 2009, Yves Rocher will introduce Comfort Cream Foundation, Flawless Finish Fluid Foundation, Matte Fluid Foundation and Second Skin Effect Foundation.

Nutritious Vita-Mineral Loose Power SPF15 Makeup is a non-drying powder that comes with its own exclusive deluxe loose powder foundation brush that makes creating a natural, flawless look a breeze.

EYE MAKEUP: After getting through these long, tough months, nothing can perk up your spirits more than a new spring look for eye makeup. Shades of pink, purple, blue and green are hot, as well as dark blue eyeliner. For daytime, apply the colour lightly, and then enhance with a soft smoky look for evening. Complement the intense shades of spring with Estée Lauder's Signature Eyeshadow Duo in new, limited-edition shades of dark, inky indigo and rich, earthen aubergine.

Estee Lauder Re-Nutriv, Intensive Lifting Lotion

Clarins offers a limited-edition eye make-up palette that combines six pure subtle shades packaged in a silver compact with a floral design. You can become very creative with all these wonderful colours. Also, try the ultramarine eye pencil.

In order to prevent eye infections, you should replace mascara every three months, so what better time than with the change of seasons? Curvés are back and big is beautiful! Now's the time to live life to the fullest. Introducing Sexy Curves Mascara from Rimmel London. The flexible purple applicator has shorter bristles to build volume and longer ones to curl and separate, for a sultry look.

Yves Rocher Couleurs Nature is proud to present Extra-Volume Mascara, the mascara that makes the lashes thick, and separates with its amazing fibre coating brush, as well as Curl Extender Mascara which stretches, lengthens and curls each lash by lash.

BLUSH: If you are looking for blushes, try Yves Rocher Couleurs Nature complexion. Brush-on Illuminator is in a tube, Natural Blush has a sheer, powdery texture, Highlighter and Shimmer Powder Duo create a healthy glow and brightening effect and Bronzer and Shimmer Powder Duo gives a sun-kissed and brightening effect.

LIPS: Brighten your smile with Elizabeth Arden's Color Intrigue Effects Lipstick (limited edition), sensational shades, moisturizing colour, and lasting effects.

If you are looking for that take-anywhere lip balm, Clarins has introduced Instant Sun Light Lip Balm SPF6, a protective, melt-in-the-mouth texture that tastes as good as it looks.

OPI Envy Express Kit

FRAGRANCES: The right makeup makes you look pretty, but fragrances are really the finishing touch. Elizabeth Arden presents the new fragrance Pretty. The Pretty scent is ageless and timeless. It's a fragrance all women can relate to.

Estée Lauder invites you to discover three new ways to enjoy Estée Lauder refreshing splashes light enough to wear all over your body – Baie Rose Peony Splash, Jasmine Violet Splash and Sandalwood Amber Splash.

You are almost on your way to enjoying the prettiest time of year. Your nails need some attention to the change in climate, so make sure to keep them strong with OPI Envy Express Kit. These are mini-size bottles that contain a Natural Nail Strengthener, Maintenance Nail Strengthener and Drip Dry Laquer Drying Drops. Their travel friendly size lets you take them wherever your hectic schedule takes you.

Have fun with all these wonderful products and tips and most importantly enjoy!

Scarves are versatile accessories for all seasons

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

My sister always says that she feels warmer no matter what the season when she throws a scarf around her neck.

While that may be true throughout many of our changing seasons, the scarf is not just for warmth anymore. Worn by young girls, grandmothers, fashion leaders and Hollywood icons, the scarf has now become the must-have accessory throughout all four seasons.

Available in a dizzying array of fabrics ranging from traditional silk, rayon, wool, linen, polyester, jacquard, stretch jersey and so many mixes crossing all categories, the scarf is about as versatile a fashion item as any can get. Throwing on a camisole, blazer and sunglasses, designer or otherwise, and topping it all off with a scarf changes the look and feel of any outfit.

Who can forget the image of Grace Kelly, long silk scarf tied around her neck blowing in the wind, in her convertible driving along the cliffs of Europe?

Designers have always seen the beauty in scarves, with Versace setting the standard with his line of colourful silk squares. Most of Europe's fashion houses have scarves in their spring and indeed yearly collections, including Gucci, Emilio Pucci, Dolce & Gabbana and Burberry. Knock-offs have hit every retailer from the popular mall shops to more exclusive boutiques.

Transitioning from spring to summer sees the addition of colourful scarves in flowing, gauzy fabric. Scarves have become so much of a fashion statement for spring and summer that the newest look features the standard halter or sleeveless shirt topped with a fashion-forward scarf.

Scarves sporting iconic symbols such as peace signs make wearing a scarf a fun accessory for teens and tweens.

Try tying an animal-print scarf to a purse to create a signature look.
[Anita Szabadi-Gottesman photos]

A scarf can be worn in so many different ways. It can be wrapped once around the neck, or you can create a loop or a plain drape to make a signature look. Dress up a scarf with a brooch – an elegant pearl or hand-set marquisate or a whimsical ceramic piece. Use a scarf as a belt to dress up an old pair of pants, tying a bow at the waist or just letting the edges fall where they may. If a summer's day is too warm and sticky to sport a scarf, tie it to your purse as your personal fashion statement.

Fabric choice can also spice up the look. Animal prints of all sizes and colours add just that touch of fun to any outfit. The colours of spring have been combined with cheetah and zebra patterns to create scarves that can be paired with a conservative suit or a pair of weekend jeans.

Florals and geometrics are big. The biggest trend to hit this year's runway is scarves with themes. Making a statement by wearing a scarf replete with peace signs or other iconic symbols is a favourite of the younger set.

Breaking out of the traditional patterned, discreet scarf style and colours has allowed the scarf to reach across all generations, including the teen and preteen group. For baby boomers, it is amazing to see all the teens and tweens sporting scarves in a multitude of tie-dye patterns across the entire colour palette.

A poet turns 100

By NORMAN RAVVIN

The market for bronze was up, while other things – oil, silver, stock in major American banks – were trading low. This news found its way to Montreal vandals, leading them to pop the historical plaques off park monuments on the east side of the city. Who it was that was waiting to buy these as scrap to melt down remained a mystery.

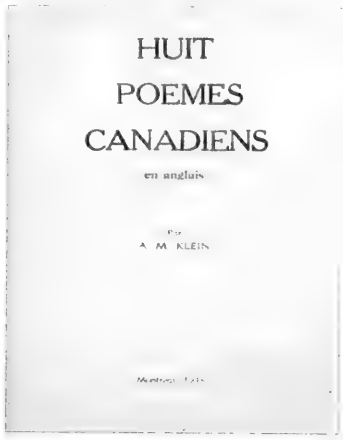
Norman Ravvin

At the same time, news came that A.M. Klein, born 100 years ago, whose active career as a poet, novelist, journalist and would-be politico waned in the early 1950s, would be honoured with one of the familiar bronze plaques mounted by the Federal Board for Historic Sites and Monuments at his former home on Hutchison near Laurier. Other "National Historic Persons" designated along with Klein included his compatriot, the Yiddish publisher Hirsch Wolofsky, Alexander (Boss) Gibson, the manufacturing baron who lorded over an empire in Marysville, near Fredericton, and communications theorist Marshall McLuhan.

Canadian Jewish history has been set in bronze elsewhere by the federal government, notably near Hirsch in southern Saskatchewan, where the phenomenon of Jewish prairie farming colonies is commemorated by a plaque posted at the site of the cemetery that served the colonists.

The bronze mounted on Hutchison will contribute to the ongoing shifts in our understanding and reception of Klein, who was an omnipresent figure on the Montreal scene in the 1930s and '40s. In the decades since his death in 1972, Klein's presence on our literary landscape has been marked most notably by regard for his 1948 Governor General's Award-winning collection, The Rocking Chair and Other Poems, and for his 1951 novel The Second Scroll. He has been viewed as a mentor and model to younger poets, yet one would be hard pressed to find a young poet who modelled himself on Klein, whether on his persona or his poetic motifs.

The renaissance of interest in Klein in recent years runs tandem with a renaissance in cultural affairs in his home city. Montreal's economic and cultural recovery is solid, and Klein's interest in crossing cultural lines provides a satisfying example of the way a truly multicultural city operates (not necessarily in any official way, but through the efforts of its writers, its boulevardiers, and, even, its graffiti artists and talk-show hosts).



A remarkable document, prescient of all this, which would look nice set in bronze, is titled Huit Poemes Canadiens (en anglais) par A.M. Klein. An unacknowledged publication of the Canadian Jewish Congress, it was printed in 1948 in order to further French-Jewish relations in the postwar era.

The pamphlet is made up of just 16 pages – heavy paper stapled and folded. Its contents include eight of Klein's poems from the Rocking Chair period, along with introductory remarks in French by a writer associated with La Presse newspaper. But most remarkable is the author's French-language note heading a poem titled Parade of St. Jean Baptiste, in which he outlines his poetic goals. The note, translated, reads as follows: "This poem, one in a series of attempts, can be interpreted as a bilingual language, since the vocabulary of the poetry is closer in origin to Latin and Normandy. Each of the words, with the exception of articles and auxiliaries, have a sound similar to one among French words – words that are very close to each other in the two languages."

Imagine the uniqueness of Klein's undertaking, however minor its effects, in the still unsettled postwar moment when no one had yet heard of a thing called multiculturalism. His poem, credted of an imagined "langage bilingue," begins this way: "Bannered, and ranked, and at its stances fixed/ the enfilade with vestment colours the air./ Roll now the batons of the tambours round/ ruminant with commencement, and now sound/ annunciative, ultramontane, the/ fanfares of jubilee!"

Parade of St. Jean Baptiste is not exactly a poem for the masses, though it is a celebration of the people. Huit Poemes Canadiens is generally found only in archival collections. As a contribution to Canadian letters, it is like almost nothing else.

Norman Ravvin is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Parade of St. Jean Baptiste

Ce poème, l'un d'une série d'essais, peut s'interpréter comme un "langage bilingue" quoique le vocabulaire de la poésie est plutôt d'origine latine et Normande. Chacun des mots (à l'exception toutefois d'articles ou de mots auxiliaires) ont une consonnance synonyme à ceux de la langue française. — A.M.K.

Bannered, and ranked, and at its stances fixed the enfilade with vestment colors the air.
Roll now the batons of the tambours round ruminant with commencement, and now sound annunciative, ultramontane, the fanfares of jubilee!
It moves: festive and puissant the chivalry advances chief, law crouped and curvetting—finish and force, undulant muscle and braid—
O centaurs en gambade!

They move as through a garden, moving between gay altitudes of flowers, populous of all the wards and counties burgeoning here:
ribbons and countenances, joys and colors—
nuances of meridian, the blue the rose, the vert, the blond, all lambencies to this rich spectacle turned heliotropic, graceful and levitant: Quebec, its people:
flotation of faces; badinage of petals:
profound from suburbs surfaced on the Real to spy Imagination.

Applause! Ovation of hourras! There pass before the flowering faces, imaged, the animal fables, myths of the crayon'd class, the nursery's voyage and discovery:
redeemed and painted is the Indian;
lake sirens chant again; and sorcery
again makes princess out of Cendrillon,
(by Massicotte, research; and courtesy of Simpson's and of Eaton T. and Son)
last! last! the coachmen of classe-galerie.
Oh, all, — parents, their infant epaulettes —
Here all are dauphins of a vanished empery.

PBS documentary centres on Jerusalem

Compiled by CJN Staff

Jerusalem: Center of the World, the two-hour documentary by Emmy-Award-winning director Andrew Goldberg, airs on PBS television in HD on April 1 at 9 p.m.

Host Ray Suarez, of PBS' The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer, explores the founding of the city and the birth and convergence of the world's three major monotheistic religions.

He lends voice to the key events in Jerusalem's history, as described in the Hebrew and Christian bibles, as well as the Talmud, the Haggadah, the Qur'an and the Hadith.

Jerusalem: Center of the World takes viewers beyond the city's exteriors to follow the paths taken by Abraham, David, Jesus and Muhammad.

Highlights include segments focusing on Mount Moriah, site of the First and Second Temples; the Church of the Holy Sepulcher; the Dome of the Rock and the Western Wall.

Holy Blossom concert features songs of war, peace

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Music has an unparallelled ability to bring people together.

While it is often a force that unites people in pleasure, it can also be a cauldron for raising consciousness.

That is precisely the goal of an upcoming concert at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple.

Titled Every Mother's Son: Jewish Songs of War and Peace, the show will present a unique blend of war and peace compositions in Yiddish, Hebrew, Ladino and English and will feature acclaimed vocalist Adrienne Cooper and accomplished jazz pianist Marilyn Lerner.

"We have chosen to communicate social advocacy and raise people's consciousness through song," says Freda Ariella Muscovitch, a member of the synagogue's music committee and co-organizer of the concert.

"This particular topic about the enduring human experience of war and the struggle to make peace is extremely powerful and important."

Original compositions highlighting the genres of klezmer, jazz and modern classical music will be performed, as well as songs by Bertholdt Brecht, Kurt Weill, Phil Ochs, Marianne Faithfull and Hanns Eisler.

Will be presented in a multimedia format with translations and visual presentations

The concert will be presented in a multimedia format with translations and visual projections, including abstract images and photography of such dramatic scenes as child soldiers, teen war brides and mothers of children at war.

The images will help to convey the messages of defiance, hope and humour, along with expressions of conflict resolution and the persistence of love during times of war.

"This concert is very much connected to Passover, which is all about redemption and social justice," says Holy Blossom's renowned Cantor Benjamin Maissner.

"The music on its own is incredible, but the theme is especially intriguing."

A poignant moment during the event will be an introductory keynote address by Leonard Levy, an 88-year-old World War II veteran, who is a longtime member of the synagogue, as well as a volunteer with the Memory Project Speaker's Bureau.

"Leonard is known for wearing a sweater that his mother knitted for him before he went off to war and that is related to our theme of 'every mother's son,'" says Muscovitch.

"We are very proud to be honouring Jewish war veterans in this manner."

The concert takes place on April 12 at 8 p.m.

For tickets, call Mari Lynn Rusak at 416-789-3291 ext. 224, at the temple.

World War II veteran Leonard Levy will give the keynote address at a concert intended to "raise people's consciousness through song."

Emil Sher's play raises ethical issues

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

The 1990s controversy over Robert Latimer's killing his severely disabled daughter inspired Emil Sher to write Mourning Dove – first for radio, then for stage.

"I was commissioned to write the play while working as a story editor on CBC Radio's Morningside with host Peter Gzowski. I remember being struck by how thick the transcripts of the trial were – the size of small city phone books," Sher recalled on the phone from his Toronto office.

On Oct. 24, 1993, when Saskatchewan farmer Robert Latimer killed his daughter, Tracy, the debate began. Does a parent have the right to kill a child? Latimer was convinced he did the right thing, since 12-year-old Tracy was suffering from cerebral palsy, weighed 38 pounds and was about to undergo another surgery to relieve pain.

Compelled by broader issues rather than the specifics of Latimer's case, Sher created Mourning Dove, the fictitious world of the Ramsays – Doug and Sandra, their severely disabled daughter, Tina – and Keith, an intellectually challenged friend of the family employed in Doug's hardware store.

Although the play is set in a home workshop rather than in a courtroom, once Ramsay takes Tina's life, which he is convinced is the best thing he can do for her, a trial within the family begins. What Ramsay doesn't expect is the fallout from his wife and the reaction of Keith, who gives voice to the other side of the argument.

After the CBC radio broadcast in 1996 and broadcasts on Worldplay, an inaugural radio festival heard around the world, Sher, an award-winning playwright, adapted it for stage productions in Ottawa, Kitchener, Halifax and last fall, Vancouver.

Presented by the Ark Collective, Mourning Dove makes its Toronto première on Tuesday, April 7, at 8 p.m. at the Tarragon Theatre Extra Space, directed by Dora Award-winning actor Liza Balkan. Cast members include Steve Cumyn, Vickie Papavs, Colin Doyle and Kimwun Perehinec.

Sher initially resisted adapting the play to theatre. "I didn't know how I was going to show this young girl on stage, but when I realized I didn't have to – that she could be created through sound and light, then I worked with Richard Rose [a director and the founding artistic director of Toronto's Necessary Angel Theatre], and turned it into a stage play."

Using elements of radio drama – sound and voice – Sher has the audience hear Tina breathing, but she never appears on stage.

"It's not about showing this handicapped girl," Sher said. "It's about how the family copes with Tina's debilitating disability. It also raises the larger issue: to what extent are we spirit over flesh and what makes us who we are? Is it our bodies as contorted as they may be or is it the soul within? I'm always trying to bring in additional layers to leave the audience thinking."

What's Sher currently working on? He's been commissioned by Joel Greenberg of Studio 180, where Sher is playwright in residence, to write Conviction, about wrongful convictions.

Greenberg's daughter, Jessica, played Hana in Sher's adaptation of Karen Levine's Hana's Suitcase about 12-year-old Holocaust victim Hana Brady. The play toured Canada and the United States and will be staged in Israel in 2010.

Sher is also weaving documentary footage from Larry Weinstein's Inside Hana's Suitcase into interactive webisodes for the upcoming website. Weinstein's film will be screened at upcoming Toronto festivals.

For information about Sher, visit www.emilsher.com

Mourning Dove previews April 3 and runs April 7 to 11. For tickets, call Tarragon Theatre Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave., 416-531-1827.

Actor, political activist Ron Silver dies

JTA

JERUSALEM — Ron Silver, an award-winning actor and co-founder of an organization calling for a united Jerusalem, has died.

Silver, who won a Tony Award for his performance in Speed-the-Plow, died March 15 in New York City two years after being diagnosed with esophageal cancer. He was 62.

In 2000, Silver co-founded the One Jerusalem organization, calling for a united Jerusalem as the capital of Israel, in opposition to the Oslo peace accords.

He was a liberal activist who helped found the Creative Coalition, an arts-oriented political group, in 1989. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he switched his party affiliation from Democrat to independent and became a public supporter of former U.S. president George W. Bush. He was a featured speaker at the 2004 Republican National Convention.

Ron Silver

He began hosting the Ron Silver Show, a weekly politics and public affairs radio program, on Sirius Satellite Radio in February 2008.

While Silver won a Tony in 1988 for his portrayal of Hollywood producer Charlie Fox in the David Mamet play, he also excelled as a film and television actor. Silver was nominated for an Emmy Award as Bruno Gianelli on The West Wing TV series and received acclaim for his portrayal of lawyer Alan Dershowitz, a staunch Israel advocate, in the 1990 film Reversal of Fortune.

Amazing mentalist understands power of suggestion

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

I'm given a piece of piece of paper and told to draw something on it. I wander down the halls of WestWind Pictures in search of an empty room and get to work. I consider drawing a heart or a triangle, but that seems too easy. Eventually, I settle on a poorly drawn car.

"Don't show me the drawing. Fold it up and put it in your pocket," says Haim Goldenberg, a mentalist who, I'm told, has just bent a spoon using nothing but his mind. Back in the boardroom, Goldenberg tells me to picture my drawing and think of a colour. I think of yellow. He guesses blue.

Haim Goldenberg

"What hand do you write with?" he asks, unfazed by his incorrect guess. I answer and he tells me to grasp his wrist with my right hand. Focusing hard, he begins moving his hands, slowly making a half circle. He'll never get it, I think. He stops, pulls out a piece of paper and draws something. It's a car, almost identical to the drawing in my pocket.

Goldenberg has been a mentalist since he was eight years old, and has been practising since he was six, when he first saw Israeli mentalist Uri Geller.

"He took a spoon and bent it… he said everyone can do it… I believed it. I took a spoon and tried to do it and nothing happened," he said. Goldenberg practised every day for two years until finally, when he was eight years old, the spoon bent, just a little.

"I tried more and more... I didn't go to school [that day], I went on the street and tried to read minds," he said, adding that he was mostly unsuccessful.

Since then, Goldenberg has honed his talents. He's performed in Israel and internationally, including at the world's largest magic convention in New York. Using his mental powers, Goldenberg has driven through traffic blindfolded and stopped his own pulse while at the Hospital for Sick Children. And soon, he'll star in his own reality show.

Goldmind, which airs on March 22 on TVtropolis, follows the Israeli-born mentalist around the city as he connects with ordinary Torontonians. In the series, Goldenberg forces an artist to omit the CN tower while sketching Toronto's skyline, visits a passerby's house through the person's memories and stops a gym-buff from lifting his weights, all with the power of his mind.

"Mentalism is to put information in the mind and take [information]… It's like a conversation with someone in a different way. I believe anyone can do it," he said. "I don't have supernatural powers – the only power we have is the power of believing."

Goldenberg encourages skeptics to come on the show. While in the development process, he estimated that there would be a 50-50 success rate, but was surprised to find that the ratio was closer to 80-20.

"I know how to choose the people… I have psychological tricks to make you choose something," he said.

A large part of Goldenberg's show is explaining the process of his demonstration and the power of suggestion. In one episode, he invites two businesswomen to his office and offers them more than $100,000 if they write out a cheque for any number but the one that he has written on his cheque. When the two cheques match, he takes the women through the building, pointing out every spot where that number appears.

The show is produced by WestWind Pictures, the same company that produces Little Mosque on the Prairie and Designer Guys. For Mary Darling, executive producer and CEO of WestWind Pictures, GoldMind's appeal lies in Goldenberg's optimism.

"It's positive reality – it's not voting someone off the island," she said. "There really is an openness… a togetherness. We refer to him as an opera-friendly mentalist."

Goldmind premières on March 22 and will air Sundays at 6 and 9 p.m. on TVtropolis.

Charlie Brown's back in town

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Charlie Brown and the Peanuts crew are probably some of the most beloved comic strip characters ever.

As entertaining as the group were as kids, imagine what they'd be like as teenagers?

That's what Dog Sees God explores.

The off-Broadway play is a parody of CB and friends and is now making its Canadian première run at Toronto's Six Degrees nightclub.

The show features a number of esteemed Canadian performers, including Jake Epstein from Degrassi: The Next Generation, Adamo Ruggiero, Mike Lobel, Paula Brancati and Tatiana Maslany.

"Fast forwarding the lives of the Peanuts' characters… makes the whole play that much more interesting," says Epstein, who plays the leadrole of CB.

"I want audiences to be moved and entertained."

The Dog Sees God storyline centres on CB's experience with losing his dog to rabies and questioning whether there is, in fact, an afterlife.

The time of grief and doubt is initially compounded by the fact that CB can't count on the people closest to him, as they are all grappling with their own, very real teenage issues, including drug problems, the search for self and eating disorders.

But he connects with an old, forgotten friend and their relationship is central to the plot.

"Every teenager can relate to the issues discussed in this play," says Epstein, 22.

"The play raises awareness of these issues, but doesn't 'preach' any message. It lets teenagers know that yes, it is really hard being a teenager, and that as a teenager, you're not alone on these issues…I'm hoping teenagers that come will see how theatre can be relevant, funny, dark and moving."

The Toronto-born and raised actor has been honing his craft since he was 10.

In addition to a diverse array of productions at school, Epstein gained experience performing in such well-known productions as Our Town and Oliver, and was a regular on the Fox Family series The Zack Files.

Stardom struck during the Degrassi years, which yielded the talented thespian a Gemini Award and subsequent nomination, as well as a Young Artist Award nomination.

"Degrassi was a huge part of my growing up," says Epstein, who played the lead character of Craig Manning on the popular show.

"I got the role on the show in my first year of high school... so my high school years are absolutely linked to working on Degrassi. I think the show has a lot of heart, and I loved the feeling of being part of something important – something that helped other teenagers get through really tough times or at least know that they weren't alone."

Although the show brought Epstein a certain degree of fame and celebrity status, his solid Jewish upbringing and down-to-earth values have clearly kept him self-aware and appreciative.

"From being on Degrassi for five years, I learned the importance of being true to who you are," Epstein reflects.

"Fame is like an abstract painting. People see you and think you can be all sorts of things… [That's why] it's important to be happy with yourself, without a TV show defining you."

Since his time on the show, Epstein has studied at the National Theatre School of Canada and has appeared in such shows as Dangerous Liaisons and Cinderella.

As for the future, Epstein has his sights set on the Big Apple.

"Five years from now, I hope to be living somewhere exciting – maybe New York – performing on Broadway. That's the dream."

Dog Sees God is on until April 4. For tickets, call 1-888-222-6608 or visit online at www.dogseesgod.ca or www.ticketweb.ca.

Kolel's new Israel tours

Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, is offering a new summer tour to Israel, July 19 to 29, led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein. The activity-packed itinerary includes sites in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, the Galilee and Golan and is geared for first-timer couples, singles and families with post-bar and bat mitzvah teens. Free information meeting, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, Monday, March 30, 8 p.m.

Back by popular demand is Rabbi Goldstein's Women's Inward Bound Tour, a spiritual and physical experience including yoga, drumming in the desert, meditation, biking, hiking, rafting, and of course meeting extraordinary women. Travel dates are Nov. 15 to 23. Free information meeting at BJCC Monday, May 4, 8 p.m. 416-636-1880, ext. 472, www.kolel.org.

Aish in the Annex

'No pressure' Aish in the Annex welcomes Jewish youths from all backgrounds

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to Heebonics

The key to Aish's new outreach centre on Spadina Road is more than just education and socializing. It's chocolate.

"All I do is eat chocolate with people," said Chana Goldstein of her one-on-one lessons on Jewish philosophy.

She and her husband, Rabbi Mitch Goldstein, are the leaders of Aish in the Annex, a new branch of Aish, an outreach program for Jewish youth. Aish in the Annex hopes to reach young Jews in downtown Toronto. The program mixes social nights with education and includes a Maimonides Leaders Fellowship, a 10-week program that pays students $500 to attend lectures.

The Goldsteins, who have been running Aish in the Annex since its inception six months ago, were originally born in England and completed their rabbinical studies in Israel.

"I fell in love with Israel," Rabbi Goldstein said. "Studying at a rabbinical school in Israel, it's a different experience. You're in a place where it all happened, it's like studying in Rome... for Roman history."

After spending six years in Israel, the couple was selected to work for a branch of the Jewish Awareness Movement, a Jewish outreach organization in Santa Barbara, Calif.

"However disconnected [you] think Jewish youth are [here], until you lived in California, you have no idea," Chana said. "They just know nothing. [They asked], 'What is kosher? I heard of it on Seinfeld.' There's zero Jewish identity. It was a lot more extreme out there."

The couple decided to leave California when their son, Moshe, reached school age, said Rabbi Goldstein.

"Santa Barbara is a beautiful place... I wanted [my son] to get Jewish schooling, which is not available in Santa Barbara," he said. "We lived on campus, in the student area – there were no other children his age."

After visiting Toronto on vacation, they decided to settle there.

"I saw how warm it was," Rabbi Goldstein said. "The reason we chose Toronto is the people. They're very genuine."

While in Santa Barbara, Chana began giving one-on-one lessons to Jewish youth.

"I was so intimidated with the situation, I was terrified," said Chana, who received a law degree in England. "My husband said, 'What do you like to do?' I said, 'I like eating chocolate.'"

And the chocolate box was born. From the corner of the centre's living room, Chana reaches for a light blue box brimming with sweets. A red word, "inspiration," hangs on the side.

"It's 50 per cent information and 50 per cent inspiration," Rabbi Goldstein said. "We're very outgoing and fun. Our programming is very cutting edge and enjoyable – there's a no-pressure environment."

Aish in the Annex includes weekly Shabbat dinners, Tuesday night socials, a Hebrew café where participants can practice the language, and classes on topics like love and happiness. The program also includes guest speakers for young professionals on issues like financial success in the recession and social networking.

But mainly, Aish in the Annex is a place where Jewish youths from all backgrounds can feel comfortable.

"Some people come and just want to hang out," Goldstein said. "It's just their environment, it's on their turf... In a synagogue, they sometimes feel like it's not their territory, they're not relaxed, they're not in their element."

Maiya Keidan, a third-year Ryerson University student and Aish member, agrees.

"There's a comfort level... I come from a secular background. I always feel like people are judging me, I don't feel like that here," she said. "It's a different way of approaching Judaism."

For Naomi Haworth, 23, the Goldsteins are key in creating this comfort level.

"The Goldsteins, they're fun to hang out with, they're really inviting," said the York University graduate. "It's relaxed, it's like a home."

Chana's cooking doesn't hurt, either.

"Have you found the chocolate cookies?" Haworth asked. "They're called crack cookies for a reason."

Rabbi Goldstein, 28, believes that his age also helps him relate to students, who are usually 18 to 22 years old, and young professionals, who are aged 22 and up.

"I'm not a particularly old person... I understand what people like because I'm them. It's not like I'm 50 years old," he said.

What makes the Goldsteins unique is their insistence on being genuine, no matter what the situation. After living in California, Chana realized the importance of being herself.

While there, she got to tour the set of E.R.

"It wrecked E.R. for me. I walked around the ambulance bay...it looked so real, but as soon as you walk through the doors, it's just a picture," she said.

"I think it's all about being yourself... people are sick of fake. [It's] the biggest lesson I learned in California."

For the Goldsteins, this isn't difficult.

"We have an inability to be anything than ourselves," Chana said.

Chana Goldstein and Rabbi Mitch Goldstein moved to Toronto with their son, Moshe, to run Aish in the Annex.

Winnipeg federation joins Mideast public relations war

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A public relations war is being waged between Israel and the Palestinians, and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg is going on the offensive.

Over the past few months, the federation's community relations committee, chaired by Abby Morris, has been forming coalitions with university professors, other educators and other community organizations to combat the rising tide of anti-Israel propaganda that is threatening to wash away goodwill for Israel in the West.

"Over the past year, it has become increasingly difficult for us to counter the growing media bias and advocate for Israel," Shelley Faintuch, the federation's community relations director, told a group of primarily Jewish educators at the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

They were there to get some ideas from Faintuch on how to better inform their students and themselves about the ongoing Mideast conflict.

"It has been especially difficult in the last two months. When Israel first launched Operation Cast Lead and sent the army into Gaza, there was widespread support for the operation in the western world. But as reported Palestinian casualties mounted, that support rapidly dissipated," Faintuch said.

The evening began with a presentation by Erez Rotem, the Jewish National Fund shaliach for the Prairie region. A former Israeli journalist, he spoke about the necessity of focusing Israel education programs on the young. He said a double standard existed in reporting news from the Mideast by many western media outlets, and he contrasted Israeli news coverage of the fighting in Gaza with what was presented on Al-Jazeera. He also showed film clips of a Qassam missile strike on a house in Sderot and of Sderot children running for shelter to escape a missile attack.

Faintuch distributed a pamphlet titled Apartheid for Dummies, which referred to Israeli Apartheid Week. Last week, Israeli Apartheid Week was held at about 40 campuses across North America, but not on Manitoba university campuses.

"We have been living in a calm environment in Winnipeg up to now. We are just beginning to experience what Jewish communities out east have been experiencing for some time," Faintuch said.

She said that the community relations committee is trying to ensure that Winnipeg panel discussions on the Mideast conflict have pro-Israel representation.

The committee is bringing in counterterrorism expert Amos Guiora and Israel-Arab journalist Khaled Abu Toameh to speak on the local campuses to counter speaking tours by anti-Israel activists such as Jeff Halper, the co-founder of the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions, who was recently in Winnipeg.

"We are trying to emphasize in our discussions with the universities their responsibility to provide a safe and secure environment for learning for the students who pay to attend. Many Canadian universities are failing in that duty," Morris said.

Faintuch and Rotem said that educators should show the positive side of life in Israel – the technological and medical achievements, the beauty of nature and the sheer joy of life in the country – to students, instead of simply countering media attacks on Israel.

Yolanda Papini Pollock, a grade 4 and 5 teacher in the Hebrew bilingual program at Margaret Park School, said she strived to make sure her students get "a balanced view of Israel despite all the negative stuff in the media. We deal with specific issues on a regular basis. It's good to show different aspects of Israel unrelated to the conflict."

Organic community garden holds info night

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

An information night about Kavanah Organic Community Teaching Garden, the community-supported agriculture program (CSA) at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, is set for April 2, 7:30 p.m. at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre.

The CSA is a partnership between the Kavanah Garden and Daniel Hoffman, who runs Cutting Veg Organic Farm, and caters to individuals or families who receive fresh, local, organically grown produce.

Risa Alyson Strauss, program director of Kavanah Garden, said that Hoffman grows the organic produce at his Brampton-area farm or sources other organic local produce, and delivers it each Thursday from May to November for pick-up at the garden.

Members purchase either a regular ($25) or large share ($35), and are free to choose the produce – the variety depends on the season – that best suits their needs.

Food grown at the garden itself is donated to social service agencies to be distributed to community members who lack access to fresh, local, organic produce, Strauss said.

There are 30 other Jewish communities across North America – there are two other CSA's in Toronto, at the First Narayever and Beth Radom congregations – that have "committed to putting Jewish purchasing power behind our local farmers," Strauss said.

For details about the information night, when prospective members can meet Hoffman, call 647-388-7444, or e-mail daniel@thecuttingveg.com, or visit www.torathateva.org.

CHAT Cougars win York Region hockey championship

The TanenbaumCHAT Kimel Centre (TCK) Cougars defeated the league-leading St. Robert Rams in a best-of-three final to win the York Region Athletic Association (YRAA) senior Tier 2 boys hockey championship.

TCK needed an overtime goal from Sean Cheskes to squeeze out a 5-4 win to capture the championship against the undefeated Rams.

The Rams opened the series with a 6-2 victory over the Cougars in a game played at Clatworthy Arena. TanenbaumCHAT came back in Game 2, played at Elgin Barrow East, winning 5-3 and forcing the decisive Game 3.

St. Robert scored early in the title match – only two minutes in – and continued to pour on the pressure, but goalie Sam Manley barred the door and kept the Cougars within one goal.

Ray Abramson got the tying goal in the second, though his shot appeared to hit the crossbar and stay out. Play continued and after a minute the referees blew the whistle, discussed the play and called it a goal. That would be the Cougar's only bright spot in a second period dominated by St. Robert, which scored three goals to make the game 4-1.

Despite feeling dejected, the Cougars, coached by Adam Chaim and Jeff Borsuk, didn't give up. Sean Cheskes began the Cougars' rally, scoring two goals two minutes apart in the middle of the third period.

Trailing 4-3, the Cougars were awarded several power plays, but couldn't capitalize on the man advantage. With time winding down, however, Cheskes centred the puck to Matthew Lewenberg, who one-timed it into the net to tie the game. There was just 1:09 left on the clock.

There was no further scoring during regulation time, but in overtime, Cheskes came through again, capitalizing on a blind pass from David Garbuz for the hat-trick, game winner, series clincher and YRAA championship.

CHAT Cougars celebrate after winning hockey championship.

Beukeboom to replace Pierre McGuire behind Canada bench

Summer tournament set for Metulla

One of the most decorated players in modern National Hockey League history will coach Team Canada Red in this summer's World Jewish Hockey Tournament.

Jeff Beukeboom, who won four Stanley Cup championships in his 16-year NHL career, will replace Pierre McGuire, who dropped out of the tournament due to personal and professional commitments.

"I'm sorry to be giving up this opportunity," said McGuire. "I really wanted to be part of this. But if I can't go, I can't imagine being replaced by anyone better than Jeff Beukeboom."

Beukeboom, 44, a close friend of Canada White coach Steve Thomas, won three Cups with the Edmonton Oilers and a fourth playing alongside Brian Leetch with the New York Rangers. Since his retirement from playing, he has coached AAA hockey and is currently an assistant coach with the Barrie Colts of the OHL.

"I'm very excited to be part of this," said Beukeboom. "This is a rare opportunity, both for hockey and for me, personally."

Beukeboom's son, Brock, a defenceman in the OHL, is considered likely to follow in his father's footsteps as a coming first round pick in the NHL. Beukeboom, himself was the 19th pick overall in the 1983 NHL entry draft, which included Hall of Fame players Steve Yzerman, Pat LaFontaine and Cam Neely.

The World Jewish Hockey Tournament will be held in Metulla, Israel, from July 5 to 15, featuring teams from Canada, the United States, Russia, France and Israel.

Lights! Camera! Peace?

ALMOST FAMOUS

By Jacob Medjuck

Six weeks in Los Angeles and you can forget the studios. I'm ready to pitch the U.S. Congress: Sodom and Gomorrah may have been onto something.

Welcome to the movie business. You can adopt a daughter and then have sex with her. You can drive your car into your neighbour's kid's birthday party and hit the piñata with your windshield. Your head shot can be your DUI mug shot. You can do drugs at the office – in your office, in a meeting – and still get work, and even win awards! And be on magazine covers (newsstand, not grocery checkout racks)!

If you tried any of this while working at a school, dentist's office or library, you'd never work there again. But in the film business, it's par for the course. It's tolerated – almost expected.

I had a meeting last week in which I pitched a film. It went great!

I had a great time. The executive had a great time. I told my manager that everything was great!

My manager corrected me. "It was not great."

I felt gobsmacked. "What?"

"They didn't like you," he said.

"But they seemed to. They even said so," I protested.

"They lied. I spoke to them. Didn't like you."

Wow.

Welcome To Hollywood, Part 2: when they say to your face, "We don't like you, and we don't like your ideas," you know for sure they don't like you. But when they say, "We 100 per cent do like you," they 100 per cent still may not like you.

To save your self-esteem, logically it would seem safest to work on the principle "words are empty," and only if they buy your work does romance then bloom.

I instantly recalled the awful feeling from moments in my youth of not being liked. But it's one thing to wonder if I'll be alone at the prom. Now I was concerned that I wouldn't have a career.

I asked, "If they don't like me, who will read my scripts?"

My manager replied, "They will read your scripts. They will buy them and make them."

"Even if they don't like me?"

"Even if they hate you," he said. "They will work with you intimately for years, developing your ideas creatively, then shoot, edit and market the juggernaut. And you will all be rich, or you'll bond in failure. If the script is good, if a star circles, you will work, even if they hate you."

Welcome to the film industry. They will celebrate you even if they hate you. They will build an empire around your disagreeable behaviour. And they will graciously ignore your conflicted ethics and theological beliefs.

Hollywood isn't fake or phony. It's genius. Genius. Hollywood is a very successful, productive and creative industry with a glamorous brand that's revered worldwide.

The Hollywood studio system could serve as an actual working model to solve the Middle East crisis.

I've said it, and I mean it. Pitch that at Camp David.

By the rivers of Babylon, build a movie studio.

Film in Israel, edit in Egypt. Sound mix in Syria, use Gazan key grips (lighting), and handle marketing in Lebanon (consider that the Lebanese have already a tremendous marketing/distribution network via courteous corner stores across the globe).

People who hate each other would work side by side – does the dream sound familiar? Batman could save Gotham City, and in doing so, the Middle East.

Turtles grew shells. Fish grew gills. And the studio organism evolved to integrate peoples of contrasting ethics and practices to build crystal castles and not towers of Babel.

So there's your road map to peace.

Just don't mention that the architects (Samuel Goldwyn or Louis B. Mayer, etc.,) were Jews, otherwise the plan will end up on the cutting room floor.

TROPICAL CHAROSET

1 pear, peeled, cored, and chopped
3 apples, peeled, cored, and chopped
3 bananas, peeled and mashed
2 c pitted dates (about 1 lb)
2 c sliced or slivered almonds (8 oz)
2 tblsp ground cinammon
1 c sweet red wine
Matzoh

Combine all ingredients in food processor and purée. Transfer mixture to large saucepan and simmer over low heat, stirring frequently, until thickened, about 15 to 20 min. Cool completely, then chill, covered, until cold. Serve with matzoh.

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Since we all need a little inspiration these days, I thought I would share a story that inspired me.

About 10 months ago, I met two women whom I'll call Jodi and Sarah. Jodi was a thin woman who wanted to firm up and lose a couple of inches. Sarah was overweight and very inflexible, despite having taken yoga for five years.

Sarah was very distrusting and nervous about weight training, but she was also very tired of not fitting into her clothes and feeling fat. Sarah and I had a very rocky start, she admits now. She was terrified of me and didn't believe I could help her.

After eight weeks working together twice a week, Sarah and Jodi told me they had to buy new jeans, since their old ones didn't fit anymore, but nobody noticed their weight loss. We decided to measure their body fat and were shocked to find that even though they both lost weight, their body fat hadn't changed much, which was very discouraging. Both women started to miss sessions, so I decided to talk to them and convinced them to let me take their body measurements again. We did.

I also decided to change things and concentrate on fun and fast-moving workouts to get them back in the game. The next thing we knew, six months had gone by and we needed to take measurements again. To our collective surprise, both women had lost two inches throughout their bodies, but their waists were the most impressive of all. Jodi's had shrunk from 27 to 25 inches, and Sarah's from 33.5 to a mere 29 inches.

I know that it's my job to produce these kinds of results for my clients, but only through hard work and consistency did they achieve their goals. Today, both women's lives have changed – they're both active and two dress sizes smaller.

What are you waiting for? Get out there, be consistent, work hard and don't give up. You, too, can do it.

Anti-Semitism.

I'd definitely rather not write about it again. We are weary of living it, and non-Jews seem tired of hearing about it.

But like a bad cousin who won't leave your house, anti-Semitism is our load to carry. It is real. It is fierce.

That being said, I have been calling for a community-wide mobilization strategy. The response, however, has been overwhelming silence. This disturbs me, because our annoying and dangerous cousin is still in the house. She isn't leaving. She has no plans to pack up and leave, nor recognize that her behaviour is damaging, hurtful and destructive.

The silence also disturbs me because the hush means we're missing out on an opportunity to change history. Rarely in the history of our people have we really been prepared to fight anti-Semitism and to befriend those who sincerely respect us, and we them.

But today, with our available resources, strong communal structures, committed volunteers and the easiness and efficiency of e-mail, the Internet and a plethora of other electronic options, our community could take the lead in the Jewish world by creating a plan that could minimize, and perhaps one day eradicate, anti-Semitism and change the complexion of Jewish-non-Jewish relations.

I'm convinced that we need such a plan, and I know we can create one.

I, therefore, shout out once again to our community leaders and members – be they shul-based, institutional or grassroots – to organize a community-wide series of meetings to deal with the planning and implementation of one agenda item: a long-term inclusive strategy for the Jewish people that will strengthen our position and enhance interfaith relations.

The meeting agenda might look like this:

- A dvar Torah (words of Torah and strength). From which denomination? I have no idea.
- A review of why we are here "today" and our short-term and long-term goals.
- Opening statements by a Jewish scholar, Jewish university students, Holocaust survivors, Jewish community professionals involved in fighting anti-Semitism, and parents on what anti-Semitism looks like today. Let's minimize the squeaky-clean and safe sociological lectures that we hear regularly and know well.
- Statements from non-Jews who want to express their brotherhood/sisterhood with us and their desire to work together to break down differences and create sound partnerships.
- A call to the floor for ideas on what a plan to fight anti-Semitism might look like. Microphones can be set up throughout the hall.
- Break-out sessions to deal with a) What does Torah and Judaism say about this issue; b) Structure – what would a plan look like?; c) How do we best include all parts of the Jewish community; d) Tasks; e) How can we use our available resources, such as traditional media and the Internet; f) How do we best reach out to our friends in the non-Jewish world, and g) Followup – the next step. (How about an international conference here in Toronto that would present our plan to others?)

There it is – the agenda. The only organization that can handle the magnitude of such a meeting is UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. They know how to kickstart such a process. There's no time for infighting, so other organizations would have to humbly find their place. Ultimately, the plan should be decentralized, so everyone will be in charge in their own way.

We are no longer in the shtetl bracing for the dreadful anti-Semitic rider to come in and pillage our homes. We are free, and we are rich. Please call the meeting, so I can stop writing about anti-Semitism.

Netanyahu achieves coalition

By SHAHAR ILAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime minister-designate Benjamin Netanyahu says his government will make every effort to reach "a durable peace with all of Israel's Arab neighbours."

He made the statement in an address to the Knesset in Jerusalem during a special session marking 30 years since the signing of the Israel-Egypt peace treaty on March 26, 1979.

"Whenever Israel stands before a peace-seeking Arab leader, it follows and answers the call," Netanyahu said.

The Likud leader praised late prime minister Menachem Begin and the late Egyptian president Anwar Sadat for "their wisdom in making the impossible possible."

"A bereaved people understands the importance of peace," Netanyahu said, adding that all Israeli governments, no matter what their political orientation, "reach out [a] hand in peace.

"Israelis know how to spot genuine peace whenever it is offered," he said, though he warned that "the real test of peace is in its stability and its durability."

Israel said to have attacked convoy in Sudan

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Air Force used unmanned drones to attack secret Iranian convoys in Sudan that were trying to smuggle weapons to Palestinian militant organizations in the Gaza Strip, the London-based Sunday Times reported Sunday.

Defence officials were quoted as saying that the trucks were carrying missiles capable of striking as far as Tel Aviv and the nuclear reactor in Dimona.

The unmanned aerial vehicles attacked two convoys, killing at least 50 smugglers and their Iranian escorts, the newspaper reported. All the trucks in the convoys were destroyed.

Israel has carried out three air strikes since January against what were believed to be Iranian arms shipments passing through Sudan on their way to Gaza, the American news network ABC reported on Friday.

Earlier last week, Sudanese officials confirmed that in January, in the wake of Israel's assault on Hamas-ruled Gaza, unidentified aircraft attacked a convoy of 17 trucks heading north through eastern Sudan. CBS News reported last Thursday that the IAF was apparently behind the attack.

A U.S. official confirmed to ABC that there were actually three attacks in total. This information matches reports from Sudanese officials of two strikes on truck convoys on Jan. 27 and Feb. 11, and the sinking of a suspected arms ship in the Red Sea.

Israeli officials declined to confirm or deny whether Israel had been involved in an air strike in Sudan.

However, outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert hinted at Israel's suspected role in the reported airstrike.

"We operate everywhere where we can hit terror infrastructure – in close places, in places further away, everywhere where we can hit terror infrastructure, we hit them and we hit them in a way that increases deterrence," said Olmert, speaking at a conference in Herzliya.

Report suggests unmanned drones used in raid.

Museum To Get Cash

TORONTO — The Ontario government will give $5 million to the Canadian Human Rights Museum in Winnipeg, the Toronto Star reported. Premier Dalton McGuinty made the promise months ago to Gail Asper, chief fundraiser for the museum, the Star said. Due to the recession, the gift will be paid over 10 years. It will be used to tell visitors about the struggle for human rights in Ontario, and to bring Ontario students to visit. The $265-million museum, slated to open in 2012, was the dream of Izzy Asper, the late founder of Canwest Global Communications. Funding for it is coming from government and private donations.

Officers Charged

CARACAS — Eight police officers were among those charged in connection with an attack at Caracas' largest synagogue. Venezuelan prosecutors said March 26 that eight officers and three others were charged in the case. Among those accused is the shul rabbi's former bodyguard and one of two security guards on duty during the attack. Assailants broke into the shul, Tiferet Israel, in January, desecrating religious objects, painting anti-Semitic messages on walls and, in a move that particularly worried Jewish leaders, stole records with names and addresses of local Jews. President Hugo Chavez condemned the attack. But Jewish leaders say he's fostering an anti-Semitic climate, particularly with his harsh criticism of Israel, which they said prompted the attack.

Rabbi Slams Remarks

NEW YORK — A Manhattan rabbi condemned a call issued at his synagogue to assassinate Palestinian leaders. Rabbi Elie Abadie of Congregation Edmond J. Safra said the call last month by the leader of an Israeli pro-settler group to kill Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and other "terrorist leaders" is "odious and repugnant." He said the sponsoring group, Americans for a Safe Israel, is no longer welcome to host events at his shul.

School Threatened

CHICAGO — Police in Chicago arrested a man accused of mailing a bomb threat to a Jewish school. Mohammed Alkaramla, 24, a Jordanian national, was arrested March 20. His fingerprints were found on the envelope of the threat and the text of the letter was found on his computer hard drive, the Chicago Tribune reported. The school received the letter in late January. It threatened to detonate bombs at 22 educational centres in Chicago, although none were found. Alkaramla is also under investigation for vandalizing several Chicago-area shuls in early January, allegedly in response to Israel's Gaza operation. He wasn't charged for those crimes when he was arrested March 20. He was released last week on $50,000 bail.

Ahenakew Acquittal Won't Be Appealed

SASKATOON — Justice officials in Saskatchewan say they won't appeal the acquittal of former aboriginal leader David Ahenakew on charges of wilfully promoting hatred against Jews.

"After looking at the judgment, we can't say whether the trial judge committed an error of law or made an unreasonable finding of fact," director of appeals Dean Sinclair told Canadian Press last week.

Ahenakew, the former head of the Assembly of First Nations, was charged after a controversial speech and subsequent interview with a reporter in 2002 in which he called Jews a "disease.... that's going to take over."

He went on to say: "The Jews damn near owned all of Germany prior to the war. That's how Hitler came in. He was going to make damn sure that the Jews didn't take over Germany or Europe."

On Feb. 23, Judge Wilfred Tucker called the comments "disgusting," but said he didn't believe the accused intended to promote hatred.

It was the second trial for Ahenakew, 75, who was found guilty in 2005 of promoting hatred and fined $1,000. The conviction was overturned on appeal.

B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, Frank Dimant, said that this "was a clear case of spewing anti-Jewish hatred, even though the court found that it did not meet the legal standard for a conviction." The group urged Ottawa to review hate crimes legislation, saying the Ahenakew affair has created "uncertainty and doubt."

Canadian Jewish Congress said it accepted the decision, adding that, ironically, the case actually brought the Jews and First Nations "closer than we have ever been."

Jews' Plight Raised

NEW YORK—Former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev said former U.S. president Ronald Reagan raised the plight of Soviet Jewry every time the two met. The disclosure came March 26 at an American Jewish Historical Society event in New York City, organizers said.

Ignatieff calls for increased sanctions on Iran

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Iranian government must understand that the international community's support for Israel's existence is "backed up by credible deterrents," Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff says.

In a March 20 interview, The CJN referred Ignatieff to a statement by Israel's incoming prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu in the March 9 edition of Newsweek. Asked whether, short of military action, he thinks it's possible to halt Iran's nuclear program, Netanyahu answered, "I think this regime is vulnerable to pressure that ought to be intensified. But none of these sanctions and other measures that are contemplated would have much of an effect if the Iranians believe that a military option is off the table."

In response, Ignatieff said, "Iran has to understand that the international community is united on the proposition that you can't deny the Holocaust, and you can't threaten any of your neighbours, and certainly not the Jewish state. And that means the Iranian government has to be aware that those feelings, those views, are backed up with appropriate military force… so they are backed up by credible deterrents.

'Iran has to understand that the international community is united on the proposition that you can't deny the Holocaust, and you can't threaten any of your neighbours, and certainly not the Jewish state'

"But I think it's legitimate… to say no thoughtful Israeli and no thoughtful Iranian, in my view, wants this to come to conflict, and it would be a catastrophe for both sides.

"Canada has always stood for peace. So … Canada has to stand essentially for three things: unequivocal condemnation of Holocaust-denying rhetoric [and] anti-Israeli rhetoric by the Iranian regime; commitment to credible military deterrence; commitment to demanding that Iran comply with the International Atomic Energy Association in respect of its domestic nuclear program. And as Canada has always said, there are no military solutions in this region.

"'At the end of the day, Iran is a great power. Israel is a legitimate democratic state. There are no ultimate military solutions to these problems. There has to be some kind of opening of the doors, in which Israel and Iran eventually sit down and live in peace with each other.

"The alternatives are generally too horrible to contemplate. That doesn't mean backing down from being totally clear to the Iranians, but I don't want to encourage any sabre-rattling rhetoric, especially not at a moment when the president of the United States is beginning to open the door to discussion.

South Africa's lost moral centre

From the editor's desk...

Among Israel's accusers, the most absurd, and in a sense, perhaps the most cutting, is the government of South Africa and its allied organizations.

Staunchly aligned with the Third (or developing) World, South Africa sides reflexively and unquestioningly with Israel's enemies in the Jewish state's struggle to live its own free and secure existence within the family of nations. The fact that Pretoria so enthusiastically endorses the Israel-apartheid calumny is utterly absurd given the facts of the Israeli-Palestinian (Arab) conflict, the truth of the conflict's history and the nature of Israeli society, especially in comparison to the societies of the surrounding Arab world.

But there is no denying either that South Africa's enveloping disdain of Israel is painful to the Jewish state.

In some international circles and multilateral arenas, South Africa still refracts a shining of moral light as a result of its victory over apartheid. Thus, because of this horrible crucible of its past, it enjoys a kind of venerated status in the Third World.

Unfortunately, very little light now is refracted by or bends toward a moral centre in South Africa.

Government officials are not reluctant to utter anti-Jewish rubbish.

As reported by JTA, South Africa's deputy foreign minister, Fatima Hajaig, told a pro-Palestinian rally in January that Jews controlled America, "no matter which government comes into power, whether Republican or Democratic, whether Barack Obama or George Bush.

"The control of America, just like the control of most western countries, is in the hands of Jewish money," she said.

President Kgalema Motlanthe subsequently met with Jewish community leaders but did not disavow his colleague's remarks. He did, however, try to assure community leaders that "everything would be done to ensure the community's safety."

South African government spokespeople, it seems, are in lock step with the labour leaders of the country.

In February, the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) announced its "determination to refuse to offload ships from Israel" and "to strengthen the campaign in boycotts, divestment and sanctions against apartheid Israel." They chose as their test case an Israeli cargo ship docked in Durban.

In its press release, the union called on the South African government "to sever diplomatic and trade relations with Israel."

"COSATU, the Palestine Solidarity Committee, the Young Communist League and a range of other organizations... also take this opportunity to salute the millions of workers all over the world who have openly condemned and taken decisive steps to isolate apartheid Israel... We call on other workers and unions to follow suit and to do all that is necessary to ensure that they boycott all goods to and from Israel until Palestine is free."

"FREE PALESTINE! ISOLATE APARTHEID ISRAEL!," the press release shrieked in an all-caps headline.

In a further twist of the absurdity and moral inversion, COSATU, the self-appointed champion for all of the unfree of the world seems quite indifferent, if not downright hostile, to the idea that the people of Tibet deserve freedom as well.

Last week, the government of South Africa banned the Dalai Lama from travelling to South Africa.

Is there a more universally recognized symbol of peace and tolerance than the Dalai Lama? Is Tibetan independence less worthy a cause than, say, Palestinian independence?

It must be. For the trade unions of South Africa say it is Otherwise, how can we explain the following statement carried by the COSATU Daily News and endorsed by the congress on the day following Pretoria's decision to ban the Dalai Lama from attending a peace conference in Johannesburg?

"The SACP [South African Communist Party] fully appreciates and accepts the decision by the South African government not to grant a visa for the Dali Lama visit at this time. We stand by our government on this matter.

"It is a well known fact that the month of March is a particularly sensitive period as it is associated with the Dalai Lama's putsch for cession of Tibet from China.

"We congratulate our government's vigilance and asserting the full responsibility to articulate an independent and sovereign position on foreign policy matters..."

Dalai Lama at the Kotel in 1999 [Israel photo]

Not all South Africans were pleased with their government's decision to ban the Dalai Lama. Bishop Desmond Tutu, for example, said he was "distressed and ashamed."

But whom Pretoria would ban, Jerusalem receives openly and with great humility. Twice in the last decade, the Dalai Lama has visited Israel. The photo inset shows him at the Western Wall in 1999.

The hypocrisy of Israel's South African accusers is comedic. But the silence of Israel's accusers on the left is unconscionable. They wax indignant over Israel's alleged sins, but lose their voice entirely over the transgressions of political and ideological comrades such as the government in Pretoria.

CANADIANS HELP REPAIR ANCIENT SYNAGOGUE

Emma Galet, a young Canadian, celebrated her bat mitzvah recently at the newly renovated ancient synagogue at Maon, 20 kilometres southwest of Gaza. Emma attended the renovation ceremony with children from the kibbutzim and moshavim bordering the Gaza Strip, who were also celebrating their bar and bat mitzvahs. The Galet family helped make the renovations and repairs possible. The area has been badly damaged by the constant barrage of rockets from Gaza. Pictured are Efi Stenzler, left, world chairman of the Jewish National Fund, Sandy Galet and Emma sharing the happy moment. [Israel photo]

Medical journal takes flak over Gaza articles

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The editor of the Canadian Medical Association Journal is denying an accusation that he permitted "crude anti-Israel propaganda" to seep into two articles on the state of health care in the Gaza Strip before and after Israel's recent invasion.

The claim was levelled by Honest Reporting Canada after the CMAJ, with a circulation of 70,000, carried two pieces in its March 17 edition on Gaza's health care system.

According to the Israel advocacy organization, the articles were "over-simplified, misleading [and] incomplete," and solely blamed Israel for the abysmal medical situation in Gaza.

Rebutting the accusations in an interview, Dr. Paul Hebert, the journal's editor for the past two years, denied that the articles were anti-Israel and described them as "simple descriptions of events."

He added, "We stay away from the root causes of conflicts."

In a subsequent exchange with Honest Reporting Canada, Hebert said: "We published the articles to provide a perspective on the health-related and health infrastructure consequences of war, which is within our purview as a medical journal."

Hebert, a critical care physician at the Ottawa Hospital, said the CMAJ wasn't taking sides when it published the articles by Christopher Mason and Francois Dumont.

Mason's piece, headlined "Gaza's health care system crippled before – and after," said it was already in poor condition due to underfunding and Israel's blockade.

Dumont's article, "On the ground in the Gaza Strip," profiled two Palestinian doctors working for Doctors without Borders in Gaza.

In response, the CMAJ received more than 200 letters of complaint from irate readers, but only several letters of support, Hebert reported.

The articles were carefully edited and meant to be fair and balanced, he said. "We didn't take sides. We don't assign blame. I'm sorry if they were misinterpreted. It's unfortunate."

Due to the controversy, Hebert has invited readers to send submissions and letters.

Letters will be posted on the CMAJ's website and submissions will be carefully considered. "I will publish them if they meet our editorial standards."

Hebert said his journal wants to remain "objective, open and accessible."

Dr. Paul Hebert

In a scathing critique of the articles, Honest Reporting Canada listed a succession of "deficiencies":

• The reports failed to mention Israel's adversary, Hamas, which refuses to recognize its existence.

• The reports did not mention the reason for Israel's invasion: to thwart Hamas rocket attacks on Israeli communities near the border.

• The reports did not mention Hamas' and the Palestinian Authority's responsibility for ensuring the health and welfare of its citizens.

Honest Reporting Canada goes on to say that Hamas stole humanitarian aid destined for ordinary Palestinians, prevented wounded Palestinian civilians from seeking medical treatment and used ambulances for transportation and hospitals as jails.

Honest Reporting Canada also pointed out that the articles omitted such information as Israel's efforts to treat wounded Palestinians and facilitate aid to Gaza.

Hebert said the CMAJ has published articles on areas of conflict – such as Darfur and Afghanistan – in the past, but had never received so vociferous a reaction.

Obscene

On its website, Universal Press Syndicate, the distributor of the award-winning work of political cartoonist Pat Oliphant, says "no one is safe from the acid brush of Pat Oliphant." But the brush with which Oliphant painted the cartoon about Israel that appeared last Wednesday was dipped not in acid but rather in vile toxic poison.

We struggled with the question of whether or not to make the Oliphant cartoon the subject of this editorial. For to write about it necessarily requires republishing it. And republishing it necessarily entails repeating the offence. But in our view, the underlying issue in the cartoon's publication is sufficiently important to warrant reprinting it and risking causing offence to the sensibilities of our readers.

The cartoon is ghoulish and grisly. It features a spectral, headless figure, a sword outstretched in its right hand, goose-stepping toward a trembling, miniature woman called Gaza, who is carrying an infant. In the ghoul's other hand is a large, fanged, menacing Star of David about to devour helpless Gaza.

The syndicated cartoon has doubtlessly reached millions of readers in newspapers and on websites around the world.

Jewish leaders and groups have denounced the cartoon. Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, described it as "hideously anti-Semitic."

The Simon Wiesenthal Center correctly noted that "the imagery in this cartoon mimics the venomous anti-Semitic propaganda of the Nazi and Soviet eras. It is cartoons like this that inspired millions of people to hate in the 1930s and help set the stage for the Nazi genocide."

In Jerusalem, Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Center's Israel office protested that "this is absolutely disgusting. God Almighty! This is a classic example of criticism of Israel carried out in a pernicious, anti-Semitic fashion."

The Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism suggested that "Oliphant has the right to his views, however noxious," but urged media outlets not "to become publishers of such trash."

Oliphant is one of the most widely syndicated political cartoonists in the world. He has won a Pulitzer Prize for his work. But this cartoon is loathsome.

It is odious in its own right as so many have pointed out. But it is as worrisome as it is odious. For it suggests that even celebrated, mainstream commentators have been persuaded by the extreme, mendacious, anti-Israel rhetoric, and that no commentary is too vile to be uttered, and no image is too obscene to be distributed. When the line of fair political comment shifts to one of acid brush strokes monstrously demonizing the Jewish state and distorting its efforts to live free from terror, we must protest. We must register our disgust. To borrow from the poet Dylan Thomas, we must rage, rage against denying what is right.

Free speech is a precious commodity

British Member of Parliament George Galloway was recently barred from entering Canada, ostensibly because he is a supporter of terrorists. It is more likely that his tirades against Israel, opposition to NATO in Afghanistan and even words of support for Saddam Hussein have cultivated strong enemies. In other words, his speech has been offensive. The immediate decision was supposedly taken by border officials but their superior, Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney declined to reverse the ruling.

I cannot say whether Kenney initiated the decision or whether, more likely, he was urged to take such action by Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith. We do know that both groups were, unfortunately, in that minority which applauded the government's position.

Meanwhile, Galloway and his supporters have gained immensely more from his banning than they would have if he had quietly been allowed to speak. Their meetings will now be jammed full with those who will see the British MP on closed circuit television, and the newspapers will also pay closer attention. Our Jewish organizations mistakenly supported a Conservative government that is all too ready to suppress free speech in the name of fighting terrorism.

Free speech is too precious a commodity to be squandered on counterproductive attempts to stifle the likes of George Galloway. The Jewish community of Canada must be counted among the defenders of free speech, not its enemies. We will alienate many of our fellow Canadians if we are perceived as opposed to such an important value. Our own history shows us that we have too much to lose when fundamental liberties are sacrificed in the name of expediency.

Stephen Scheinberg
Montreal

Editor's note: A judge was to decide on Monday afternoon, after The CJN's deadline, whether to overturn the decision that bars George Galloway from entering Canada.

Jewish critics of Israel

I must take issue with columnist Gerald Steinberg's claim that the "independent Jewish voices" who choose to criticize Israel's policies are "not active in synagogues, play no role in other Jewish institutions and do not contribute to Jewish life" ("Israel-bashing Jews: not in my name," CJN, March 5). In 2004, my colleague Emma Jo Aiken and myself conducted a research project with members of Toronto Jewish groups opposed to Israel's continued occupation of Palestinian lands. The results were presented that year at the annual meeting of the Association of Canadian Jewish Studies. Contrary to Steinberg's claim, the 15 interviewees, representing five different groups, displayed a strong commitment to Jewish life. In fact, more than half of those interviewed belonged to synagogues and had a self-described "strong Jewish background," including attendance at Jewish day schools and membership in Zionist youth movements. Indeed, half of those interviewed described themselves as Zionists with strong connections to the traditions of socialist thought and dissent that are part of the history of Zionism. While it may be comfortable to believe that Jews who criticize Israel are beyond the pale, there is evidence that their connection to Judaism and Jewish life is not only quite real, but for many is the basis for their political stance.

The Latimer case

In the article "Emil Sher's play raises ethical issues," it states that "[Robert] Latimer was convinced he did the right thing, since 12-year-old Tracy was suffering from cerebral palsy, weighed 38 pounds and was about to undergo another surgery to relieve pain" (CJN, March 26).

It should be noted that, in his written decision, the trial judge wrote that "on the basis of the evidence presented at this trial, there is no suggestion, by any witness who testified or for that matter by Crown counsel, that he was in any way motivated by her disability. All the evidence points to his concern for the pain which he saw flowing from her illness. So on the evidence I heard, I could not conclude Mr. Latimer ever considered killing his daughter because she was disabled." The Supreme Court of Canada concurred with this finding.

Also, the proposed surgery, with which it was hoped that some of Tracy's pain might be relieved, would have involved the removal of her upper thigh bone, leaving her lower leg hanging loose without any connecting bone. The orthopedic surgeon described the post-operative pain from this type of surgery as "incredible."

A call to the community and York U's administration

As York University faculty members, some of whom have spent most of their careers building one of Canada's largest and best programs in Jewish studies, others of whom have been attracted to York because of that program, the events of recent weeks have been very painful. York has become the symbol of the escalating anti-Israel activity that's rife on campuses across North America and elsewhere.

This is especially dismaying, because, like others at York, we believed we were engaged in building a university that would welcome students and faculty of diverse views and backgrounds, people who had traditionally been made to feel less than comfortable in more established Canadian universities. And, indeed, a very large number of our students over the years have been the first in their families to attend university.

Michael Brown

The early emergence of Jewish studies as an integral and legitimate part of the curriculum was itself a sign of York's difference. Traditionally in Canada and elsewhere, Jewish civilization was not considered worthy of academic interest, except insofar as it served as a precursor to Christianity. That York was in the forefront in Canada of openness to studying cultures other than that of Christian Europe on their own terms and not only in relation to the dominant culture said a lot about the university. When a Jewish history course was first proposed, one member of the history department opposed it on the grounds that there was no such thing as Jewish history. He was outvoted, however, and today hundreds of York students, some of them Jewish, many of them not, regularly enrol in Jewish studies courses.

Carl S. Ehrlich

In recent weeks, however, openness and civility seem to have collapsed. For some students and faculty, the collaborative search for knowledge has been replaced by attempts to shut out or shout down anyone who supports Israel. Outsiders, most of whom have not bothered to consult with faculty, have endeavoured to inflate the unpleasantness at the university. But there is no gainsaying the deteriorating atmosphere.

Sara Horowitz

Because of the publicity given to the disturbances, those who don't visit the campus regularly may be surprised to learn that it's still possible to walk the halls wearing a kippah (or a hijab) without raising an eyebrow, to have lunch peacefully in the kosher restaurant (one of only a very few on North-American campuses) and to attend Jewish studies classes in which Jewish and non-Jewish students are respectful to each other and to the material.

But there is certainly now another face to York, as there is to many – and perhaps even most – campuses in Canada, the United States and Europe. Students – and occasionally faculty – clash stridently over Israel and Jewish issues. Israel is vilified and singled out for actions that go unremarked when taken by other countries. Jewish students – some "Zionists," some not – are subjected to verbal abuse from other students and occasionally from members of the teaching staff. Students and faculty members may feel intimidated about voicing their Jewish commitments, especially support for Israel. Those who have a stake in seeing the pot boil over stoke the fires to the applause of extreme partisans on both sides.

Universities are and should be safe havens for a very wide diversity of ideas and commitments, within the parameters of the law and within the parameters of civilized discourse. Freedom to think and speak your mind is fundamental to our society, and certainly to universities. But that freedom must involve a willingness to hear the "other side." Many on our campus today, however, and on other campuses, and in the community subscribe to that notion only for themselves and those who agree with them.

Eric Lawee

What is most disappointing about the decay of civility and tolerance at York is the response to behaviour that should be out of bounds. On March 20, President Mamdouh Shoukri issued a statement, which we endorse enthusiastically, that condemned the disturbances, and the university has issued other statements during the past weeks. Fines and suspensions have been levied for minor infractions of rules, as they should be. No university can allow classes to be disrupted by demonstrations that use sound-amplifying equipment.

Martin Lockshin

Significantly, however, little or nothing has come of investigations into serious complaints of harassment, intimidation and rowdyism. The fines and suspensions are levied in an "even-handed" manner on the rowdies and their targets alike (should the latter speak out in their own defence), and official statements go out of their way to be "even-handed" rather than pinpoint the offences and the offending groups. Nor do the sanctions that are levied appear to be enforced consistently.

The net effect is the encouragement of thuggery and the increasing impression at York and among the larger public that our university is a battleground that's hostile to Jews.

Overshadowed and forgotten are the many ways in which York continues to be especially hospitable to students of all backgrounds, including Jews. York has the largest Jewish student contingent of any Canadian university and a vibrant Hillel chapter. There is a kosher restaurant on campus that's patronized by Jewish and Muslim students concerned about dietary restrictions, as well as others. Shalom/Salam, an organization promoting peace and dialogue among pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students, was founded by Jewish and Muslim York students.

A key to combating anti-Semitism in all of its guises is teaching and learning about all aspects of Judaism, something that takes place as a matter of course, without special pleading, in our comprehensive Jewish studies classes. And Jewish studies is flourishing at York with students and faculty from many backgrounds.

Our Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies includes more than 40 faculty members with a variety of research interests. We offer several courses in which the language of instruction is Hebrew, a rarity in North American universities. Faculty publish in Hebrew and participate in conferences in Israel and in exchanges with Israeli universities. York students study in Israel, taking advantage of York scholarship funds. A new visiting position in Israel studies has been inaugurated this year. York has one of the only programs for Jewish teacher education at a North American university. York's Appel Program for Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education for future teachers in Canada, Germany and Poland is unique. York has awarded honorary degrees to former Israeli cabinet minister Natan Sharansky, the late Israeli president Haim Herzog and former Israeli chief justice Aharon Barak.

Ahouva Shulman

Mark Webber

Kalman Weiser

This is an extraordinary record, and these things have come about because faculty and administrators have put them into place with the support of the university at large. We have benefitted enormously over the years from the encouragement and financial support of individuals and the community, but the initiatives for York's remarkable accomplishments in Jewish studies and Jewish life have come from within the university.

None of this should be understood as minimizing the reality of the present unpleasantness or the feeling of being intimidated and menaced that many students and even faculty are expressing. It should not be read as an excuse for the absence of firm and frank support in word and deed on the part of the university for civility and tolerance towards all groups (not excluding Jews), and support for the right to hold and voice diverse commitments (not excluding commitment to the well-being of Israel).

Such support should be explicitly stated and acted upon.

The problem is not confined to York, as we have said. To date, however, statements and actions of academic leaders at other universities around North America have been strong and forthright. And while we have confidence in the goodwill of our administration, we need to hear more at York regarding the specific issues confronting our campus now. We are encouraged by the appointment of a task force to consider ways to make York once again the civilized and tolerant place it has always been. But we cannot wait until August for forthright and resolute words and deeds.

To be sure, even strong pronouncements will not dispel the veiled anti-Semitism, often masquerading as opposition to Israeli policies. This will not quickly disappear from York, from other North American campuses or from other sectors of our society. We don't wish to silence those who disagree with us. But we do insist on maintaining a civil atmosphere at York in which the goal is the pursuit of knowledge, not the silencing of disagreement.

To faculty, students and the larger community, we say, "Despite current events at York, be mindful of the considerable – and to some extent unique – ways in which Jewish life and learning continue to flourish at our university!"

To the community, we say, "Thank you for your concern and interest, but please do not assume that that those outside York understand the situation better than those of us at the university! Before acting, consult with those on campus!"

To the York administration, we say, "Continue to speak loudly and clearly in defence of civility and tolerance, loudly and clearly against all manifestations of prejudice including anti-Semitism! But do not shy away from addressing the specific problems that have arisen at York! And act!"

Opinions

Promoting inclusivity at McMaster

While the odious term "Israeli apartheid" has come to define the weeklong anti-Israel hate-fest at an increasing number of universities, it should not be assumed that campus anti-Semitism goes on hiatus during much of the remainder of the school year. Far from it. And although events at York University stand out as the most obvious and more ominous of recent assaults on our students, there are many more recorded examples of intimidation and harassment of Jewish minorities on campuses across Canada.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

And despite codes of conduct that are supposed to protect students from threatening behaviour and ensure inclusivity for all who attend our institutions of higher learning, there is nonetheless a pervasive reluctance for university administrators to either enforce such codes or come up with other strategies to promote a less-hostile campus environment.

This is why what has become known as the "McMaster Peace Initiative" is that much more remarkable. Under the guidance of the university's director of human rights and equity services, Milé Komlein, and with the full endorsement of the offices of the president and provost, a framework has emerged that is intended to "advance diverse viewpoints in the spirit of inclusiveness and academic integrity." It commits signatories to its guiding principles to "move beyond the language of demonization and delegitimization" and "create an environment for mutual understanding and peaceful coexistence".

Whether such lofty goals will be realized remains to be seen. Much will depend on the administration's ability to deal swiftly and resolutely with violations to the fundamental precepts of the document which, incidentally, have already occurred. Nonetheless, there is an emerging hope among Jewish students and faculty at McMaster that this is at least an important first step toward creating a more harmonious atmosphere on our campus.

It is with some irony that Roy Green references a program of "interfaith dialogue" between Judea Pearl and Akbar Ahmed as one of the supposed successes of the now defunct "Hamilton Jewish Arab Muslim Dialogue" (CJN Letter, March 19). What he omits to mention is that just before that event (in 2006), there had already been several breaches of the guidelines that the dialogue partners had agreed to. But instead of removing themselves from the process right then and there, as they should have done, the Jewish representatives on the dialogue committee chose to recommit to what was essentially an exercise in hypocrisy and appeasement.

Contrary to Green's opinion, the "dialogue" never really had any outreach to "the greater Hamilton community". Rather, it was seen to be no more than a gimmick to advance the self-interest of its principal participants.

Making Israel a sports pariah is out of bounds

Israel is viewed as a military superpower, certainly regionally. That cannot be said for our sports prowess. Israel has won only seven Olympic medals, all since the Barcelona Games in 1992. We're not too bad in several sports, particularly windsurfing and judo. Each have brought Israel three medals, including our only gold, won by windsurfer Gal Fridman in Athens in 2004. We're also developing a world-class rhythmic gymnastics program.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

In team sports, basketball is our regional forte, with Maccabi Tel Aviv reaching the final stages of almost every year's Euroleague Championships, this year being a disappointing exception. Soccer is Israel's most popular sport, and there's an outside chance the national team might actually advance to the 2010 World Cup.

Israel also has a handful of excellent tennis pros. Shachar Pe'er is ranked 46th in the world, down from a career high 15th in 2007. Dudi Sela is slowly ascending the men's rankings, currently sitting 57th, and Andy Ram and Yoni Erlich are among the world's best doubles couplings, having won the Australian Open in 2008.

On March 8, Israel's men's tennis team advanced to the quarter-finals of the 2009 Davis Cup, after beating Sweden, in Malmo, 3-2. It was exhilarating. Going into the last day, we were behind 2-1. Sela won the day's first match in five sets and the decisive fifth match also went to five sets. Harel Levy, ranked 212th in the world, won the last set 8-6. The victory places Israel among the world's eight premier tennis teams. We'll meet Russia in the quarter-finals, in Ramat Hasharon, in July.

The tension in Malmo wasn't limited to the tennis arena. During the tournament, an Arab mob descended on the city, demonstrating violently against Israel and its tennis team's participation in the Davis Cup, in the wake of Israel's Gaza operation. Because of the threat of such protests, and despite their own team's objections, Swedish authorities decided the matches would be played without spectators. On the sporting level, that was probably in Israel's favour, because it deprived the Swedes of home-team advantage, but in a broader sense, it was troubling.

There have been several similar incidents in the last couple of months. In February, Pe'er was denied a visa into the United Arab Emirates and participation in the Dubai Tennis Championships. As a result, one sponsor pulled out of the tournament, and the Tennis Channel decided not to give it any air time, but the competition went on anyway.

Even more disturbing, in January, a Turkish mob in Ankara forced the Bnei Hasharon basketball team to flee to its locker room after coins and bottles, as well as chants of "Allah Akbar" and "Death to the Jews," were hurled at them. All this came before the game against a local team even began. Astoundingly, after two hours, the referee demanded that the Israeli team return to the court to play, asserting that order had been restored. When it refused, the Turkish team was awarded a victory.

Sports stadiums are not the only arenas where Israel and Israelis are being attacked. Academics, trade unions and so-called intellectuals around the western world are seeking to end co-operation with Israel's academic and research institutions, to boycott Israeli companies and goods, and to divest from firms that do business with Israel. CUPE Ontario is an ignoble example.

Criticism of Israel and its policies is legitimate. Branding it an apartheid state and calling for boycotting all things Israeli are not. There's no denying we're the only democracy in a region that would happily be rid of us (as would many "enlightened" westerners). Our elected government is tasked with ensuring that this doesn't happen and that Israelis can live securely. Critics say it carries out that duty too heavy-handedly, and while a vociferous debate within Israel encompasses all aspects of the issue, the government's actions don't justify turning Israel and Israelis into pariahs.

Successful Israelis – whether in academia, commerce, the arts or sports – are mud in the eyes of our enemies and detractors. But that's the beauty of this country. Despite adversity, so many good things have flourished.

Come see our boys take on the Russians in Ramat Hasharon.

Human rights groups should advocate for Schalit

Unless there is a last-minute breakthrough, Israelis will be pouring a fifth cup at the Passover seder for Gilad Schalit, the young soldier kidnapped by Hamas in June 2006. Schalit, like the Soviet Jews who were held in the Gulag before the collapse of the Soviet Union, represents the antithesis of the freedom celebrated at the seder and reminds the rest of us of the obligation to fight for those whose freedom is denied.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

As the outsized calendar next to the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem marking the days of Schalit's captivity reached 1,000, Israelis debated the price of his release. Everyone identified with him and his family, and they agonized over the difficult decisions.

Israelis focusing on the plight of the individual urged the government to accept the demands by Hamas to release hundreds of terrorists. They argued that the country has a moral obligation to bring back the soldiers that were sent to protect the country, regardless of the risk. And by the same token, soldiers and their families needed to know that the country would do what was necessary if they were captured.

But others – including families of terror victims – warned that by releasing Palestinians responsible for the Park Hotel attack on seder night in Netanya in 2002, as well as Sbarro's pizzeria in 2001 in Jerusalem, and numerous bus bombings, Israel would be inviting more terror. The perpetrators of the next wave would know that after they were caught, there would be more kidnappings to free them. Previous experience shows that many of the released terrorists return to commit or prepare more attacks (the same is true for Al Qaeda captives freed from the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba).

Ehud Olmert, who was prime minister at the time of Schalit's capture, was widely expected to accept the costs and agree to the release of the terrorists demanded by Hamas in his last days in office. Negotiators went to Cairo for talks, but – to the surprise of many – Olmert told the nation that the price was too high, and the future dangers too great.

This stance may also have caught Hamas leaders off guard. They apparently counted on a continuing Israeli policy of disproportionate exchanges for prisoners of war, and, most recently, in the case of the bodies of soldiers killed and kidnapped by Hezbollah. As a result, they continue to hold Schalit after more than 1,000 days.

At the same time, and in contrast to the public demonstrations inside Israel, there was a growing recognition of the ringing silence regarding Schalit on the part of the human rights network. In the face of this gross violation of the most basic rights, as well as the Geneva conventions, the organizations that claim to promote international morality, including officials of the United Nations Human Rights Council, have failed to do anything on Schalit's behalf.

Similarly, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch – which have active branches and major donors in Toronto – have remained silent on this central Palestinian violation of international law. This contrasts with the flood of anti-Israel condemnations and campaigns, particularly regarding Gaza. And the same is true for Israeli organizations, such as B'tselem, that claim a human rights mandate, as well as the numerous political groups funded by the New Israel Fund.

It was only after this damning silence became a public issue and source of embarrassment that minimal efforts began to be made. Instead of a long-overdue action alert, Amnesty issued a laconic and immorally "balanced" statement, putting the kidnappers and the victim in the same basket, in a news story headlined: "Detainees used as bargaining chips by both sides in Israel/Gaza conflict." And Human Rights Watch continued to ignore the issue.

To free Schalit and to deter further kidnappings by Hezbollah, Hamas or other terror groups, the international guardians of human rights must re-examine their behaviour and biases. Those who claim to act in the name of morality have the obligation to lead this fight, including for Israelis unable to celebrate freedom again this year.

The Kirshner File

The Nixon-Kissinger partnership

For 5-1/2 years, from 1968 to 1974, Richard Nixon – the president of the United States – and Henry Kissinger – his national security adviser and then secretary of state – were bound together in a partnership that shaped world politics.

They threw themselves into a thicket of pressing problems, from ending the war in Vietnam and opening up a new chapter in Sino-American relations to building detente with the Soviet Union and managing the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Tilting toward Pakistan in its war with India and plotting to overthrow the democratically elected, left-leaning government of Salvadore Allende in Chile, they hurtled from one crisis to the next.

Ultimately, their professional relationship was cut short by the slow-simmering, explosive Watergate scandal, which doomed Nixon's presidency.

All this is the subject of Robert Dallek's magisterial book, Nixon and Kissinger: Partners in Power (HarperCollins), which will likely stand as one of the most important texts on U.S. foreign policy and a nuanced portrait of an American president and his close associate.

Their partnership, Dallek suggests, was an unlikely one. Nixon, a Quaker from a sleepy town north of Los Angeles, was an insular and socially insecure individual who could casually toss off anti-Semitic remarks. Kissinger, a Jewish refugee from Nazi Germany and a Harvard-trained intellectual and academic who modelled himself after the 19th-century Austrian statesman Metternich, was animated by an overarching ambition to be a high government official. Outsiders from radically different backgrounds, they dreamed of recasting international affairs.

Yet, as Dallek notes, they were also combative rivals. Kissinger, who consulted with Nixon more often than anyone in the White House, considered his boss very odd and unpleasant and his aides "a gang of self-seeking bastards" and "heels." In private, he referred to Nixon as "that madman" and "our drunken friend." Nixon, for his part, did not appreciate Kissinger's eagerness for the limelight and his self-serving ambitions. Behind Kissinger's back and occasionally to his face, he snidely called him a "Jew boy" and "Sir Henry." But since foreign policy was Nixon's primary interest, no aide was more important than Kissinger. Consequently, Kissinger had the run of the Oval Office and supplemented his daily visits with frequent telephone calls.

The major challenges the pair faced during Nixon's first term ran the gamut from Vietnam and relations with the Soviet Union to the Middle East and China. They believed that if they were to leave an imprint on history, they would either have to resolve these issues or render them less threatening to U.S. national interests. Vietnam and the Soviet Union were their priorities, but China would be their diplomatic triumph.

As for the Middle East, Kissinger was pessimistic that the United States could significantly alter the course of events there, while Nixon was reluctant to become involved in a conflict that seemed intractable. Nevertheless, the Mideast would figure highly in their calculations.

Nixon began his presidency by making his first secretary of state, William Rogers, responsible for mideastern affairs. Nixon believed that Kissinger, who had lost 13 relatives in the Holocaust, could not be sufficiently objective about Israel. But since the Mideast was in a state of perpetual crisis, Kissinger wielded more influence on developments there than Nixon had intended.

Nixon's approach to the Mideast was clinical and dispassionate. As he told France's president, Charles de Gaulle, he would not be influenced by the Jewish vote and wanted to make decisions based on strict considerations of national security.

Although several of his most important assistants were Jewish, including William Safire and Leonard Garment, Nixon resented American Jews because they tended to be Democrats rather than Republicans and dismissed him as unworthy of high political office.

Claiming that Nixon was "a cultural anti-Semite," Dallek writes that he shared many of the prejudices of lower middle-class Americans. As Kissinger himself observed, "He believed that Jews formed a powerful cohesive group in American society; that they were predominately liberal; that they put the interests of Israel above everything else; that on the whole they were more sympathetic to the Soviet Union than any other ethnic groups; [and] that their control of the media made them dangerous adversaries." According to Dallek, Kissinger basically tolerated his anti-Semitic views and outbursts.

Like Rogers, Nixon held that the Arab-Israeli dispute could be settled only through an imposed settlement. They were concerned that it threatened Jordan and Lebanon, enhanced Soviet influence in the region and increased tensions with Moscow.

Richard Nixon confers with Henry Kissinger in a 1972 White House meeting

But in the end, the Nixon administration did not try to exert pressure on Israel. Nixon's aide, H.R. Haldeman, reminded him that dealings with Israel had domestic implications. As he put it, "We must not let this issue hurt us politically."

Despite Nixon's jaundiced view of American Jews, he never wavered from his belief that supporting Israel was good for America. By helping Israel, he informed Kissinger, "We are doing what is in our interest because it screws the Russians." As well, Nixon hoped that his pro-Israel position would encourage Jews to back his policies in Southeast Asia.

Dallek says that the burgeoning Watergate affair prompted Nixon to appoint Kissinger as secretary of state in 1973. Kissinger had threatened to resign unless he was chosen for that post.

In the main, Nixon selected Kissinger because he had great respect for Kissinger's abilities, yet he feared that if Kissinger was passed over, Watergate would swamp his presidency. As it turned out, not even Kissinger could save Nixon from the ignominity of a forced resignation.

Within weeks of his appointment, Kissinger – the first Jew to hold that job – was caught up in the Yom Kippur War.

He and Nixon formulated a two-pronged policy: the United States and the Soviet Union, in the interests of avoiding a superpower confrontation, would not be drawn into the fighting. The war should produce a military standoff so that talks between Israel and its Arab enemies could be launched. Nixon, as Dallek observes, hoped that his handling of the war would defuse calls for his impeachment. Since Nixon was distracted by Watergate, Kissinger was effectively in charge of Washington's response to the war, though Nixon tried to convey the impression that he was fully in charge of managing the crisis.

During the postwar period, Kissinger engaged in shuttle diplomacy to hammer out a separation of forces agreement on the Egyptian and Syrian fronts. These achievements lifted his standing to new heights, but Nixon was engulfed by Watergate. Kissinger defended Nixon as a statesman of the first rank, but to no avail. Before stepping down, Nixon convinced his successor, Gerald Ford, to retain Kissinger, describing him as "absolutely indespensable." Ford heeded his advice, and during the Ford presidency, Kissinger was even more in control of foreign policy.

In assessing the Nixon-Kissinger partnership, Dallek praises it as "one of or possibly the most significant White House collaboration in U.S. history."

But he adds that their "misjudgments" on such files as Vietnam, Chile and Pakistan yielded "notable failures." Nixon and Kissinger were clearly talented and experienced, but even they could not always guarantee successful outcomes in foreign policy.

Correction: Egypt's current ambassador to Israel is Yasser Reda, not Assem Ibrahim, as I reported in last week's column.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

The holy garments of our time

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

Our Torah portion, Tzav, begins with a description of the clothing that Aaron and his sons should wear as they do the work of the high priest. "The priest shall put on his linen garment and his linen breeches." We read this line without considering what was so special about linen. Many aspects of this cloth and its source, the flax plant, merit consideration.

As we approach the holiday of Pesach, we should stop to consider that, believe it or not, these linen garments of Aaron may be a confirmation of our Egyptian experience. We believe that the Israelites left Egypt some 3,300 years ago, in 1,300 BCE. By that time, records indicate, the Egyptians had been manufacturing linen for at least 700 years.

Mummies are wrapped in linen, and another hint that the Israelites were actually in Egypt comes from a biblical description of the 10 plagues. We read in Exodus that the flax and barley were destroyed, since the barley had headed and the flax was in bloom. There is a keen awareness in the Bible of the importance of flax as a plant-source of fibre.

But why do we call it linen, since Hebrew terms exist – bad, shesh, butz, and one other with echoes of Pesach, karpas? None of these sound at all like linen. The word is derived from the Latin word for the flax plant, which is linum. (By the way, this word gave rise to a number of other terms: line, derived from the use of a linen thread to determine a straight line; lining, due to the fact that linen was often used to create a lining for wool and leather clothing; lingerie, which comes from the French and originally denoted underwear made of linen; linseed oil, an oil derived from flax seed, and linoleum, a floor covering made from linseed oil and other materials.)

Flax and linen were dear to our ancestors, who used it in ritual and traditional storytelling symbols that evoked strong feelings and meanings for ancient Israel. When the Book of Proverbs describes the woman of valour, it says, "She selects wool and flax and works with eager hands."

Have you ever seen what a person's hands must endure when working with flax? After harvesting comes retting, which is today done with chemicals, but until the advent of the industrial age, the woody bark surrounding the flax fibre was decomposed using water. Retting must be done carefully – too little leaves fibres attached to the stalk, while too much rots and weakens the fibre. The stalks are spread on dewy slopes, submerged in stagnant pools of water, or placed in running streams, sometimes for more than a week or two.

After retting, flax plants are squeezed and allowed to dry. Then, they must be broken and the fibres separated from the stalks. This was done by hand with sharp metal combs. It required long, tedious effort with some danger to the worker's hands. My hands would never be eager to undertake this process, which you can see for yourself in the summer at the Ethan Allan Homestead in Burlington, Vt.

Fine linen fibres could be up to half a metre long. But our woman of valour is not done, because she then combs and straightens the fibres and spins them into thread. Making linen takes more effort and greater risk than making cotton thread, and far more effort and risk than making wool. Now we can understand why a fine linen garment would, in its time, be prized as worthy to be the garment of the high priest, and worthy to cover the Holy of Holies. In our industrialized society, we have no equivalent to ancient linen, because we no longer put in the same effort to create fine cloths such as silk or angora.

If we were to clothe the high priest today in fabric that represents our greatest efforts, we would clothe the high priest in the education of our young, in the care of our elderly, in sustaining the disabled, in healing the sick, in fulfilling commandments that bring peace between people, because these are the areas where we need to put in maximum effort with eager hands.

With these efforts, we weave the finest fabric of our society, and they are the holy garments of our time. Only when people clothe society in this kind of fine raiment can we say that we are women and men of valour, creating a mamlechet kehuna, a realm of priests and a holy people.

Passover reminds us that as free people, we must choose to do so.

The Exodus gave us access to transcendence

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

At least once in the national memory of a people, there has to be imprinted not just the historical reality of being liberated, but the constant idea that we are free. What God gave us at the Exodus was the possibility of ever-renewable freedom. Put in the simplest possible terms, in whatever situation one finds oneself in life—financial, professional, existential – one need not be stuck.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Such is the import of the word "Mitzrayim," which, as many commentaries point out, is related to metzarim, meaning a "narrow or constricted place." To live in the Egypt of our daily lives often is to feel fenced in, without any hope for inner release. The Exodus instructs us that all of life is a choice to be free. God's liberation is not merely directed at the Israelites, but at each individual heart at the seder table, for the time comes when one realizes that there's a certain kind of life that is unavoidable if not for the surrender to God and a commitment to the spiritual path.

It's not that another kind of life is a bad life or necessarily an empty one. Such a life may be filled with many things, but inevitably the missing piece is often the sense that something matters beyond what a human being does. From a chillingly material perspective, what humans make, what we believe in, what we value, what we live for, what we die for – that's all there is or seems to be. But the Jewish sequence is quite different, for freedom from Egypt is followed by revelation at Sinai, redeeming Jews from one illusion only: the idea that the standard of human morality is the final ground of existence.

That is the only thing God really freed us from in Mitzrayim. Jews were enslaved after that – they were tortured and gassed and shot and exterminated. They were persecuted and harassed and exiled and ridiculed. But never again were we reduced to a life in which the transcendent was missing, where the spiritual life, the one beyond tangible measure, was not at the centre of our existence. And quite frankly, that has made all the difference in Jewish history. It is to that point that the seder speaks, and that idea represents our salvation.

It would be telling is one were to conduct an on-the-street poll and ask people what they would most desire in life. Answers such as happiness, wealth, romantic love and success would likely pour in. One wonders whether the idea of living for the highest would crack the top 20.

Some of us old enough to remember being enthralled by the signature line of Kris Kristofferson's song Me and Bobby McGee –"Freedom's just another name for nothing left to lose"– must reckon with how this piece of folk wisdom ends up being the antithesis of the Pesach message. For Jews everywhere, freedom must be appreciated as precisely the opportunity to value that which must never be lost.

Jewish outlaws of the high seas

Jewish Pirates of the Caribbean: How a generation of swashbuckling Jews carved out an empire in the New World in their quest for treasure, religious freedom – and revenge, by Edward Kritzler, Doubleday.

Books
Bernard Baskin

One's first reaction to the title of this book is surprise and laughter. Actually, it is a serious attempt to bring to life a little-known chapter in Jewish history: how a small group of Jewish merchants and adventurers – in the wake of the Spanish Inquisition – became free-wheeling outlaws on the high seas.

Their ships carried such names as the Prophet Samuel, Queen Esther and Shield of Abraham. They plundered Spanish and Portuguese possessions, defying those countries that had exiled them.

The author of this detailed, many-sided account is a journalist and historian, and a longtime resident of Jamaica.

In the 15th century, Converso Jews came to Jamaica disguised as Christians.

These newcomers set up sugar factories, pioneered tea, grain and coffee cultivation and traded sugar, tobacco, gold and silver with covert Jews on the Iberian Peninsula.

Other descendants of refugees from the Inquisition settled in Amsterdam and were accepted by the Dutch as a valued merchant class. "They raised their children in the free air of Holland. Over the course of half a century of leadership – 1623-75 – they invaded the world, battled outposts of the Inquisition and orchestrated their people's freedom."

Eventually, liberty reached England as well. On April 3, 1656, London's 35 Jewish families gathered for a Passover seder. After 366 years, they were no longer illegal aliens. "To consecrate this new day, [Oliver] Cromwell's chief intelligencer proudly changed his name to Abraham Israel Carvajal."

The 17th century began with Jews outlawed in the New World and most of Europe, and it closed with most of them free.

As Jewish involvement with piracy petered out in the Caribbean, many of the original intrepid group united in the cause of liberty. During the American Revolution, a dozen prominent Jews sided with the rebels as privateers. Celebrated as fathers of early Jewish congregations, these men owned and operated more than a few of the pirate ships that captured and destroyed more than 600 British ships and took cargos and prizes with an estimated value of $18 million in today's dollars.

No discussion of Jewish piracy should leave out the Jewish heritage of the famous pirate known to Americans as a hero of the Battle of New Orleans. In a hand-written note in his family bible, Jean Lafitte wrote: "I owe all my ingenuity to the intuition of my Jewish-Spanish grandmother, who was a witness at the time of the Inquisition."

Of course, figures are imprecise, but it is estimated that Conversos in the mid-17th century numbered around 10,000 of the 200,000 settlers in the New World.

Unfortunately, with a heritage of denying their faith, most of their descendants of the pirates eventually abandoned their religion. Of the thousands or more Spanish and Portuguese names listed in the Jamaican telephone book, the island's declared Jews today number less than 200.

Verdict: A colourful, well-researched history, somewhat over-detailed, but much of it fresh and exciting.

Passover humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Passover humour? No, this isn't some kind of joke. Well, actually it is. Although Passover is more associated with maror than mirth, today we are going to look at the lighter side of the holiday.

These days, it's impossible to enjoy something without receiving a health warning. A group of medical people have published data that indicates seder participants should not partake of chopped liver and charoses as this combination can lead to "charoses of the liver!" [tinyurl.com/pesachumor01]

Actually, you can't talk Jewish humour without talking Jewish food. David Bader has taken great strides in simplifying the religion with his Yo-Yo Diet Guide to the Jewish Holidays. He postulates that the Jewish festivals are divided between days on which we must starve and days we must eat.

- Chanukah – eat potato pancakes
- Tenth of Tevet – don't eat potato pancakes
- Tu b'Shvat, Feast
- Fast of Esther – fast
- Purim – eat pastry
- Passover – don't eat pastry
- Shavuot – dairy feast (cheesecake, blintzes, etc.)
- Seventeenth of Tammuz – fast (definitely no cheesecake or blintzes) [tinyurl.com/pesachumor02]

That may sound concise, but another wit has condensed the religion even further in the Short Summary of Every Jewish Holiday, certainly applicable to Passover.

They tried to kill us…
We won…
Let's eat! [tinyurl.com/pesachumor03]

Try the Passover quiz. Here's a sample question from a huge humour site:

On seder night, we are supposed to drink wine until…
(a) Uncle Irving's jokes sound new to you
(b) You can no longer tell the difference between Pharaoh and Moses
(c) You don't miss bread [tinyurl.com/pesachumor04]

Or how about going a round of Passover Jeopardy? The answer: a classroom, a Passover ceremony and a latke

The question: what is a cheder, a seder and a tater? [tinyurl.com/pesachumor05]

Passover wouldn't be the same without its wonderful songs. But if you are looking for a break from Dayenu or Chad Gadya, there are plenty of new tunes to try out such as There's No Seder Like Our Seder, Afikoman (sung to the tune of Oklahoma) and the best of the bunch, Our Passover Things.

"Cleaning and cooking and so many dishes/ Out with the chametz, no pasta, no knishes/ Fish that's gefilted, horseradish that stings/ These are a few of our Passover things." [tinyurl.com/pesachumor06]

Here are a few cases of truthful humour being funnier than fiction. Matzah, of course, is central to Passover. But not everyone has acquired a taste for our "bread of affliction." Marilyn Monroe was once served matzah ball soup for three meals in a row. Not too impressed, she asked, "Isn't there any other part of the matzah you can eat?" [tinyurl.com/pesachumor07]

Here are some Biblical Bloopers compiled by Richard Lederer – actual mistakes made by young scholars from around the world. "Moses led the Hebrews to the Red Sea, where they made unleavened bread, which is bread made without any ingredients. The Egyptians were all drowned in the dessert. Afterward, Moses went up on Mount Cyanide to get the Ten Amendments. The First Commandment was when Eve told Adam to eat the apple. The Fifth Commandment is humour thy father and mother. The Seventh Commandment is thou shalt not admit adultery. The Ninth Commandment is thou salt not bare faults witness. Moses died before he ever reached Canada." [tinyurl.com/pesachumor08]

And finally, there's this excerpt from the British game show, Are You Smarter Than a 10-year-old?. In one episode, contestant Sarah is asked, "What is the name of the flat, unleavened bread Jews eat on Passover?" Unable to answer, Sarah elicits the help of 10-year-old Lisa, who writes the answer, "matzah," in both English and Hebrew (albeit with a small spelling mistake). I highly recommend watching this clip as Sarah wrestles with her doubts about whether to go with Lisa's response, even after her young helper pleads, "I'm Jewish." [tinyurl.com/pesachumor09]

Here comes the Blessing of the Sun

By RABBI DAVID KALB
JTA

I have this internal iPod in my head that provides theme music for my life. Lately my theme song is Here Comes the Sun by the Beatles. Not only is it my theme song, but this year it is the theme song of the entire Jewish people.

Why?

On the 13th of Nissan (April 8), the morning before Erev Pesach (as if we do not have enough to do that day), we will be reciting Birkat Hachamah, the Blessing of the Sun. The blessing, recited every 28 years, marks the time that the sun is in the exact place it was in when the world was created (Brachot 59b).

It may seem strange to recite a blessing that relates to the sun since Jewish observance generally is more oriented toward the moon. Rosh Chodesh, Judaism's celebration of each new month, is based on the new moon and creates the foundation for the Jewish calendar.

So why this Blessing of the Sun? What is the importance of celebrating the anniversary of its creation?

The Torah describes the sun's creation in the Book of Genesis, Chapter 1, lines 14 to 19. We recite these lines from the Torah as part of the Birkat Hachamah service. In lines 14 and 15, God creates two lights that appear to be equal in strength and are responsible for separating day and night, as well as marking holidays, days and years. The Torah does not name these lights, but one can assume that the light of the night is the moon and the light of the day is the sun.

In line 16, however, something happens: the Torah makes a distinction between the lights. God pronounces the light of the day (the sun) to be the greater light and the light of the night (the moon) to be the lesser light.

What causes the change from the apparent equality of sun and moon in lines 14 and 15 to the dominance of the sun in Line 16? Why this dominance of the sun when it is simply not the case in Judaism?

While both the sun and moon play an equal role in separating day and night, the moon, as noted, plays a more dominant role in marking holidays and determining the calendar. Why, then, does God pronounce the sun to be dominant over the moon?

The rabbis of the Talmud tell us a story intimately connected to these lines from the Torah (Chullin 60b). When the sun and moon were created, the rabbis tell us, they indeed were equal. But the moon asked God, "Is it possible for two kings to utilize the same crown?" There cannot be two lights that rule the sky; one must be dominant.

In the story, God seems to have heard the question as a display of the moon's arrogance and punished the moon by having the moon diminish itself. The moon responded, "Is it fitting that because I said a correct thing before You that I must diminish myself?" The moon explained that it was not being arrogant and simply was stating a fact: there cannot be two kings.

God, heeding the moon's words, rescinded the punishment and made the moon more dominant than the sun in determining the calendar and holidays. God also instructed the Jewish people to prepare a chaparah, an atonement sacrifice, on God's behalf. In other words, according to the Talmud, God acknowledged that God committed a sin against the moon. The sacrifice was offered every Rosh Chodesh and is fulfilled today by offering the Musaf prayer (the additional prayer) on Rosh Chodesh.

Perhaps in telling this story, the rabbis of the Talmud wished to present a new way of looking at God. The story portrays a God who can commit a sin and do tshuvah, a startling new way to look at God and, certainly, an awesome model for our own practice of tshuvah.

While the Blessing of the Sun marks the anniversary of the creation of the sun, it also may be viewed as the anniversary of this talmudic story. The rabbis told the story to embellish the description of the creation of the sun and the moon in the Torah. Their embellishment created a moment in time in which the Jewish people could look at God in a different way. That moment is commemorated by Birkat Hachamah.

On a more general level, think about the way the sun renews itself each day. This can be seen as a model for the way we might renew our relationship with God. Every day the sun rises and sets; so, too, every day we need to renew our understanding of God. Birkat Hachamah is a unique extension of this idea. Thus I believe that when we recite Birkat Hachamah, we must strive to renew our understanding of God, to re-envision God.

Let me share what will be going on in my mind – my internal iPod – when I recite Birkat Hachamah this year. Recently, I met someone who told me that he had experienced a series of tragedies. He could not reconcile these tragedies with his vision of God, a vision in which God is directly involved in the events of the world. This posed a difficult challenge to his faith in God.

Asked for guidance, I tried to help this individual re-envision God. I explained that it is possible to envision a God who is not directly involved in the events of the world. This is not to say that the vision of God being directly involved in the events of the world is incorrect; God is infinite. Therefore we are able to, and perhaps need to, utilize as many visions of God as possible.

In a vision of God where God is not directly involved in the events of the world, God gives us hope when all we feel is despair, strength when all we feel is weakness and love when all we feel is hate. God gives us these blessings, and with these blessings we have the ability to make miracles happen.

As we recite Birkat Hachamah this year, let us use each day's new light of the sun to continue to look at God in new ways. In so doing, together with God, we renew creation.

Group calls for investigation into Palestinian clerics

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center has alerted law enforcement and government officials about the imminent arrival to Canada of two radical Palestinian clergymen who it says hold problematic views that warrant an investigation.

Avi Benlolo, FSWC president and CEO, said Ekrima Sabri, imam of the Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, and Atallah Hannah, Greek Orthodox bishop of Sebastia, have each made statements about Jews that should concern the Canadian public. Canada's immigration department and intelligence agencies "should investigate this and make an appropriate decision on behalf of all Canadians, to decide whether they should be admitted," Benlolo said.

The two in question are featured guests at an April 5 event sponsored by Palestine House in Mississauga.

Benlolo said they have a long record of statements that are inconsistent with Canadian values of tolerance and human rights.

Sabri, who was appointed Grand Mufti of Jerusalem by former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and served from 1994 to 2006, openly supports martyrdom operations against Israel, including those by children. "He's also a Holocaust revisionist. He's questioned the number of six million murdered and he's called it a fairy tale," Benlolo said.

An Internet search revealed that Sabri has taken an extreme position on relations with Jews. Speaking about child martyrs (suicide bombers), he told the Egyptian weekly Al-Ahram Al-Arabi in 2000 (translated by the Middle East Media Research Institute) that, "the younger the martyr, the greater and the more I respect him."

Asked in the interview about "the Jews who are besieging Al-Aqsa," he said, "I enter the mosque of Al-Aqsa with my head up and at the same time I am filled with rage toward the Jews. I have never greeted a Jew when I come near one. I never will. They cannot even dream that I will. The Jews do not dare bother me, because they are the most cowardly creatures Allah has ever created."

He is cited in other media reports praying a month before 9/11 for "Allah [to] destroy the United States, its helpers and agents."

On Palestinian Authority radio in 1997 he said, "Oh Allah, destroy America, for she is ruled by Zionist Jews." In the same radio broadcast, he said, "Allah will take revenge on behalf of his prophet against the colonialist settlers who are sons of monkeys and pigs."

He has consistently denied any Jewish links to Jerusalem. "There is not even the smallest indication of the existence of a Jewish temple on this place in the past," he has said. "In the whole city, there is not even a single stone indicating Jewish history."

He went on to say, "It is the art of the Jews to deceive the world."

He claims all the territory from the Mediterranean to the Jordan River as Palestinian territory and he published a fatwa in 2000 insisting on the right of return and prohibiting compensation in its place. Jews who came to Israel from around the world will be forced to leave, he told the German newspaper, Die Welt.

Hannah has also maintained that Jerusalem is an Arab city.

In July 2002, he was fired from his post as spokesperson by the Greek Patriarch of Jerusalem for "supporting the Palestinian terrorism" and for refusing to sign a document condemning Palestinian operations. The Patriarch was later removed from his post following charges of selling land belonging to the Greek Orthodox Church to Zionist settlers

Palestine House did not respond to a CJN request for a comment, but its spokesperson, Samir Jabbour, told the National Post that Hannah is a peace activist and believes Jerusalem belongs to the three monotheistic faiths.

Benlolo criticized Palestine House for bringing speakers whose views are far from the Canadian mainstream values of "tolerance, human rights, dialogue and building bridges."

"By bringing people who foment hate and violence… this should raise the eyebrows of Canadians," Benlolo said.

Correction

The guest voice that appeared in The CJN of March 26 ("Mercaz cuts hurt Jewish unity, continuity') contained some incorrect information about its author, Dr. Jack Lipinsky. It should have read that he teaches at United Synagogue Day School and the University of Toronto and writes curriculum for Facing History and Ourselves, a non-profit program that engages students of diverse backgrounds in an examination of racism, prejudice, and anti-Semitism in order to promote the development of a more humane and informed citizenry.

Court asked to overturn restriction on Galloway

Compiled by CJN Staff

A Federal Court judge on Sunday heard a motion asking that he overturn a government decision to bar British MP George Galloway from Canada. The decision was expected on Monday afternoon, after The CJN went to press.

Organizers of a four-event speaking tour had said they would attempt to escort Galloway across the border, but cancelled that in anticipation of the court decision.

Lawyers for the controversial parliamentarian from the Respect party argued the decision to prevent Galloway's entry was politically motivated and an attack on freedom of expression.

Court documents filed by Galloway's lawyers allege Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney, who has the authority to permit Galloway into the country, harbours a personal dislike of Galloway's political views. "In this context it is an abuse of power and deserving of judicial condemnation," the documents state, according to a report in the Toronto Star.

Kenney has said he will not interfere in a decision by the Canadian Border Services Agency, which has barred Galloway as a security threat. He also stated the Galloway decision was not an issue of limiting free expression.

"It has nothing to do with freedom of speech and everything to do with maintaining the integrity of our Immigration [and Refugee Protection] Act, which says individuals that provide materials and financial support to an illegal terrorist organization are inadmissible for entry into Canada," he said.

Federal authorities allege Galloway has provided financial support to Hamas, a banned organization in Canada.

Galloway admitted as much in an interview with IslamOnline.net. In a posting dated March 12, with a Gaza City dateline, the Internet site reproduces an interview with the British parliamentarian, who was in Gaza along with hundreds of activists who brought more than $1.4 million in aid to the area.

In the lead up to the interview, the website states Galloway was "the main organizer who personally donated three cars and $35,000 (US), a few hours before leaving Palestinian territory."

Asked the reason for his visit, Galloway said "the main one [reason] is to stand beside the legal Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya. The entire world knows that he was elected, apparently democratically. I have offered him corporeal and financial support. I know that what we have offered is not enough, but is is highly symbolic."

Later, he is asked why the British media didn't cover the journey to Gaza more extensively. Galloway responded: "In a meeting with the BBC, before leaving the U.K., they were astonished that a British parliamentarian gives money to Ismail Haniya despite that the British government considers him illegal.

"I say that this siege is imposed against democracy and nothing illegal here in Gaza [sic]."

Ironically, Galloway supported the U.K. government's decision to bar Dutch parliamentarian Geert Wilders, who made the film Fitna, which examined the qur'anic inspiration for violence in Islam.

"Freedom of speech is not an absolute," Galloway said. Calling Wilders a hater of Muslims, he said "he shouldn't be allowed into our country to whip up that hatred."

Impressive Hillel leader enters student political minefield

Undemocratic voting procedures alleged in disputed student elections

By Sally Szuster

When 20-year-old Daniel Ferman decided to run as a councilor in York University's recent student elections, he could, by that point, be considered a veteran politician.

He has been among the most quoted members of the Jewish community in his role as president of Hillel@York, where he remains at the centre of a storm that has galvanized Toronto's Jewish community and mobilized Jewish students to expose an atmosphere on campus marked by anti-Semitism, anti-Israel sentiment and a recent wave of intimidation. Hillel is financially supported by UJA Federation.

Now, add allegations of voting irregularities and undemocratic rules governing student elections and the storm in which Ferman finds himself is even more severe.

As a high profile Jewish leader on campus, Ferman has led a call for a return to civil discourse and a new environment in which not just Jewish students but all students can feel safe. Along the way, he has faced the kind of hurdles that most members of the Canadian Parliament would consider "dirty politics."

Daniel Ferman on the York University campus.

"It has been quite the year," said Ferman with a smile. The affable Schulich School of Business student ran in the election with a slate of culturally diverse candidates that represented a mandate to reverse the toxic climate on campus. Ferman was the only one on the slate who won his seat in an election that was plagued with what he calls "dictatorial voting procedures and an attempt by the current anti-Israel student government to thwart all efforts by the York Forward slate" on which Ferman ran. "The lack of any democratic process in York's student elections would even make dictatorships in the world blush," said Ferman. "We saw everything from extra printing of ballots to an elections committee, responsible for overseeing the voting, that was aligned with the other slate and accountable to no one." Ferman's slate, York Forward, is currently asking the York administration to overturn the election results.

Ferman's activism was prompted, in large measure, by his experience on February 11th, as one of the Jewish students in the York Hillel Lounge who was barricaded by anti-Israel protesters yelling anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs. Hillel, together with other student groups, such as Hasbara Fellowship and the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism, and Jewish community organizations have been demanding that the York administration take strong action to protect Jewish students on campus. Police and university investigations into the February 11th incident are underway and the university has formed a task force to examine the current campus climate and how it can be improved.

"Jewish students have been living with this poisoned atmosphere on campus for some time. But the events on February 11th really exposed York's complacency to the world," said Ferman. "Students were really shaken that it took local police to be called onto campus to ensure their safety."

But Ferman sees a bright side to the recent media attention surrounding the escalation of harassment on campus. "The outpouring of support by our community has really inspired the students, and I think it's really reflective of our collective strength. It has also given students a way to understand the role that UJA Federation, along with affiliated organizations such as CIJA and Canadian Jewish Congress, play in our community. We've all been working as such strong partners in restoring an environment where all students can pursue their education free of intimidation and harassment."

UJA Federation honoured for commitment to renewable energy

By Daniel Horowitz

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto was recently honoured for its outstanding contribution to renewable energy projects in southern Israel, specifically in the Eilat/Eilot region, with which UJA Federation is linked through its Partnership 2000 initiative.

The Brian Medwed Award is given by the Regional Council of Eilot in honour of Medwed, who was an avid supporter of renewable energy development in the Arava region and dedicated his time to studying, developing and promoting a number of initiatives in this field.

Over the past three years, UJA Federation - through UIA Canada - has committed over $500,000 to develop the region as a leader in renewable energy. The funding has supported research and development at the renowned Arava Institute, the first renewable energy facility in Israel where students can obtain a Masters degree in the field. The renewable energy initiative also extends to educational programming in high schools and local communities.

The goal of UJA Federation's investment through UIA Canada is to develop the region and nurture a thriving industry for residents who often leave for more urban centres and job opportunities. The Eilat/Eilot region has the highest rates of sunlight in the world.

"Renewable energy will generate job opportunities and prosperity for the residents and make us leaders in the global effort to sustain our planet," said Udi Gat, Chair of the Eilot Regional Council. "All of these factors will contribute to establishing the region as the Silicon Valley of renewable energy. The Toronto Jewish community was the first to believe in the Renewable Energy Project."

The award was presented to Morley Brown, Lorri Kushnir and Ariella Rohringer, members of UJA Federation's Israel & Overseas Committee. "Toronto is justified in feeling elated that its long term support of Eilat has been recognized and rewarded by the Israeli government," said Rohringer. "We should, as well, be uplifted by the consequent growth of this peripheral community's economy and educational institutions, which will inevitably follow as it becomes a renewable energy leader in the world."

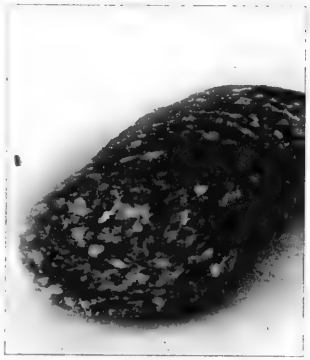
"Over three years ago we and our Eilat partners had set a goal to transform the region from one perceived as a disadvantaged community to a community of opportunity," explained Kushnir. "And today the region has succeeded in becoming Israel's 'go to' address for all matters relating to renewable energy generally and solar energy in particular. UJA Federation supported this bold initiative from the beginning. This award validates that support."

"UJA Federation was instrumental in convincing the region of Eilot to develop a strategic plan for renewable energy," said Brown. "This helped get the ball rolling. However, all the work on implementing the strategic plan has been done by the people of Eilat and Eilot, and they deserve all the credit. The fact that over 700 people came to the recent renewable energy conference is a testament to their hard work and one indication of their many successes."

Shefa salami recalled in listeria scare

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter



Local retailers are assuring their customers that they didn't sell any Shefa salami that the company had to recall because of a listeria scare.

Kosher butchers at the Sobey's on Clark Avenue West in Thornhill and at Toronto Kosher said they didn't receive any of the recalled batch of salamis, and at the Real Canadian Superstore at Dufferin Street and Steeles Avenue, the kosher butcher said the store did receive a small number of packages, but it sent them back to Shefa before anyone could buy them.

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency issued a recall notice on March 24 that warned the public about some batches of Shefa brand salami because the product may be have been contaminated with listeria monocytogenes.

The affected product is sold in 750-gram packages bearing lot code 2831, UPC number 8 13217 00179 7, and a best-before date of June 2.

The product was distributed in Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario.

In a press release, the CFIA said there have been no reported illnesses associated with the consumption of this product.

It said that food contaminated with listeria monocytogenes may not look or smell spoiled. Consumption of contaminated food may cause listeriosis, a food-borne illness that can cause high fever, severe headache, stiff neck and nausea. Pregnant women, the elderly and those with weakened immune systems are particularly at risk.

Manny Alter, manager of Toronto Kosher, said the recall was precautionary and consumers shouldn't worry.

Calls to Shefa representatives were not returned by The CJN's deadline. An administrative assistant said owner Yaakov Luss was too busy dealing with increased Passover production to comment.

UJA Federation studying impact of provincial budget

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jewish organizations are studying the implications of last week's Ontario budget, which includes the introduction of a blended sales tax of 13 per cent, deficit spending, lower corporate taxes and boosts in infrastructure spending.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is "in the middle of its analysis," said Howard English, the organization's vice-president of communications. "UJA Federation is consulting with its partner agencies."

The budget was also "a significant topic of discussion at a meeting of volunteers who are working on issues of poverty in the Jewish community," he said.

Among the areas that are being investigated are the budget's potential effect on "affordable housing, home care, and the difficult financial situation faced by Jewish Family and Child. Also money for new immigrant training," English said.

Among the budget's highlights was harmonization of the eight per cent provincial sales tax and the five per cent federal GST, which will take effect on July 1, 2010. The blended tax will increase consumption taxes on a variety of items that are not currently subject to provincial levies, including home purchases over $500,000. To offset the increased costs, families earning $160,000 or less annually will receive one-time payouts totalling $1,000, while single Ontarians will receive $300.

Streamlining Mercaz frees up cash for education

By DAVID KOSCHITZKY

Former U.S. president John F. Kennedy once said that change is the law of life. It is certainly the law of community life, especially when contemporary challenges compel us to find new ways of doing things while keeping our commitment to core values and the Jewish future.

Our community's commitment to Jewish education is a core value that will never change. However, in order to both maintain and strengthen that commitment, we need to develop a different method of delivering Jewish education programs and services rather than relying solely on a large, central planning body to perform that function. The strength of our community's Jewish education system should not be dependent on the maintenance of such an administrative entity. In these challenging economic times, our donors expect us to maintain, if not expand, essential services, while, at the same time, watching costs carefully.

David Koschitzky

Streamlining the Mercaz into a smaller department allows UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to increase direct financial support to Jewish education, through an additional $500,000 for tuition subsidies, bringing our subsidy-related assistance to more than $10 million. We can also guarantee ongoing funding for supplementary schools and continuing allocations for children with special needs. In both cases, we're even hoping to enhance funding. And UJA Federation is publicly committed to making sure there's enough money for the educational services that our community counts on. All this will be undertaken through a robust partnership with affiliated schools to determine priority programs and services – a partnership in which our community's schools will be playing a much more prominent role, for which they are well suited.

Based on UJA Federation-school consensus, the Board of License will continue. So will the Midrasha, PD days, the Bible contest, Rikudiya, Zimriya, the creative writing contest, the media lending library and many more significant services to which the community has become accustomed. The process of constant consultation will most likely produce several new ideas, as well, to benefit the community. All of these initiatives may be delivered differently, but, as long our schools, in concert with UJA Federation, attest to their importance, they will be part of Toronto's educational landscape.

Whether educational initiatives are delivered by a large, education administration or by other means will have minimal impact on the recipients of these services. The federation's financial commitment is there to maintain them, precisely because the old, centralized Mercaz is being streamlined.

This is what capacity-building is all about. It is not service duplication. It is co-operation, consensus, a quest for innovation and genuine partnership designed to strengthen schools rather than relying on a central entity to do it all.

Change is, indeed, difficult, but, as JFK also said, "Those who look only to the past or present are certain to miss the future." Our community's commitment to Jewish education is extraordinary. So is our understanding of the link between Jewish education and our Jewish future. The Mercaz restructuring strengthens that link.

David Koschitzky is chair of the board, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Orthodox elementary school to close

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ohr HaTorah Day School in Winnipeg will be closing its elementary school next year in light of low enrolment and financial difficulties.

Joseph Cohen, a founder of the 10-year-old modern Orthodox school and its current president, told The CJN that it's "virtually certain that there will be no grade school at Ohr HaTorah Day School next year, but only a program from preschool to kindergarten [which is at capacity this year]."

The development comes after the school's new principal, Rabbi Uriel Malka, left suddenly and returned to Israel with his wife and children after only six months on the job.

"Things just did not work out, unfortunately," Cohen said.

"We paid to fly him and his family back to Israel," rather than have him continue to serve out the rest of the year, he added.

Cohen said he was not at liberty to say more, except that the move was best for everyone involved.

According to Cohen, currently there are only five children in the school from grades 1 to 4. There had been eight, but two of them were Rabbi Malka's children and another child has moved to the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, the city's main community day school, which serves children from junior kindergarten to Grade 12.

"We have asked the Jewish Federation [of Winnipeg] for a sum of $30,000, which we need in order to finish out the school year. The federation has said it will provide us the money on the basis that we negotiate in good faith with Gray Academy to see if we can merge with them and provide an enhanced religious track in Gray Academy."

However, Cohen said he isn't optimistic about a merger. If talks are unsuccessful, he said he'll have to decide where to send his children next year.

"It is possible I will send them to public school, such as Brock Corydon [which has a Hebrew-language instructional program] and give them religious teaching after school… My family will consider all of its options in order to decide what is best for our children," he said.

Federation CEO Bob Freedman said the federation approved $30,000 in financial assistance to Ohr HaTorah "predicated on an accommodation between Ohr HaTorah and Gray Academy."

When asked whether the federation would still give Ohr HaTorah the money if a deal with Gray Academy isn't reached, Freedman said, "If there is no accommodation [between Ohr HaTorah and Gray Academy], then we'll have to revisit this issue."

Both Freedman and Cohen confirmed that merger talks have been taking place for more than three months, but said they couldn't provide details at his time.

Ohr HaTorah, located in the building of Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue, celebrated its 10th anniversary last year. Chabad also runs a small elementary school in Winnipeg, but Cohen said he won't send his children there.

Nuclear threats 'unacceptable'

And those discussions... have to include as the central item of business with the Iranians: you can't talk to Israel this way, it's got to stop. And if they stop, then things become possible. If not, we'll be back in the deep freeze for a long time to come."

Would Ignatieff be in favour of having an explicit statement and commitment from a number of countries regarding the safety of Israel that might be used to dissuade Iran from ever deploying nuclear weapons against the Jewish state?

"I think Iran is fully aware... that nuclear threats toward Israel are unacceptable and will be met with... 'credible deterrence' – let's put it that way. I don't think the Iranian regime... is in any doubt about the determination of Israel's allies to defend her."

In the Guardian of April 19, 2002, Ignatieff was quoted as saying, "Two years ago, an American friend took me on a helicopter ride from Jerusalem to the Golan Heights over the Palestinian West Bank. He wanted to show me how vulnerable Israel was, how the Arabs only had to cross 11 kilometres of land to reach the sea and throw the Israelis into it. I got this message, but I also came away with another one. When I looked down at the West Bank, at the settlements like Crusader forts occupying the high ground, at the Israeli security cordon along the Jordan river closing off the Palestinian lands from Jordan, I knew I was not looking down at a state or the beginnings of one, but at a bantustan, one of those pseudo-states created in the dying years of apartheid to keep the African population under control."

In last month's interview, Ignatieff was asked to clarify what he meant in his earlier statement.

"All my adult life, [I've] made it clear that... it's illegitimate to compare Israel to apartheid South Africa, and let's be very clear why – because all citizens of Israel have equal rights. In apartheid South Africa, people were excluded from full citizenship on the basis of race. And that was denounced as a crime against humanity. So I've never, ever, in my life equated Israel and apartheid South Africa.

"I think what I meant in using the terminology I used... in 2002 is something that I think is as evident to Israelis as it is to anybody else, which is that the only way out of the horror and the tragedy in the Middle East is a two-state solution in which Israel has absolutely solid guarantees of its security and international legitimacy, and the Palestinian state is viable enough to survive.

"I think my choice of words was not of the best, but the point was not to equate Israel to apartheid South Africa but to say, for Israel's own security, the Palestinian state that will eventually emerge in the West Bank and Gaza must be viable. It's not for me to say what viability amounts to. It's not for me to define what the boundaries and frontiers should be. That's between the two parties. But it ought to be viable."

As for the rise of anti-Semitism in the European mainstream, Ignatieff said, "It's not just in Europe. I'm very concerned about the statements by [President] Hugo Chavez of Venezuela. I'm very concerned about Durban II, the flagrant misuse of international UN bodies to promote this entirely false equation between Zionism as a kind of racism. We've been here with this for 30 years. So some of the phenomena of anti-Semitism are not new in Canada, and I'm aware there are Jewish communities in Canada that feel a degree of insecurity in Canada they've never felt before.

"My predecessor [Stéphane Dion] committed to work with... not just the Jewish community, but any community that feels its security is in danger, to make sure they have the means to protect and defend their schools – all their establishments – because the bottom line for me as a Canadian politician is that every Canadian citizen must have a right to be who they are, say who they are, affirm their identity proudly, and go about their business in security.

"And the general atmosphere out in the world is of increasing hostility to the Jewish people. Canada has to make a very clear statement that that's unacceptable, that all citizens in Canada are entitled to go about their business in peace and security."

If the Liberals are elected, Ignatieff said he will honour Dion's promise of $75 million to ethnic communities for increased security. "I'm reiterating that pledge," he said. "The question of whether that's the dollar figure we end up with depends on what the needs are, but the commitment he made I want to reiterate in very strong terms."

Ex-envoy suggests sharing Jerusalem

By RON STANG
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR — Michael Bell, former Canadian ambassador to Israel, Egypt and Jordan, says that, despite myriad rounds of negotiations in the Mideast peace process, no one has come up with a relatively straightforward plan for shared governance of Jerusalem's Old City.

"It does sound surprising even to me, and I've been involved in this stuff since 1975, pretty well continuously," he said. "But the simple fact is it has not been done."

Michael Bell

Bell, a Windsor native and currently the Paul Martin Senior Scholar on International Diplomacy at the University of Windsor, is co-founder of the Old Jerusalem Initiative, a university-based attempt to find "creative options" for governance and management of the walled city. In the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs, he and Daniel Kurtzer, former U.S. ambassador to Israel and Egypt, put forward a proposal for a "special regime" that would be administered jointly by Israelis and Palestinians.

Currently, Israel claims sovereignty over all of Jerusalem, although its claim over the Old City and eastern Jerusalem isn't recognized by many nations.

Bell said initiative members have spoken to "many, many people" on both sides, including Gilead Sher, Israel's lead negotiator at Camp David in 2000, and Canada's Jean de Chastelain, who played a pivotal role in drafting Northern Ireland's Good Friday accord. Those officials "seem to recognize that this may be something worth looking at if and when" there is an opening in the peace process to adopt it, he said.

The reason for focusing on Old Jerusalem is obvious. The less-than-one-square-kilometre area is home to some of the most sacred sites for Jews and Muslims, places that are physically linked and inextricably shared, including the Temple Mount and Western Wall and the Islamic edifices the Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aqsa Mosque.

"We're not trying to ram anything down anybody's throat," said Bell, who started the project earlier this decade at University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Studies. But the team, which includes other former Canadian Middle Eastern foreign affairs officers Michael Molloy and John Bell, came to the realization that previous plans remained contradictory to the unique social and physical environment that is the Old City, with its Muslim and Jewish quarters.

Those other options include one or the other side having full sovereignty "or they split too vertically or horizontally," Bell said. The team didn't think those proposals "would really work, be viable, be sustainable" because of the region's instability.

Under Bell's group proposal, "we tried to develop a regime that ultimately Palestinians and Israelis would be the masters of what would really be a separate authority that could deal with crises, what have you, independently."

Under the proposal, Israelis and Palestinians would choose an executive board, would decide how the board is configured, and would choose a chief administrator – who might be someone from neither camp to allay suspicions of each side – with the official being responsible to the board.

The regime's mandate would be determined jointly, but two key areas of administrative control would be security and holy site management, "which the regime wouldn't take over from the proprietors of these sites, but would really, I suppose, replace the Israeli government in its role."

Bell said the proposal could be part of wider two-state negotiations and could be taken off the shelf whenever Israelis and Palestinians begin such talks.

"Yeah, I suppose it is asking a lot," he said. "But our belief is that absent something like this, there will be no peace."

According to Bell, previous attempts at structuring control such as this decade's Geneva Accord set up a system that would be too unstable. Certain streets would be blue for Israel, green for Palestinian and one with Palestinian sovereignty but Israeli police control.

"Well, we just don't think that would endure for very long, given the inevitability of some kind of tensions and conflict," he said.

Bell said the plan isn't a form of internationalism, as some critics have called it. "It's not internationalism in any classic sense, because Israelis and Palestinians would come up with the ideas. They would determine the mandate."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said that while Bell's proposal is "sincere and it's perceived that way by everybody he presents it to," there are weaknesses.

"I think the Israeli perspective is that it has only been under Israeli sovereignty that every religion has been able to ensure free access… to their own particular religious sites."

He noted that while the Temple Mount has significance for Muslims, it's "not comparable" to how important it is for Jews.

"For us it's the only holy place," while to Muslims it is "a distant third to Mecca and Medina," Fogel said.

Nevertheless, he added, Israel ensures the sanctity of the Dome "and controls access in favour of Muslim sensitivities. And I think that's the kind of evidence that suggests an authority that takes seriously the rights of all stakeholders to a sense of ownership of their own particular site."

"זה הזמן שכואב"

פרס נתן יונתן שונה מאחיו הבכירים בכך שאחת לשנתיים היא יחגוג את הפעמים שבין השורה לבין הלחן שלה.

בבבוא לספר שיריו המולחנים בעצם נתן יונתן את גדול משוררי גרבניה בתחילה המאה העשרים, ויילקה. שאבר את הדברים הבאים על המפגש של השיר והלחן:

"אם זה זמר של עששית או קולה של סערה....תציד רוחש באחוריך לחן רחב, הנרקם באלף קולות. שבו יש פה ושם ביטוי רסולו שיך....כיהו כאמנות של תקצע האמיתי: לרדת בין הטילים הגבוהות אל תוך לחן משותף...."

הינה קטע מציר נפלא שהשאיר נתן יונתן בעזבונו. שיר שנתן בפיה של אשה, שהלחנתי ויושר לראשונה בערב הזה:

"זה הזמן אהובי, שכואב לי נורא.
כמו פרפר שנולכד בעיצוי המנורה.
משהו שרציתי כל כך לא קרה.
ולכי יש עוד כוח לשוב הזרה?"

מדוע ישראלים עוזבים את ישראל

את השאלה הזאת אפשר לשאול מסיבות רבות. אבל אצל ד"ר לילך לב ארי זה הנושא העיקרי למחקריה. פעם קראו להם יורדים. עכשיו המושג הזה מתפוגג. לדבריה, לאור תופעת ההגירה הגלובאלית, ואולי כי החברה הישראלית יותר בטוחה בעצמה ואינה מרגישה מאוימת ו"נבגדת".

הינה מספר רעיונות מרכזיים ממחקרה של לב ארי:

בכל העולם יש בערך כ 350 אלף מהגרים ישראלים, כשהגדרת "מהגר" היא אדם שנמצא מחוץ לישראל יותר משנתיים. כחציים נמצאים באה"ב, כשקנדה נמצאת במקום השני.

לדברי לב ארי הסיבה המרכזית להגירה היא שיפור מצב כלכלי. ובשום אופן לא המצב הבטחוני, שהוא אמנם עילה לקיטורים בארץ אבל לא לירידה. המהגרים שייכים לשתי קבוצות שונות ומובדלות- בעלי מקצועות חפשיים (הייטק, מהנדסים, רופאים), ואלה שבאים מהמעמד הכלכלי הנמוך ושואפים לשפר את מעמדם הכלכלי בצורה גורפת.

לדברי ד"ר לב ארי, יש הבדל גדול בין אלה שהיגרו מישראל בשנות השמונים והתשעים, שמחזים עצמם כיורדים ומרגישים בצורך להתנצל על כך, לבין המהגרים של שנות האלפים שאינם מרגישים בצורך להתנצל ומרגישים שלא "ירדו" אלא דווקא "עלו" למקום טוב ובטיח יותר.

הנסיון האישי שלי מסכים עם החלוקה הזאת שיצרה לב ארי, והיא משקפת דור שרואה את הדברים שונה לגמרי.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

Appeal seeks to overturn York U vote

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The slate that was defeated in last month's undergraduate elections at York University has filed an appeal to invalidate the results because of incidents it says "compromised the integrity" of the vote.

York Forward – which ran against the policies of the outgoing York Federation of Students executive, accusing it of being too focused on non-campus issues such as the the Arab-Israeli conflict and York's recent 12-week strike by contract faculty and teaching assistants – was defeated in all but one of the races it contested by a rival slate called Students First.

But in an 11-page appeal to the YFS elections committee, it detailed a number of "procedural irregularities" and "suspicious circumstances," as well as all the times it was penalized with demerit points during the campaign, which nearly resulted in its disqualification.

Nearly 8,000 students – out of almost 46,000 undergraduates – voted between March 17 and March 20, the highest voter turnout in York's history.

This year's campaign was particularly contentious, because York Forward was born out of the Drop YFS campaign, a student-run initiative to have the outgoing YFS executive impeached due to its support for the recent strike, which shut down the university and threatened to wipe out the academic year.

Students First, the slate that swept the five executive positions and most of the 14 council positions, supported the outgoing YFS executive, which has been accused by some of having an anti-Israel bias and contributing to rising tensions between pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli students on campus.

Krisna Saravanamuttu, the YFS president-elect and the outgoing vice-president of equity, is alleged to have led a mob of about 100 anti-Israel protesters that barricaded Jewish students in the Hillel lounge on Feb. 11 while yelling anti-Israel and anti-Semitic slurs following a Drop YFS press conference.

The appeal by York Forward charges that one of the problems with the election process is that a few years ago, the rules were changed so that York's administration no longer oversees the vote.

"The election is now 'monitored' by a chief returning officer (CRO) who is overseen by a three-person panel, the elections committee, all of whom are now appointed by the [outgoing] YFS government," the appeal said.

As a result, the appeal suggests, the allies of one set of candidates unduly influenced this year's vote.

"When one of two slates controls the entire election process, exerts force and intimidation throughout the campaign, uses questionable balloting procedures with unnumbered ballots, implements ill-conceived counting measures (no counting measures are outlined in the [YFS election] by-laws)… this cannot be considered a fair or democratic election," the appeal said.

"On behalf of the thousands of students that supported York Forward and the countless number of people who value democracy, we ask that the results of this election not be accepted."

One of the complaints in the appeal referred to demerit points given to York Forward by CRO Casey Chu Cheong each time someone from the slate mentioned Saravanamuttu's involvement in the Hillel lounge incident. She said that mentioning his role defamed him and misrepresented the facts.

"Whenever we made a comment about his involvement in the Feb. 11 incident, not only us, but anyone who was part of our campaign team, we would get demerit points for that… [for saying that he was] involved in a hate crime," said York Forward campaign manager Carly Caruso.

According to Excalibur, York's campus newspaper, demerit points were also given to York Forward for "intent to invite third-party interference" for copying York administration on e-mails to the CRO, as well as for unintentional and intentional "misrepresentation of the facts" and for distributing "unapproved campaign materials" after it handed out copies of Excalibur.

Even though these demerit points didn't ultimately lead to York Forward's disqualification, Caruso said mandatory midday meetings to appeal them took up valuable campaign time.

Students First also received demerit points for pre-campaigning, poster violations and "unintentional misrepresentation of fact," but Caruso said they weren't given to Students First as often as they should have been.

The report outlined two incidents in which Students First campaigners violated the election code and the CRO didn't penalize them.

In response to the claim that the Students First slate was treated more leniently, Chu Cheong said that she "followed the guidelines as outlined in the elections code… to the T."

Speaking to The CJN moments before she was to meet with members of York Forward to discuss their appeal, Chu Cheong said she wouldn't consider the section about Saravanamuttu.

"I made it very clear to the York Forward campaigners that I will not be discussing that. That is a matter between the police and Hillel," Chu Cheong said.

Caruso also alleges that voting irregularities took place throughout the four-day voting period.

"We had people who were not able to cast a ballot. They went to vote at the polling stations and their names had been removed from the list. One of our executives couldn't even vote… A computer malfunction was one of the reasons given, and sometimes a reason wasn't even given."

The appeal said one student was told by a poll clerk that some names were "accidentally" removed from the voter list, which is meant to indicate they have already voted.

Chu Cheong admitted that names missing from the voter list was an issue during the election. "In our experience, it may have been because their last name was difficult to input, and that tends to happen," she said.

But, she added, there is a system in place to allow students whose names were not on the list to vote.

"What we would do is accept their votes and verify them with the students list in the registrar's office, and if they are a student, they are included."

She said a number of such votes are still being examined and will be counted if they're verified by the registrar.

The final results, which were still unofficial by The CJN's deadline, are expected to be ratified by the YFS this week.

Damning allegations cause media frenzy

Allegations that some Israeli soldiers wantonly violated the Israel Defence Forces' code of conduct during the Gaza military campaign, recklessly killing Palestinian civilians, broke first in the Israeli press. But the story quickly gained prominence in the Canadian and international media as well.

The Toronto Star's Oakland Ross reported on the story March 20 in a piece sensationally headlined "Israeli soldiers ran wild in Gaza; 'The most moral army in the world' killed civilians without cause."

In the article, Ross made it clear that the assertion that Israeli soldiers had killed unarmed Palestinian civilians "without provocation or warning" had come from soldiers' reports at a military college, and that the IDF had pledged to investigate the charges.

Ross cited the stories that had appeared in the Israeli newspapers Ha'aretz and Maariv. The papers alleged that four Palestinian civilians, including two children, had been recklessly killed in two separate incidents during Israel's recent Gaza incursion.

Nonetheless, the headline and front-page placement of the story left the impression of widespread wrongdoing – of an army out of control.

But the Star's sensational treatment paled in comparison with what occurred in the British media, according to the Jerusalem Post editorial "Purity of Arms" (March 22).

The Post said that the BBC "played up [the] claims: 'Israel troops admit Gaza abuses… including cold-blooded murder.' The International Herald Tribune led its Friday paper with 'Grim testimony on Israeli assault: Soldiers report killing of unarmed civilians in Gaza.' And London's matchless Independent splashed its entire front page with 'Israel's dirty secrets in Gaza.'"

In "A farewell to the purity of arms," (Globe and Mail, March 21) Patrick Martin approached the allegations from a more unusual angle – looking at the soul-searching within Israeli society about Jewish ethics and conduct during warfare.

Martin also paid attention to the broader context, noting that the allegations are not unique to Israel: "[S]uch behaviour is found in almost every military force (think Serbs in Bosnia, Americans at Abu Ghraib and Canadians in Somalia) and has existed as long as there has been war."

The National Post's March 23 editorial, "The Middle East's moral gulf" noted, "What is… remarkable is how this all has been handled in Israel itself. As soon as the allegations surfaced, Israel's military advocate general launched an investigation… Israel is an open society in which ordinary soldiers often discuss their combat experiences in op-ed articles, blogs and radio programs. Indeed, this whole story was originally broken by Israeli newspapers."

The Post also observed that, while none of the accounts had been verified, "no one should be surprised if some turn out to be true. No army – even one serving a humane, democratic nation such as Israel, tragically well-practised in the art of counter-terrorism – is staffed by unbroken legions of angels. There are always bad apples."

No doubt this may be true, in a general sense. But a March 25 Jerusalem Post article "Charges of civilian shootings false" by Yaakov Lappin – which appeared just before this column's deadline – cast doubt on the veracity of the charges and raised questions about the media frenzy that surrounded the allegations.

Lappin wrote: "Allegations that IDF soldiers deliberately shot and killed Palestinian civilians in Gaza during Operation Cast Lead have been found to be categorically untrue in official army investigations, an IDF source told the Jerusalem Post on [March 25]." The investigation (which as of that date had not been officially released) found that the soldiers who had made the claims in both cases had not witnessed the events they described but had based their reports on rumours. Moreover, further inquiry ruled out that events had occurred as depicted. An IDF source remarked to Lappin: "Unfortunately, due to competition, sections of the press picked up this story and ran with it. It is a shame the media promoted this sort of spin all over the world."

Lappin concluded: "It is unlikely the damage to Israel's image from the allegations can be repaired, irrespective of the results of the investigation, he noted."

Rabbis share recipes for holiday

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Three Toronto rabbis shared some of their favourite Passover recipes with The CJN. All the dishes are vegetarian, from Sephardi eggs that are noteworthy for their visual appeal, to a vegan main dish and a décadent chocolate mousse cake.

SEPHARDI MARBLED EGGS

Rabbi Cory Weiss of Temple Har Zion uses this recipe for his family's seder. He has adapted it from a number of different methods he has tried. "I put them in a glass bowl, because they're beautiful," he says, referring to the marblized surface of the boiled eggs. "Everybody in my family loves them." He usually makes two dozen; any leftovers are used for egg salad.

18-24 eggs
2-3 sliced onions onion skins
water
salt and pepper

When you go to the supermarket for onions, collect as many onion skins as you can from the bins of yellow and red onions at the store.

In a large pot, place a layer of onion slices and skins, then a layer of eggs. Add another layer of onion, skins and eggs, and top with more onion skins. Cover with cold water, add some salt and pepper, and turn on the heat to medium-high. Cover the pot.

Boil for 2 to 3 hours. (You can't overcook these, no matter how hard you try!)

After 2 to 3 hours, remove the eggs and gently crack the shells with the back of a spoon. Put them back in the pot and boil another 2 to 3 hours. Add more water as necessary to cover.

Cool the eggs, shell and serve with lemon wedges, salt and pepper.

'EXODUS MEMORIES' RATATOUILLE SERVED OVER QUINOA

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, and her family are all vegetarians. They suggest this vegan main dish to make vegetarians feel included at the seder. At a dairy seder, they recommend sprinkling it generously with Parmesan cheese just as you bring it to the table. Rabbi Goldstein and her family like to joke that the recipe has many of the foods the Israelites grumbled about, when they remembered "getting it for free" in Egypt!

Chocolate mousse pie as seen in passover by design by Susie Fishbein, ARTSCROLL/ SHAAR PRESS publishers.

1 cup quinoa
2 cups water
3 cloves garlic, minced
1 large leek, chopped
5 tbsp. olive oil
1 large eggplant, trimmed and cut lengthwise into 1/2-inch cubes
1/2 cup tomato sauce, soup stock or water with bouillon
1 large green or yellow zucchini, trimmed and cut lengthwise into 1/2-inch cubes
1 medium yellow or orange bell pepper, stem, seeds and ribs removed, cut in cubes
1/2 lb. fresh cremini or button mushrooms, halved
3 ripe Roma tomatoes, cubed
salt and pepper to taste
the "secret:" 1/2 tsp. of harissa (Sephardi hot sauce), OR 1/4 tsp. cayenne pepper, OR 1/2 small chopped jalepeño pepper for added zip!
2 tbsp. minced fresh basil leaves
2 tbsp. minced fresh parsley leaves
1 cup toasted pine nuts or other nut pieces

Lazar Yitzchok Glatt Kosher Meats

Lazar Yitzchok Glatt Kosher Meats and the Bielak Family would like to send best wishes from our family to yours at this Passover season.

As you may have noticed, fresh Lazar products have continued to arrive daily at your local stores, despite our recent announcement that we were suspending operations.

Truthfully, the public outcry at our decision to stop producing kosher products forced us to re-evaluate our decision and to continue, without interruption, to produce some of Toronto's finest kosher meats and fine food products.

We continue to support Toronto's Jewish community with the same commitment that you have shown us for so many years!

Sweet ending to seder meal

Quinoa: Rinse quinoa by running fresh water over the quinoa in a pot. Drain. Put quinoa and 2 cups water in 1-1/2 qt. saucepan; bring to boil. Reduce heat to simmer; cover and cook until all water is absorbed (10 to 15 minutes).

Ratatouille: Heat olive oil until sizzling. Fry the leek. When it has begun to soften and brown, add the minced garlic. Stir until the garlic is cooked but not burned! Add eggplant and sauce or stock and saute for 5 minutes until softened. Add zucchini, pepper, mushrooms and tomatoes until cooked. Add the "secret" and salt and pepper to taste. Place cooked quinoa in a bowl and pile the ratatouille over it. Garnish with minced basil, parsley and nuts. If serving with dairy, sprinkle grated parmesan generously over the top.

Serves four hungry vegetarians as a main meal, or 6 to 8 as a side dish.

APPLE-MATZAH KUGEL

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, senior rabbi of Beth Tzedec Congregation, shared two recipes. The kugel is a favourite side dish at his family seder. It serves 6 to 8 and is easy to double.

4 matzot
3 eggs, beaten
1/2 tsp salt
1/4 cup pareve margarine, melted
1/2 cup sugar
1 tsp cinnamon
1/2 cup ground or chopped nuts (they like almonds)
2 to 3 apples, peeled, and chopped
1/2 cup raisins, if desired

Soak matzot in water to soften. Drain.

Beat eggs, salt, sugar, margarine and cinnamon, add to matzot and beat. Add chopped nuts, apples and raisins, if using.

Place in 8x8-inch square or 8-inch round pan. Drizzle margarine on surface. Bake at 350 for 40 to 50 minutes or until surface is lightly browned.

CHOCOLATE MOUSSE CAKE

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl adapted a Craig Claiborne recipe for this Pesach dessert. He says it is VERY rich.

10 eggs, separated
1 cup sugar
6 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, melted and cooled
1/8 cup melted margarine .
2 cups ground nuts

Preheat oven to 350. Beat yolks and sugar until lemon coloured. Fold in melted chocolate, margarine and nuts.

Retain one-quarter of this mixture on side.

Beat egg whites until they form peaks. Fold into chocolate mixture. Place in a 10-inch springform pan. Bake at 350 for 45 to 60 minutes, until surface bounces back.

After cooling, place remaining chocolate mixture on top. Cool in refrigerator.

Traditional dishes with a fresh twist

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When Jayne Cohen and her sister returned home for their first Passover after their grandmother had died, they were determined to recreate the holiday dishes they had grown up on. But neither had ever attempted these traditional recipes. They had been Grandma's province.

"We had never thought to copy down her recipes," Cohen lamented. "That first Passover without my grandmother we shared a secret suspicion that allowing her foods to vanish from our table meant losing something much greater and more vital. And we could not bear another loss."

Together the sisters experimented with recipes, using cookbooks for inspiration, questioning and reinterpreting, just as the rabbis through the ages have questioned and reinterpreted the meanings of biblical texts, she said.

"We decided to make foods familiar enough to taste like Passover, yet still be fresh and inventive. Dishes reimagined so that they reflected our changing palates and insatiable culinary curiosity."

Cohen's first project was Grandma's matzah balls. This was especially poignant as she remembered how her little grandma used to whip up an extra batch for her to nibble on while she prepared the Passover plate.

Using the recipe on the matzah meal box as a guide, Cohen played with variations, adding wild onions and herbs.

That Passover experiment led Cohen on a decades-long quest to preserve these timeless family recipes before they disappear, while updating them with new flavour profiles.

The result is Jewish Holiday Cooking: A Food Lover's Classics and Improvisations (Wiley), with nearly 300 classic and contemporary recipes for all the holidays that unite old and new traditions. In each chapter, Cohen provides a history of the holiday as well as touching personal narratives chronicling her own family's experiences and celebrations.

"You walk a fine line trying to make foods familiar enough to taste like Passover, yet still be fresh and innovative," said Cohen by phone from her home in New York. "You don't want to wind up with something very 'chef-y.'

Passover Food Ideas

Try new ingredients and new techniques

"People say, 'How could you touch the sacred?' But when you look at how Jewish food has evolved throughout the ages, as has its ritual, people are constantly using new ingredients and new techniques, which have kept the cuisine vital and the traditions vital. We're all sophisticated these days in terms of taste – heavy food is not appealing to us – we have to keep it fresh and exciting."

Case in point: the iconic chicken soup and matzah balls of her grandmother's day gets a flavour makeover with asparagus and shiitake mushrooms and is served with roasted fennel matzah balls, a dish she calls her "free-wheeling ode to spring."

"Just as they delay until Rosh Hashanah their first tastes of the sweet new autumn fruits, so many Jews wait until Passover to savour the tender new vegetables of spring," she writes.

And for many eastern European Jews, what would the holiday be without brisket? Cohen's Braised Brisket with Thirty-Six Cloves of Garlic takes this traditional dish to another level, both gastronomically and philosophically.

"It's my pun on the classic French chicken with 40 cloves of garlic," she noted. "All that feisty garlic turns sweet and mellow with gentle braising. When pureed, it forms a seductive gravy, which is finished with a zing of chopped raw garlic and lemon zest."

And why 36 and not 40? "According to Jewish tradition, each letter of the alphabet stands for a number," she explained. "The numeric value of the word chai, meaning 'life' in Hebrew, is 18, making it a magical number. We always consider it a number for good luck, and that's why gifts are given in multiples of eighteen. Thirty-six is double chai."

This dish has particular significance for Cohen, because she served it in Paris at the first seder she ever hosted, while visiting her daughter Alex, who was studying there. "We always have first-night seder with my sister and second night with my sister-in-law. While I cook and bring some things, I had never hosted a seder myself."

Alex's friend and boyfriend joined the festivities. "I once read that a guest at a holiday table is a gift for the family, because then the family looks at all the traditions; listens to the songs and the stories, as if for the first time," Cohen writes. "We began the service by blessing the children. But as the seder unfolded, we felt blessed as well."

Different twist on traditional soup

Soup

7 cups homemade chicken broth
1/4 lb. fresh shiitake mushrooms, stems removed and reserved for another use or discarded, caps wiped clean with a damp paper towel and thinly sliced
12 to 15 thin asparagus spears, trimmed and cut into 1-inch pieces

Preheat oven to 400. Cut off fennel stalks and reserve for another use (excellent for fish broths and stews). If there are some attractive feathery fronds, set aside about 2 tbsp. of them to garnish the soup. Quarter fennel bulbs and trim away the stems, the bottom hard core, and any tough parts.

Choose a shallow baking pan just large enough to fit the fennel in one layer and put in 1 tbsp. of the oil. Add fennel and toss until well coated. Roast fennel until pale gold, about 20 minutes, then turn over and roast 10 minutes longer. Stir in broth, garlic, salt and pepper to taste, and 1/2 tsp. of the thyme. Cover pan with foil and cook 35 to 45 minutes longer, or until fennel is very soft.

Remove foil, stir, and roast for a few more minutes to evaporate most of liquid. Transfer fennel and garlic to a food processor and chop coarsely. Add remaining 1/4 tsp. of thyme, salt (it will need about 1 teaspoon), pepper to taste, and fennel seeds, if using. With the machine on, add the remaining 1 tablespoon oil through the feed tube.

Scrape mixture into large bowl. You need 1 cup of purée, so nosh on any extra. Whisk in eggs, one at a time. Add matzah meal and stir well. If you can form a lump into a very soft walnut-size ball (the batter will become firmer when you chill it), don't add any more matzah meal. If necessary, add just enough matzah meal to enable you to do so. Refrigerate for at least 2 or up to 4 hours so the matzah meal can drink in the liquid and seasoning.

When ready to cook, bring 4 quarts water and 1 tablespoon of salt to a rapid boil in a large, wide pot with a lid. Dipping your hands into cold water if needed, roll batter into walnut-size balls. When all the balls are rolled and the water is boiling furiously, turn the heat down to a gentle boil. Carefully slide in the balls one at a time and cover the pot tightly.

Turn heat down to a simmer, and cook over low heat for 30 minutes, without removing the cover. (They will cook by direct heat as well as by steam, which makes them puff and swell, and lifting the lid will allow some of that steam to escape.) Take out a dumpling and cut it in half. It should be light, fluffy and completely cooked through. If it isn't, continue cooking a few more minutes.

Remove the balls gently with a skimmer or large slotted spoon – they are too fragile to pour into a colander.

When the matzah balls are almost ready, start the soup: Bring the broth to a simmer in a large pot.

Add the matzah balls, mushrooms and asparagus and simmer for about 5 minutes, until the vegetables are tender. Using a slotted spoon, transfer the matzah balls to shallow soup bowls and ladle the hot soup and the vegetables over them. Garnish with the reserved chopped fennel fronds.

Notes: You can cook the matzah balls up to 2 to 3 hours in advance. Drain them and cover with some broth to keep them moist before setting them aside until you are ready to reheat them. Experiment making matzah balls with a purée of other vegetables, such as beets, carrots, leeks, mushrooms or shallots. Roasted vegetables absorb less moisture than boiled or steamed ones (and therefore require less matzah meal, making them lighter). They are also more flavourful. Makes about 8 servings.

How do you make matzah brei?

By DEBORAH DAVIS
Special to The CJN

There is an old saying, "Two Jews, three opinions." Every family has its own way of making matzah brei. Is it salty or sweet? Mushy or crunchy? Do you use small pieces or large? Do you fry it in butter or oil? More like French toast or more like an omelet?

If you prefer your french toast or omelets cooked in butter rather than oil, then you will probably prefer your matzah brei cooked in butter. There are also different types of matzah to choose from: the traditional, hand-made, shmura matzah, or the machine-made flavours – plain, whole-wheat, organic, egg, onion, garlic, poppyseed, chocolate, fruit juice and other varieties. (Note that not all of these varieties are kosher for Passover.) Some people bake their own matzah. In the 1920s, in Europe, matzah was delivered to homes in a horse and buggy in round, blue boxes shaped like hat boxes.

Some Jews do not eat matzah brei, or any other matzah that has come in contact with water, until the last day of Passover. There is a concern that if matzah comes in contact with water, it might rise.

But when you do have it, try out each of these recipes and see which matzah brei suits your home.

Each recipe serves two. They can be doubled, tripled, etc., to meet your family's needs.

The PICKLE BARREL

The best of brisket

Preheat oven to 325. Drop garlic cloves into small saucepan of boiling water; leave in water 30 seconds. Drain immediately. Peel as soon as garlic is cool enough to handle. Set aside on paper towels to dry.

Heat olive oil over medium-high heat in heavy-bottomed roasting pan or flameproof casserole large enough to accommodate meat in one layer. Use two burners, if necessary. Add brisket and brown well on both sides, about 10 minutes. Transfer brisket to platter and set aside. (Or brown meat under the broiler: Place brisket, fat side up, on a foil-lined broiler pan under a preheated broiler. Broil for 5 to 6 minutes on each side, until browned. Don't allow it to develop a hard, dark crust, which might make the meat tough or bitter. Move the meat around as necessary, so it sears evenly.)

Pour off all but about 1 tablespoon of fat remaining in pan and add the garlic cloves. Cook over medium heat, stirring occasionally, until the garlic edges are tinged with gold. Add the vinegar and deglaze the pan, scraping up all the browned bits from the bottom with a wooden spoon. Add stock, thyme and rosemary sprigs, and reduce heat to a simmer. Salt and pepper brisket to taste on all sides, and add it to the pan, fat side up. Spoon garlic cloves over meat.

Place brisket in oven, cover (if you have no lid, use heavy-duty foil), and cook, basting every half-hour, until the meat is fork tender, 2-1/2 to 3 hours or longer. (As the meat cooks, periodically check that the liquid is bubbling gently.

If it is boiling rapidly, turn the oven down to 300 degrees. The brisket tastes best if it is allowed to rest, reabsorbing the juices lost during braising, and it's easiest to de-fat the gravy if you prepare the meat ahead and refrigerate it until the fat solidifies. That is the method I use (given here), but the gravy can be prepared by skimming the fat in the traditional way, if you prefer. If you go that route though, do let the meat rest in the pan sauce for at least an hour.

Cool the brisket in the pan sauce, cover well with foil, and refrigerate until the fat congeals. Scrape off all solid fat. Remove the brisket from the pan and slice thinly across the grain.

Prepare gravy: Bring braising mixture to room temperature, then strain it, reserving the garlic and discarding the thyme and rosemary sprigs. Skim and discard as much fat as possible from the liquid. Purée about half of the cooked garlic with 1 cup of the de-fatted braising liquid in a food processor or a blender. (If you want a smooth gravy, purée all of the cooked garlic cloves.)

Transfer the puréed mixture, the remaining braising liquid, and the rest of the cooked garlic to a skillet. Add the chopped rosemary, minced garlic, and lemon zest. Boil down the gravy over high heat, uncovered, to desired consistency. Taste and adjust the seasoning. Rewarm the brisket in the gravy until heated through.

Arrange sliced brisket on a serving platter. Spoon some of the hot gravy all over the meat and pass the rest in a separate sauceboat. Yield: 8 generous servings.

Pesach recipe substitutes

At some point during Pesach preparations, we've all tried to convert a mainstream recipe for Pesach, only to discover that we don't know what to substitute for a chametz ingredient. To help with this panic moment, here is a list of Passover substitutes. There are some new ones this year.

- 1 oz. baking chocolate (unsweetened chocolate) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1 tbsp. oil or melted margarine
- 16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2-2/3 tbsp. oil and 4-1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender
- 1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1 cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover nondairy creamer. Stir and steep 5 minutes
- butter in baking or cooking – use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts and a bit less salt
- 1 cup honey = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water
- 1 cup corn syrup = 1-1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy
- 1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar
- 1 cup flour – substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together
- 1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch
- 1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch
- 1 tsp. cream of tartar = 1-1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1-1/2 tsp. vinegar
- 1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal
- 1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzahs ground in a food processor
- 1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted
- 3 crumbled matzahs = 2 cups matzah farfel
- 1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine
- chicken fat or gribenes = 2 caramelized onions: sauté 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.
- 1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water
- 1-1/4 cup sweetened condensed milk =1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tablespoons margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.
- 1 cup wine = 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.
- for frying: instead of chicken fat, use combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.

Matzah brei: sweet and salty

FRENCH TOAST-STYLE MATZAH BREI: SWEET AND SALTY

Provided by Brett Goldberg

4 sheets matzah
water
4 eggs
2 tbsp. pancake syrup
4 drops vanilla
1/4 tsp. kosher salt
4 tbsp. butter or oil for frying

Break the matzah into different size pieces in a large bowl. Boil enough water to just cover the matzah in the bowl. (The amount of water will depend on the size of the bowl and the amount of matzah.)

Pour the water over the matzah. After 15-20 seconds, strain as much water as possible without crushing the matzah. Set aside.

In a separate bowl, beat the eggs. Add the syrup, vanilla and kosher salt. Pour this liquid mixture over the strained matzah. Gently mix and fold in.

Fry over medium-high heat in butter or oil, depending on preference. Keep stirring so that it remains in pieces. Fry until golden brown, glistening and slightly wet. Serve with maple syrup. Sprinkle a little kosher salt.

Variations:

- break the matzah into tiny pieces, large pieces, or use the whole sheet of matzah.
- use milk instead of water
- skip the maple syrup
- skip the vanilla
- skip the salt
- use Celtic salt
- add sugar and/or cinnamon to the mixture
- sprinkle with sugar and/or cinnamon
- serve with honey or another sugary syrup
- serve with jelly or jam

OMELET-STYLE MATZAH BREI

2 sheets of matzah
water
4 eggs
1/2 onion
salt and pepper to taste
4 tbsp. butter or oil for frying

Grate the onion. Set aside. Break the matzah into tiny pieces in a large bowl. Boil enough water to just cover the matzah in the bowl. (The amount of water will depend on the size of the bowl, and the amount of matzah.) Leave it soaking in the bowl for a few minutes. Drain the matzah.

Add the onion, egg, salt and pepper. Mix. Fry over medium-high heat in butter or oil, depending on preference. Cook until egg is solid (like an omelet). Serve with sour cream.

Variations:

- use milk instead of water
- use other favourite omelet ingredients: green chile, bell pepper, mushroom, cheese, etc.
- serve with applesauce, ketchup, maple syrup, or jelly.

After the pre-Passover 'plagues'…

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

In silent awe, the shoppers gaze skyward at the towering display of matzah. It never fails to impress, this feat of engineering. (Has anyone ever seen how supermarkets do it?) And it seems to grow higher each year, with new varieties like organic and spelt.

"Can you believe these prices?" someone grumbles. No, but compared to what?

A yiddene, trying to avert a rude brush with the law of physics, asks me to reach for a box on high. Happily I oblige, while stifling the urge to give the Leaning Tower of Manischewitz a good poke and bring it all tumbling down. Ah, perchance to dream on a bed of egg, tea and whole wheat matzah, and sleep – till the holiday is over.

Actually, Pesach is my favourite holiday; it's the getting there that hurts. But after collapsing head-first into my seder plate for a snooze, I'm refreshed and ready to enjoy. After all, matzah is the only food group equally at home as stuffing for turkey or a blanket for chocolate.

But right now, who can fantasize about recipes when you're the walking wounded?

So, in the spirit of the Haggadah's plagues, I offer the 10 "makkot" (plagues) of cleaning the house for Passover.

- Broken/chipped fingernails: On an injury scale of one to 10 – zip. They'll grow back. Or, bite them off and bypass breakage altogether.
- Head bumps: Gives new meaning to the Yiddish expression "shlog der kop in vant arayn" ("bang your head against the wall"). Cupboard doors that are well-behaved all year magically open when you're not looking, just for spite.
- Weight gain: Rewards must be a perk of the job in this marathon cleanup – think bags of Pesach coconut-covered marshmallows.
- Malnutrition: Don't confuse with weight loss. Caused by a dwindling food supply and a designated cleaner too tired to cook a nutritious dinner. Upside? Eating hot dogs and other quick and dirty stuff otherwise shunned during the year.
- Falling: This is no joke, and all I can say is, get it over with early (preferably before Purim) so you can jump back on that stepladder without losing your nerve.
- Bruising: What happens when you fall. Cellulite on your thighs getting you down? Wait till you see cellulite splattered with borscht-coloured bruises.
- Cuts: A consequence of "haste makes waste." Bandaging a severe gash on my thumb, my husband, who works in a hospital, is reassuring until I hear the words "possible nerve damage." Thank you, Dr. Kildare.

Substitutes work well

- eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz egg substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes, the recipes will probably be ok. However, if you want to avoid them, you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.
- Italian seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/8 tsp. rubbed dried sage. This can be substituted for 1-1/2 tsp. Italian seasoning.
- curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger. Makes 2/3 cup.
- pancake syrup – use fruit jelly, not jam, and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.
- seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt. Mix to combine. Makes 1/4 cup
- flavoured vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades.
- water chestnuts – substitute raw jicama
- orange liqueur – substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate
- You can mince the tops of green onions and use them in recipes that call for chives or use celery tops instead of parsley (who are we kidding, we always have parsley during Pesach)

Soy sauce substitute

This soy sauce substitute doesn't taste exactly like the real thing, but it makes a flavourful alternative for Pesach stir fry.

2 tbsp. beef broth
1 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1 tsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. oil
1/8 tsp. garlic powder
black pepper to taste
1/4 cup boiling water

Combine all the ingredients. At this point, you can either use the sauce as is, leaving for an hour to give the flavours a chance to blend; or, for a thicker, richer sauce, boil the liquid until it is reduced by half, to about 3 tbsp. Store in a sealed container in the refrigerator. Makes 2/3 cup. Use the sauce within 3 or 4 days.

If anyone has any other substitutions they would like to share please let Eileen Goltz know at ztlog@verizon.net.

Fruits are even sweeter when combined

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I've always said that compote is sort of like a cholent but with fruit. While the description might have some merit, I know I have to modify the statement a little, since the following compote recipes are a tad more elegant than cholent and a whole lot sweeter.

For those who've never heard of or tasted this homemade treat, compote is a sweetened, usually cooked combination of fruit (fresh and/or dried), served with the syrup it's cooked in. Compotes are typically seasoned with spices like cinnamon or nutmeg and can be served at breakfast, lunch or dinner.

These recipes for compote plus the ones that are for elegant, cooked fruit desserts are all perfect for Pesach, most are pareve and can be served year round.

Oh, before we get to the recipes, I should mention that the biggest benefit to serving compote is that it's been known to counteract the – how shall I say this? – "binding effect" that matzah has on many a digestive tract. Happy eating.

BAKED FRUIT COMPOTE

1 can apricot halves, drained
1 can pear halves, drained
1 can whole plums, drained, halved and pitted
1 can peach halves, drained
1 can pineapple slices, undrained
1/3 cup packed brown sugar
1 tbsp. butter or margarine
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground cloves

Preheat oven to 350. In a greased 9x13-in. baking pan, starting at the 9-in. end, arrange rows of fruit in the following order: half of the apricots, pears and plums, all of the peaches, then remaining apricots, pears and plums. Drain pineapple, reserving 1/2 cup of juice. Lay pineapple over fruit in pan. In a saucepan, combine the pineapple juice, brown sugar, butter, cinnamon and cloves. Cook and stir until sugar is dissolved and butter is melted. Pour the liquid mixture over the fruit. Bake, uncovered, for 20 to 25 minutes or until heated through. Serves 12 to 14.

SIMPLE APPLESAUCE COMPOTE

1/2 cup applesauce
1 1/2 cups fresh cranberries
1/2 cup sweet red wine
1/2 cup apple juice
1/3 cup sugar
1 1-in. slice lemon rind strip
4 cups sliced peeled Golden delicious apple
2 cups firm-Anjou pears, cored and cut into 1/4-inch thick wedges (about 3/4 pound)

Preheat oven to 400 and grease a 9x13-in. baking pan. Spoon applesauce onto several layers of heavy-duty paper towels lining a colander. Cover with additional paper towels; let stand 5 minutes. Scrape the applesauce into a bowl. In a saucepan, combine the cranberries, wine, juice, sugar and rind and bring the mixture to a simmer, stirring occasionally.

Remove the liquid from heat; stir in the applesauce. Combine the apple and pears and put them in the prepared pan. Pour the cranberry mixture over the top of the apple mixture. Cover and bake for 25 minutes. Uncover and bake an additional 10 minutes or until fruit is tender, basting occasionally with liquid from dish. Remove the rind. Serves 8 to 10.

Cook by instinct and taste

• Sleeplessness: The bigger the head start on cleaning, the more likely you're fretting at 2 a.m. that two weeks is insufficient to do one kitchen.
• Nightmares: For when you finally fall asleep, with two recurring themes: 1) The doorbell rings, seder guests arrive but the Pesach dishes are still in the basement. 2) The doorbell rings and two tons of matzah are delivered to your door because you forgot to close out a matzah futures contract. On waking, you realize there's no such thing as matzah futures but think it would make a fun addition to commodities trading.
• Electric shock. What happened to a newlywed who used steel wool (instead of common sense) on a stove's electrical outlet – 32 years later, I can still conjure the feeling of being zapped. Hint: always use a sponge.

* * *

I'm not real big on recipes during the year, so why should Pesach be any different? Feel and instinct are my guides in the kitchen. But I am fond of Pesach grub, so here are some suggestions for what makes it extra batampt (flavourful), chez nous.

• Toss six pitted prunes or a handful of raisins into a pot of tomato-cabbage borscht as it cooks. Fresh dill clinches it.
• Don't throw out that bag of radishes from the seders. Grate them, add a chopped English cucumber, a dash of salt, a good pinch of black pepper, a teaspoon of oil and fresh lemon juice.
• The Mashed Potato was a dance step in the rockin' '60s. Here's my Pesach version: mash 3-4 cooked red or Yukon gold potatoes while warm; saute a small diced onion and a box of small brown (or 2-3 large Portabello) mushrooms, sliced or chopped, in a little water with a half teaspoon of paprika. To the potatoes add salt and pepper to taste (an extra shake of paprika doesn't hurt), chill slightly, then shape into big patties and brown in a pan shpritzed with Pesach cooking oil spray. A simple dish taken to the next level.
• Add half of a tin of kosher for Passover jellied cranberries to a pot of meatballs for stewing. Use more or less cranberries depending on the number of meatballs.
• Pesach salads aren't the same since the wonderful, eggy-rich Mother's brand mayonnaise disappeared. Now, I just buy a tub or two of Pesach coleslaw, toss with steamed carrots and cauliflower, adding leftover roast veal. Good for lunch.
• Grate – don't cut – fixings like zucchini, carrots and potatoes into a vegetable soup that starts with a packaged base. If you are so inclined, add fresh dill or Italian parsley.

Sudan has become playground for terror groups

By ZVI BAR'EL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Did the recent truck convoys making their way from Port Sudan to Egypt carry weapons from Iran, China or Russia – Sudan's three major arms suppliers? The prime suspect is Iran, which has been strengthening its ties with Sudan ever since President Omar Hassan al-Bashir took power in a military coup in 1989.

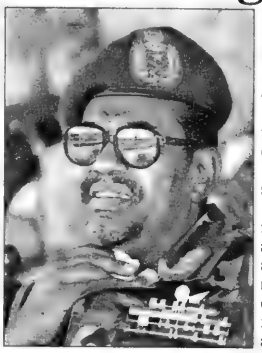
Iranian Defence Minister Mustafa Muhammad Najar visited Sudan last month and signed a series of military cooperation agreements. Among other things, Iran's army will now train Sudanese military cadets and Iran will provide Sudan with advanced weapons. In 2006, al-Bashir visited Iran, declared the friendship between the two states strong and said Sudan's army was "willing to put itself at the disposal of Iranian instructors."

Arab sources report that Sudan allows Hezbollah to operate in its territory, including by purchasing arms both for the organization's own use and for Hamas. Since some areas of Sudan are not under the central government's control, international terror organizations see it as a convenient playground.

Sudan is one of the poorest countries in the world, with an average per capita income of about $200. Its legal system is based on Islamic religious law. However, it maintains relatively good ties with the American intelligence community. Sudan hosted terrorist Osama Bin Laden for years, until he left it in 1996 for Afghanistan. But after the Sept. 11 attacks, Khartoum offered to co-operate with the United States and allowed CIA agents to operate in its territory.

In exchange, then-president George W. Bush lifted many of the sanctions that had been imposed on Sudan and praised the intelligence co-operation with Khartoum. Some of the sanctions were reimposed in 2004, following the outbreak of the war in Darfur. But the United States is maintaining its diplomatic ties with Sudan to preserve the reconciliation agreement between north and south, for which Sudan won U.S. assistance worth $360 million.

In 1995, after an assassination attempt on Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak while he was visiting Addis Ababa, Mubarak accused Sudan of responsibility for the attack and urged the Sudanese people to topple the regime. Egypt also gave asylum to former Sudanese president Jaffer Numeiri until al-Bashir permitted his return.



Omar al-Bashir

Egypt is nevertheless careful to maintain correct relations with Sudan, to ensure that it does not damage the Nile, Egypt's life source, and that the peace agreement between northern and southern Sudan does not damage Egypt's interests. Yet Cairo is also watching the increasingly close relationship between Iran and Sudan with alarm, seeing it as a threat.

The International Criminal Court recently issued a warrant for al-Bashir's arrest on charges of planning and committing genocide. Al-Bashir has thus far scoffed at the warrant, and this week, he visited Mubarak to seek Arab backing against it. Egyptian sources said he also consulted Mubarak about the strike on the arms convoys and sought his help to improve Sudan's relations with Washington.

Remembering the Past, Shaping the Future

Israel disputes number of civilian deaths in Gaza

JTA

JERUSALEM — Some 25 per cent of Palestinians killed in Operation Cast Lead were civilians, the Israel Defence Forces said.

The research department of Israel Defence Intelligence identified 1,166 Palestinians killed during Israel's three-week military operation in Gaza in December and January. Of them, 709 were identified as operatives of Hamas or other terrorist groups and 295 were identified as "uninvolved Palestinians." The IDF said another 162 had not yet been conclusively identified one way or the other. Of the "uninvolved Palestinians" killed, 89 were under the age of 16 and 49 were women.

The figures were gathered following the examination of various intelligence sources and were cross-referenced, the IDF said

Palestinian officials claim that 1,417 people were killed, including more than 900 civilians.

"The IDF wishes to emphasize that its objective during Operation Cast Lead was to target the Hamas terror organization and not the citizens of the Gaza Strip," the IDF spokesman's office said. "It must be stressed that the fighting took place in a complex battlefield, defined by the Hamas terror organization itself. The Hamas terror organization placed the primary fighting scene at the heart of civilian neighborhoods as it booby-trapped homes, fired from schools, and used civilians as human shields."

Efforts to identify the remaining dead are continuing.

The fatality list presented by the Palestinian Health Ministry in Gaza has numerous inaccuracies and contradictions, the IDF says. For example, Tawfiq Ja'abari, the commander of the Hamas police, and Mohammed Shakshak, a personal assistant to the head of Hamas' military wing, Ahmed Ja'abari, are both described as dead children on the Palestinian list

IDF calls off investigation

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Military Advocate General Brig.-Gen. Avichai Mendelblit on Monday instructed the military police investigation unit to close the investigation into soldiers' accounts of alleged misconduct and serious violations of the army's rules of engagement during its operation in Gaza.

In a press release issued Monday, the army said that the preliminary military police investigation into the testimonies revealed that they "were based on rumours, and not first-hand experience."

The probe was launched late last month after Israeli soldiers were quoted as telling a military cadet academy that combat troops in Gaza fired at unarmed Palestinian civilians and vandalized property during Operation Cast Lead. The army has barred those soldiers from speaking to the press.

The testimonies include a description by an infantry squad leader of an incident in which an Israel Defence Forces sharpshooter mistakenly shot a Palestinian mother and her two children.

Another squad leader from the same brigade told of an incident in which the company commander ordered that an elderly Palestinian woman be shot and killed. She was said to be walking on a road about 100 metres from a house that the company had commandeered.

News reports that surfaced after the alleged actions of IDF soldiers in Gaza were first publicized suggested the allegations were based on second-hand, not eyewitness, accounts.

How to attract Birthright alumni?

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — Nearly 160,000 young people from North America have taken part in Taglit-Birthright Israel, a 10-day free Israel trip aimed at revving up their Jewish identity.

Of those no longer in college, only half have attended any Jewish event since their return. Toronto has had the greatest success at keeping this population somewhat engaged, with 63 per cent of returnees participating in at least one Jewish event.

That's one of the findings of Tourists, Travelers and Citizens, a new report by the Cohen Center of Modern Jewish Studies at Brandeis University. The report is based on interviews with and online surveys of 1,534 Birthright alumni in New York, Los Angeles, San Francisco and Toronto, the four largest Jewish communities in North America.

Report co-author Fern Chertok attributes Toronto's success to the city's Jewish community, which keeps Birthright returnees apprised of a well-planned schedule of Jewish programs.

But other North American cities aren't enjoying the same results.

The Birthright program was instituted in 2000 by philanthropists concerned about what they perceived as the younger generation's lack of Jewish involvement. Numerous formal and informal evaluations show participants' connection to Israel and the Jewish community are enhanced by their trip, but that does not translate into ongoing Jewish involvement, according to the new report.

In New York, where 43 per cent of returnees have not attended any Jewish program since their Israel trip, researchers found an array of Jewish offerings but little effort to let Birthright alumni know about them. Asked whether they had even heard of a dozen Jewish organizations offering programs for their age, 67 per cent said they knew of the JCC Manhattan and the 92nd Street and 14th Street Y's, but just 20 per cent had attended events there. Other Jewish programs showed even less participation and were less well known.

Los Angeles showed the greatest number of completely disengaged alumni, with 53per cent saying they had attended no Jewish programs since Israel. San Francisco had higher numbers taking part in one to four activities – 43 per cent and 10 per cent, respectively.

Both California cities are hampered by a lack of good programs, the report's authors say. Those that exist are high profile and do draw crowds.

The alumni surveyed in all four cities said they would like to be more involved in Jewish life. Most preferred small gatherings to large, anonymous "meat market" Jewish events.

Respondents also said they were interested in learning more about Judaism and Jewish culture and history, including Hebrew, but were wary of outreach groups with a perceived "religious" agenda. They also wanted a network of friends to share those experiences to re-create the camaraderie they felt on their Israel trips.

"Birthright shows people that being part of a group, a Jewish group, is a meaningful experience," report co-author Leonard Saxe says, but "most communities don't provide them with a set of those experiences."

Birthright NEXT, an organization that tries to steer alumni toward greater Jewish involvement in their communities and has chapters in New York and San Francisco, is taking those tips to heart, its executive director, Daniel Brenner, says.

Last fall, the organization launched NEXT Shabbat, which encourages alumni to host Shabbat meals in their homes. It's a peer-driven project, Brenner says: invitees RSVP online, Birthright NEXT provides resources and recipes on its website, and it picks up the tab after hosts submit feedback.

Government has 30 cabinet ministers

Just before Netanyahu spoke, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert gave his final address to the Knesset, praising Begin for "demonstrating courage in making the fateful decision for peace."

Netanyahu began naming ministers for his incoming government on Monday – a lineup so long that Knesset officials have requested a larger table for cabinet meetings.

The new coalition will have 30 ministers and seven deputy ministers. Netanyahu officially informed acting-Knesset Speaker Michael Eitan on Monday that he had succeeded in assembling the cabinet and was prepared to swear in the new ministers on Tuesday.

Netanyahu held a series of consecutive talks with prospective ministers throughout the day on Monday.

He was expected to take the finance portfolio himself and to appoint Yuval Steinitz as minister under him.

Other Likud officials to join the cabinet include Ya'akov Ne'eman (justice) Gideon Sa'ar (education), Yisrael Katz (transportation), Moshe Ya'alon (strategic affairs), Gilad Erdan (environmental protection), Limor Livnat (sports and culture) and Yuli Edelstein (likely to take media and telecommunications).

Silvan Shalom had reportedly sought the position of finance minister, among other things, saying he would prefer no ministerial post at all if he was not given a senior position.

It is believed Netanyahu intends to appoint Shalom as his deputy prime minister and minister for regional development, or minister for economic peace and deputy prime minister.

Yisrael Beiteinu leader Avigdor Lieberman will be given the position of foreign minister, after Attorney General Menachem Mazuz ruled on Monday that there was no legal reason to bar him from the post. Yisrael Beiteinu will take four additional portfolios in the new government, including public security (Yitzhak Aharonovitch), infrastructure (Uzi Landau), tourism (Stav Miznikov) and absorption and immigration (Sofa Landover).

Labor party chair Ehud Barak will retain his position as defence minister. Avishay Braverman receives Labor's fifth ministerial post as minister without portfolio with responsibility for minorities. Braverman, who was one of the seven Laborites who opposed Barak's move to join the coalition, said after accepting Barak's offer that he was at peace with his decision.

Labour minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer will take on the trade, labour and industry portfolio, Shalom Simhon will serve as agriculture minister, and Labor's No. 2 Isaac Herzog will head the welfare ministry.

Senior Likudniks are reportedly angry that Netanyahu gave so many senior portfolios to his coalition partners and for making them wait until the last minute.

A Netanyahu associate said, however, that "clearly there will be disappointments, but that is the price of a broad, strong, balanced coalition."

The senior coalition partner has only five portfolios: finance, transportation, communications, environmental protection, and culture and sports.

To these, Netanyahu was to add a deputy prime minister and minister for strategic affairs, and to split the Communications Ministry to create a Regional Development Ministry and a Ministry for Economic Peace.

Kadima MK Yohanan Plessner on Monday resubmitted a bill – submitted in the past by Likud MKs Reuven Rivlin and Gideon Sa'ar – to limit the number of cabinet ministers to 18. In his original proposal, drafted prior to the previous Knesset, Sa'ar wrote: "The expense of appointing so many ministers is a waste of crucial public funds."

Olmert cleared in one charge

Ehud Olmert has been cleared by police in one of the corruption investigations against him. The Israel Police national fraud unit said there was insufficient evidence to charge the outgoing prime minister in a corruption scandal involving a home Olmert purchased in Jerusalem for far below market value, according to news reports. Olmert has been under investigation in the matter for the last three years. He was suspected of giving favours to the company that built the home in exchange for the lower purchase price. Olmert denies wrongdoing. Attorney General Menachem Mazuz must still make a final decision to close the case. Police have recommended that Olmert be indicted in two other corruption scandals.

Water champion

Israel was named the world's most efficient recycled water user in a United Nations report, issued in honour of International Water Day, March 22, 2009. The UN report also ranked Israel as a world leader in desalinated water use. Israel purifies and re-uses almost 70 per cent of its waste water each year for agriculture, and much of the leftover water is reused for other purposes.

Most Israelis happy

A majority of Israelis are happy, a new poll says. In a survey on happiness, some 86 per cent of Israelis said they're happy with their lives – 30 per cent said very happy and 56 percent said happy. For married respondents, 53 percent were very happy and 44 per cent happy in their marriage. The survey found those with higher incomes tend to be happier, and that the happiness of married people doesn't increase as much by an increase in income as that of a single person. Immigrants are more likely to be happy than native-born Israelis, the poll found, and the more voluntary the aliyah the happier the immigrant. The survey, conducted by the polling firm Dahaf on behalf of the Jerusalem Institute of Market Studies, questioned 1,006 adult Jewish Israelis.

30-year peace anniversary

Egypt's president reiterated his commitment to peace with Israel on the 30th anniversary of the Egypt-Israel peace deal. The peace treaty was signed by Anwar Sadat and Menachem Begin on March 26, 1979. Speaking by telephone with Israeli President Shimon Peres, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said he has no intention of changing his policies regarding peace with Israel, and that "whoever seeks war has never felt what war really is." Peres expressed his gratitude to Mubarak. An editorial in the Egyptian newspaper Al-Ahram, however, criticized Israel. "There is no room for celebration. On this anniversary, there isn't an atmosphere of optimism, and the facts on the ground are not pushing anyone toward celebration."

Air defence for India

Israel Aerospace Industries will develop and manufacture air defence systems for India. The $1.4-billion contract was officially announced March 26. The deal was signed Feb. 27, Israel's daily business newspaper, Globes, reported.

Another coalition partner

The party Habayit Hayehudi (the Jewish household) signed a deal to join Benjamin Netanyahu's government coalition. The right-wing religious party agreed to join the new government a day after the Labor Party voted to enter the coalition. Habayit Hayehudi will be able to name the head of the science, sport and culture ministry, and will hold the chairmanship of the Knesset Welfare for the Child and the Education committees each for one-third of the government's term in office.

Barbadian man faces murder charges in Schwarzfeld's death

Compiled by CJN Staff

An arrest has been made in the killing of Terry Schwarzfeld, who died in an Ottawa hospital on March 18, about three weeks after she was attacked and robbed on a beach in Barbados.

Curtis Joel Foster, 24, has previously pleaded guilty to robbing five tourists, including a pair from Canada. He must appear in a Barbados court to face murder charges in Schwarzfeld's death.

On Feb. 28, an assailant attacked Schwarzfeld, national president of Canadian Hadassah WIZO, and her daughter-in-law, Luana Cotsman – who is recovering from her injuries – with a wooden plank as they walked on an isolated stretch of beach in the late afternoon.

Schwarzfeld suffered bleeding and swelling on her brain and was taken to a Barbados hospital. She was later airlifted to Ottawa Hospital, were she remained unconscious until she succumbed to her injuries.

Commissioner Darwin Dottin of the Royal Barbados Police Force said that when Foster was arrested, officers recovered jewelry and a camera that belonged to Schwarzfeld and Cotsman.

Mitchell Bellman, president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, said that Schwarzfeld's family, including her husband, Stephen Cotsman, are pleased that an arrest has been made and are hopeful that police have caught the right person.

"Their interests are in seeing justice served and also in preventing further attacks on anyone else," Bellman told the Ottawa Citizen.

AUTHOR SANA KRASIKOV WINS $100,000 SAMI ROHR PRIZE FOR DEBUT SHORT STORY COLLECTION

The U.S.-based Jewish Book Council has named Sana Krasikov as this year's recipient of the $100,000 Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature. Krasikov wins the prize for her debut short story collection, One More Year (Spiegel & Grau), a work that demonstrates "a fresh vision" and a great potential of its young author to contribute to the world of Jewish letters in the future.

The prize is the largest of its kind in the Jewish literary world and one of the largest literary prizes worldwide. Inaugurated in 2006, it goes to emerging fiction and non-fiction authors in alternating years.

One More Year is "a book of exceptional literary merit that stimulates an interest in themes of Jewish concern," the prize committee said in a statement. Krasikov fills her canvas with portraits of new Russian and Georgian immigrants to the United States in the post-Cold War period, conveying a sense of "subtle considerations of moral conundrums, of futile hopes, and the calculus of lost possibility."

Fiction judge Allen Hoffman said her characters are often alienated and confused, but her stories are always clear and precise, because Krasikov deeply understands her characters' aspirations, fears and stubborn passion for survival. "Her elegant, revealing narratives imbue their fragile, vulnerable lives with an imposing dignity."

The Jewish Book Council has also announced it will give the $25,000 Choice Award to Dalia Sofer for her first novel The Septembers of Shiraz (Ecco), which describes the travails of a Jewish family in the period after the Islamic Revolution in Iran. The prize ceremony takes place in Manhattan's Museum of Jewish Heritage in May.

Book Recalls Old "Ward" Neighbourhood: The local small press Exile Editions has produced a handsome, short volume featuring poetry and paintings of Lawren Harris that conveys some rich images of the Ward, the former Toronto neighbourhood where thousands of Jewish immigrants lived about 80 years ago.

Lawren Harris: In the Ward features some of Harris' urban poetry and paintings. The latter includes his renderings of one of the Eaton's factories, old houses in various stages of disrepair, lovely streetscapes, including many covered in snow, and scenes showing the creeping industrialization of residential city neighbourhoods.

The paintings present an exciting window into Harris' pre-Group of Seven career as well as into a central landing ground for many Jewish, Italian and other immigrants to Toronto in the early 1920s. The books is available in many bookstores.

At the Galleries: "Lit City – Toronto Through The Eyes of Artists and Authors" is an exhibition that pairs paintings with excerpts from books written about Toronto neighbourhoods. Works include Linda R. Goldman's painting Brunswick Avenue, which is paired with the book Fables of Brunswick Avenue by Katherine Govier; numerous paintings of Kensington Market are also paired with the book Baldwin Street by Alvin Rakoff. Other artists include Aba Bayefsky and Charles Pachter. The exhibition was mounted to mark Toronto's 175th birthday and continues until June 13. Art exhibit examines the Exodus

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Abstract artist Lena Shugar has examined the biblical Exodus in a series of 13 acrylic and mixed media works.

Shugar's exhibition, The Exodus, at the Leonardo Galleries until April 23, also has personal meaning for her.

In 1939, when she was two years old, Shugar (formerly Bienstock), her parents and her brother fled Stanislav, Poland.

The other passengers on the crowded train they took insisted that her family leave the train when she developed measles. Looking back, she says this saved their lives as the others likely perished.

They survived World War II in a remote farmhouse in Russia, where a Russian family allowed them to remain for the duration of the war.

The family's exodus after the war took them from Russia to a displaced persons' camp in West Berlin. Then they went to Norway, and in 1951, they arrived in Canada, not knowing anyone.

"The Exodus was a turning point in mankind's transition from slavery to freedom, from polytheism and monotheism, from ancient values to modern ideals," Shugar says.

Her Exodus exhibit examines the giving of the Judaic Laws and the entry to the Promised Land.

"My exhibition is an attempt to augment our understanding of ourselves and our place in the world," she says.

Since her first major exhibition in 1990, Shugar's paintings have been included in private and corporate collections in Sweden, Israel, Canada and the United States. Her works have also been used as illustrations for magazine covers, for donation cards and for wine bottle labels.

Her mystical paintings, in acrylic and mixed media, reflect her multi-faceted talents and her expertise with complex colour depictions.

Shortly after her arrival in Toronto as a teenager, Shugar came under the tutelage of Doris McCarthy, one of Canada's foremost artists and teachers.

When the youngest of her three children started school, Shugar volunteered in the creative arts department at Baycrest and returned to her pursuit of a career as a professional artist.

The painting The Crossing is featured in Lena Shugar's Exodus exhibition.

For more information about The Exodus exhibit, call 416-924-7296 or visit www.lenashugar.com. Leonardo Galleries is at 133 Avenue Rd.

Mezmerizing Holocaust film based on a hoax

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Misha Defonseca, an American writer, blasted to literary stardom 12 years ago with an unusual autobiographical book, Misha: A Memoir of the Holocaust Years.

The bestseller, translated into 18 languages, was about a Jewish girl from Brussels who wandered through the forests of Europe, living with wolves in summer and winter, in a desperate attempt to find her deported parents.

In 2001, a Boston newspaper raised questions about its veracity, but she stuck to her story. Last year, however, she admitted that her memoir was based on fantasy, that her real name was Monique de Waal, and that she was a Catholic whose parents had been members of the Belgian resistance movement.

Mathilde Goffart in Surviving with the Wolves.

Vera Belmont's French-language movie, Surviving with the Wolves – which will be screened at the Cinéfranco film festival on Sunday, April 5, at the Royal theatre at 608 College St. – is based on the book rather than on its post-publication controversy.

In light of the furor it ignited, it's questionable why Belmont made the film. But if you treat the book, and the film, as a fable of survival against the greatest of odds, you may understand Belmont's motives.

Still, Misha's epic story of endurance, as portrayed in this invariably gripping film, strains credulity.

How could an eight-year-old girl survive for so long? And more to the point, how did she manage to overcome the natural hostility of the wolves she encountered on her incredible trek from Belgium to Poland?

If you can suspend your skepticism and relate to Surviving with the Wolves as an allegory, you may even appreciate this off-the-beaten-track film.

It opens in Brussels in 1943 as a Jewish family, hidden in an attic, waits to be deported by the Nazis. Misha, a precocious girl, yearns for a normal life and a smile from her worried mother. But as Misha soon discovers, sheer survival is all she can hope for in these terrible and unpredictable times.

After she and her fellow Jewish students are temporarily hidden by a teacher at school, Misha witnesses a roundup of Jews. Shortly afterward, a member of the underground scoops her up and delivers Misha to a Christian family willing to hide and protect her.

Misha is given a new identity, but she is like a fish out of water. She misses her parents and does not feel at home in her new surroundings. She feels considerably better in a farmer's house, but when he and his wife are arrested, Misha embarks on her trip eastward.

The core of the movie turns on Misha's journey, and what a journey it proves to be.

She steals garments from a clothes line, encounters a German patrol, grapples with an unsympathetic farmer, rows across a river in a boat and forages for worms to fend off hunger pangs.

Amid a snow storm, she stumbles, only to be found by a wolf. Rather than attacking Misha, the wolf warms to her, finding food for her and accompanying her on an improbable odyssey.

All this seems utterly implausible, until you remember that Surviving with the Wolves is a tall tale.

Just when you're saturated with Misha's heroic derring-do, you're plunged headlong into more scenes in which she proves her mettle as the ultimate survivor.

The movie is held together by Mathilde Goffart, who portrays Misha in what can only be described as a brilliant performance.

The Israeli actress, Yael Abecassis, plays Misha's mother.

Say what you will about Defonseca's hoax, but the film from which it is adapted is quite mesmerizing.

KlezKanada director aims to bring music to clubs

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jason Rosenblatt, the new artistic director of KlezKanada, wants to bring eastern European Jewish music to the people, to smaller, more heimish venues where it was meant to be played.

Shtreiml founder Jason Rosenblatt, left, is the new artistic director of KlezKanada, headed by founder Hy Goldman, right.

Rosenblatt, a founding member of the klezmer band Shtreiml, has been assigned by KlezKanada founder and chair Hy Goldman to expand the organization's activities and presence in Montreal, and to develop both promising young artists in the genre and audiences that will appreciate it.

This is a new position (part time for now), reflecting Goldman's longtime desire to expand the KlezKanada brand beyond the weeklong summer program in the Laurentians, now in its 14th year. New York-based klezmer musician Jeff Warschauer remains the artistic director of that program, which is held at Camp B'nai Brith every August.

Rosenblatt's vision is to hold regular klezmer concerts throughout the year in the city – not big annual fundraisers, but shows in more intimate clubs, priced within reach of just about everybody.

He's also exploring the possibility of offering introductory klezmer sessions in Jewish and perhaps other schools. He is proposing to explain the history of the music and then play it, in the hope of "sowing the seeds of interest" in children in an art form that goes back centuries and is inextricably linked with Yiddish culture.

Rosenblatt also plans to organize afterschool coaching for budding klezmer players.

For the past few years, Rosenblatt has been living on and off in Philadelphia, where he taught in the city's Young Audiences series, intended to acquaint schoolchildren with music they might not otherwise be exposed to.

Talks are also underway to work with the (McGill) Ghetto Shul – whose rabbi, Leibish Hundert, is a musician – to organize weekly jams in conjunction with KlezKanada to reach a university-age crowd.

Greater visibility of KlezKanada in Montreal might encourage more local promising artists to apply for its camp scholarship program, or younger families who enjoy listening to the music to attend the camp together, Goldman believes.

Both Rosenblatt and his wife, Rachel Lemisch, are "alumni" of KlezKanada's scholarship program, which has grown to encompass 100 recipients each summer, from pre-teens to young adults, from around the world, including a strong contingent from the former Soviet bloc.

Film puts '80s heavy metal band back in the spotlight

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Sometimes, nice guys do finish first.

At least, that's the case with the members of Anvil, the acclaimed Canadian heavy metal group that made a mark with its 1982 album Metal on Metal.

Metal on Metal received acclaim from fans and inspired a generation of heavyweights in the industry. Metallica, Anthrax and Slayer all lauded Anvil as significant musical trailblazers and the album as an inspiration.

Despite the massive praise, however, Anvil was unable, for various reasons, including timing and bad management, to parlay that groundbreaking album into a sustained, successful career.

Flash forward 25 years later to director Sacha Gervasi, a lifelong fan of the group who decided to immortalize them on film as they continued to play their music, all the while hoping for that elusive breakthrough, even as they held mundane jobs in catering and construction.

'There's real good energy about the music'

The film Anvil: The Story of Anvil follows the band as they worked on their 13th album, This is Thirteen, undertook a disastrous tour of eastern Europe and then followed it with a more gratifying one in Japan, one that allowed the film to end an upbeat, hopeful note. It premièred last year at the Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Festival to rave reviews and is now scheduled for commercial release, first in Toronto on April 3, before opening across North America in the weeks to follow. Anvil was also recently inducted into the Indies Hall of Fame, in Toronto, and performed in the city as part of Canadian Music Week.

So what's changed in the year since the movie had its world première at Hot Docs? I asked Steve (Lips) Ludlow and Robb Reiner, the two Jewish members of Anvil – Glenn Five is the third band member – over a nosh at Pancer's Deli, one of their hangouts, which was featured in the film. "Everything," answered Reiner. "We have a real manager, we have a real agent, we have real gigs [and] soon we'll have a real record company." (Sony is handling the group in Japan, but they're hoping to land a major label in North America soon.)

"At times, it's been overwhelming," Reiner said. "There's so much stuff that we're taking in – all the press, all the attention, all the love – there's an abundance of love."

"But we've been working at that for 30 years," Ludlow added, "so it's not like we're not ready for it. We've always believed in our music, in ourselves, all along. That's why we're still here, so even when there was disinterest [in Anvil], we stayed true to our music, lived in our own bubble and kept rocking on."

The two, who with their long hair and leather jackets look like the quintessential rockers, were at ease during the interview. They finished each other's sentences, each jumping in as soon as his bandmate paused, which makes sense as the Torontonians, who are in their early 50s, have been friends since they were teenagers and have performed together almost as long. (Glenn Five joined the band in the mid-'90s.)

Does the fact that they're Jewish – Reiner's late father was a Holocaust survivor – play a part in their determination to make a go of it against impossible odds, even, as in the film, when things look as grim as they could possibly be? "It's not really on a conscious level," Ludlow said, "[but] when you're raised in that [Jewish] environment, you learn to be tenacious and go after the things you want in life and be relentless [in doing so]."

The impact of the movie, which allowed Anvil to return to the limelight, has allowed the two to jettison their non-musical jobs and concentrate solely on their music. "We've got too many things going on with the band now to keep a regular job," Ludlow said.

A 14th Anvil album, Juggernaut of Justice, will soon be out, as well. "It's already finished," Reiner said. "It just needs to be recorded."

And Ludlow has, with the help of a ghost writer, written a book, also called Anvil: The Story of Anvil, which can be ordered on Amazon.

Fans of Anvil will see the change in the band's fortunes reflected in their new disc. "It's definitely got a brightness to it that's never been there before," Ludlow said.

They also said that their current success is something they can appreciate in a way they might not been able to had they hit it big in their 20s. "At our age, it's not going to be squandered. It will be completely and utterly appreciated with every moment," Ludlow said.

He considers that their current good fortune was meant to be, using the Hebrew word bashert to explain that view. "That's how it really has felt right from the onset. It felt that all my trials and tribulations were necessary for this movie to ever have legs, so that's why I mean that it's meant to be."

TEL AVIV MARKS ITS 100th ANNIVERSARY

The first modern Israeli city, Tel Aviv, was founded on April 11, 1909. To mark its 100th anniversary, a wide array of centennial events are being planned, including outdoor festivals, art shows, sporting events, historic exhibitions and numerous community projects.

The city kicks off its centennial on April 4 with a Gala Opening at Rabin Square, featuring performances by top Israeli and international artists. A grand-scale 360-degree audiovisual display will surround the square, encompassing the crowd. Maestro Zubin Mehta will conduct the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and the Israeli Opera, two leading cultural institutions based in Tel Aviv-Yafo. For details, see the website www.tlv100.co.il.

THE BIBLE AND FILM: Currently on display at the Museum of Biblical Art in Manhattan is the exhibition Reel Religion: A Century of the Bible and Film, which probes the fascination the Bible has exerted over filmmakers from Cecil B. deMille to Martin Scorsese. The exhibition features 80 rare vintage movie posters reaching back to the dawn of film in 1898. A selection of original costumes worn by Hollywood screen stars and related film ephemera are also on view. 1865 Broadway at 61st St., by Columbus Circle. Until May 17.

BIRTHRIGHT ISRAEL BREAKS RECORDS: After nine days of open registration, more than 35,000 young North American Jews applied for only 8,000 available free, 10-day educational trips to Israel this spring and summer. While the number of spots has returned to a former high point, the number of eligible registrants for those spots has doubled.

Research indicates that the program, which started nine years ago, has become the most effective method to combat the alarming trend of young Jews becoming distant from their respective Jewish communities and from Israel. Many have described the Birthright Israel trip as a veritable new Jewish rite of passage.

"What a bittersweet achievement," says program spokesperson Gidi Mark. "We are taking as many participants this year as could ever be expected in this economy, but we're also at risk of leaving behind more than ever before. It's an extraordinary challenge." To meet the challenge, the Birthright Israel Foundation has launched a new fundraising campaign to help send more young Jews to Israel.

ISRAEL NOTES

• The Vatican has announced that the Pope will visit Israel from May 8 to 11. It will be Benedict XVI's first visit to Israel since accompanying Pope John Paul II there in 2000. The Pontiff is scheduled to tour the Western Wall and a variety of Christian and Jewish holy sites in the company of Israeli President Shimon Peres.

• A new exhibition highlighting the work of modern Israeli ceramic artists is on view at the Ha'aretz Museum in Tel Aviv. The fifth Israeli Ceramics Biennale presents the works of 57 artists influenced by new-age Israeli ceramics. It remains on view throughout May. www.eretz-museum.org.il

• Paper, a seemingly basic material that lends itself easily to many functions, is the focal point for a new exhibition at Ticho House in Jerusalem. The exhibition Paperworks presents works by contemporary artists such as Hilla Ben Ari, Yifat Bezalel, Jan Tichy, Shaul Zemach and Maya Zack, who use paper as the central or exclusive material, creating imaginary worlds imbued with new meaning.

• Israel's Hula Lake Park was named by BBC Wildlife Magazine as one of the most outstanding sites in the world for nature observation and photography. The park is home to millions of migrating cranes each winter.

Best friends sell underwear via online subscription service

By RITA POLIAKOV
Special to The CJN

Lori Sholzberg and Natalie Grunberg's business idea came from a trip to France.

Based on an afternoon in a French café and a look through an underwear drawer, the two friends developed Panty by Post, a Vancouver-based company that has been selling underwear online since last December.

"Basically, it all started in France, as most good things do," said Grunberg. "This summer I was there, in the south of France, sitting in a café, thinking about how beautiful people are there, how well they present themselves. It got me thinking, these people probably don't have granny panties."

Using the philosophy that beauty starts within, Grunberg had the idea to sell panties online and deliver them by mail – a subscription service for lingerie.

"I was really inspired by the French presentation, I was thinking... they look [good] on the outside, I bet their underwear is nice."

It took one e-mail to get Sholzberg, her friend and former university roommate, onboard.

"Lori and I were really excited about panties," Grunberg said. "As soon as we got home, we started planning the idea at the kitchen table."

For Sholzberg, the idea just sounded like fun.

"I was in the midst of moving to Vancouver. She e-mailed me from Paris... Right away, I said, 'Can I jump on board?'" she said.

"I think a lot of women are [interested in panties]. This makes me feel good about myself, and it's girly. I think we're both sort of... I don't want to use the term girly girls, but we like frilly and fun stuff."

The two friends first met at Bishop's University.

"It feels like we've known each other all our lives... We seem to just equal each other out... Natalie is a business partner and a best friend, but we're able to separate that," Sholzberg said.

During their first meeting, which took place in Sholzberg's kitchen, the two began looking for companies to partner with.

"We had the same sort of idea of what we were looking for – fun and frilly," Sholzberg said. She decided to look through her own underwear drawer and pick out her favourites. Eventually, she pulled out a pair made by Blush Lingerie, a family-owned company located in Montreal.

"It was a pair I had for years. They look brand new," she said, adding that the underwear was actually a gift from her husband when they were still engaged.

Natalie Grunberg, left, and Lori Sholzberg founded Panty by Post, a lingerie subscription, to help women feel fun, girly, and better about themselves.

The panties are bright red, with black bows on each hip and a heart in the centre. They are cute and frilly, but mostly, they are comfortable.

"I love the way they fit. Blush makes panties that don't cut in," she said. "[Panties] can cut into places that aren't flattering – they can make you feel worse. [Blush] has a cut based on the real woman."

And most importantly, Sholzberg's Blush underwear made her feel good.

"I like to dance in the living room in them sometimes – it makes me feel girlish," she said.

Having just moved to Vancouver from Montreal, Sholzberg also appreciated the connection to her old home.

"It was from Montreal, where I spent the better part of my life... It had a bit of an interest for me, it was close to home," she said.

The two partners chose to set up Panty by Post because it was something they could do while maintaining full-time jobs. Grunberg teaches grades 8 to 12 and Sholzberg works at Safe Teen, an organization that develops workshops for teenagers about violence and bullying.

"We wanted something that was transportable, unique and limitless in terms of opportunities... because it appeals to the whole world," she said, adding that they have had clients from as far as the United Kingdom and Sudan.

While customers can choose their own products through the website, Sholzberg and Grunberg also liked the element of surprise that a subscription business offered.

"Most people like the surprise. We're trying to bring back a nostalgic feeling," Sholzberg said.

Both Sholzberg and Grunberg see the underwear drawer as a kind of candy counter.

"It's an inexpensive treat," Grunberg said. "Everyone needs panties, like everyone needs toothpaste... Imagine pulling open the underwear drawer, you have different colours, different styles."

The company is also expanding into the bridal business with Something Blue and male underwear with Briefs in a Box.

"For men, it's a little bit more of a necessity than a decadence. We're going to look more on durability and sustainability."

As Panty by Post takes off, the business partners would like to give back to their community.

In February, they raised $12,000 for the Leukemia and Bone Marrow Transplant Program at Vancouver General Hospital at a benefit that featured jazz singer Diana Krall. The benefit raised a total of more than $2 million. The event was especially significant for Grunberg, whose father battled leukemia.

Panty by Post has also had a positive response from the Jewish community.

"[They're] loving it," Sholzberg said.

Sholzberg, whose mother was a Hebrew teacher, received a particularly good response from people after an article about Panty by Post was published in a Montreal newspaper.

"I got such feedback, we got lots of e-mail – the response in every department has been tremendous. For me, with the Jewish religion, there's always been a connection," she said.

Panty by Post's website address is www.pantybypost.com.

Broadcaster Martin Himel produces TV series on religious faith

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The collision of current events and religious faith has long intrigued Canadian broadcast journalist Martin Himel, who has been stationed in Israel since the early 1980s.

"I believe we are all driven by some sort of faith," he said. "I've covered world events for more than two decades, and I feel that faith is a universal theme intrinsic to all of us. I wanted to explore that common trait and see how it impacts various societies."

In pursuit of this theme, Himel has produced a 13-part documentary series for Vision TV. Twist of Faith, which had its debut on Feb. 23 and ends on June 1, examines a broad range of topics and issues, from the future of Judaism to Islam in China.

Joan Jenkinson, a Vision TV executive producer, believes that Himel's series strikes a contemporary note.

As she put it, "These are desperate times for many of us. We are seeing faith take ever more unusual and unexpected forms as people seek solid ground. While we commonly hear that religion is on the wane, Himel's extraordinary series illustrates the degree to which our world is still shaped by the power of belief – for good and ill."

Canadian journalist Martin Himel visited Asia to complete Twist of Faith.

Describing Twist of Faith as his most ambitious project to date, Himel said he has always been interested in the effect of religion on current affairs.

"You might remember that the religion of rebellion and activism in the 1970s was socialism, communism and radical anarchism. These were fervently held beliefs, just as militant Islam, fundamentalist Christianity and Judaism are upheld today as motivators for national movements."

He launched Twist of Faith in December 2007 through his Canadian company, Elsash Productions.

Vision TV, which financed the venture, was clearly impressed by his track record as a filmmaker. A former CTV news correspondent in Israel, Himel has made a succession of documentaries, some of which touch on the nature of faith.

In Angels with Broken Wings (2001) and North Korea: Desperate or Deceptive (2004), he respectively highlighted the plight of thousands of children locked in closed Russian psychoneurological hospital wards and explored the social, political and economic landscape of a totalitarian Asian society at odds with the United States.

Himel's documentary on Israel's reoccupation of the West Bank, Jenin: Massacring the Truth (2004), challenged the allegation that Israel had committed war crimes in attacking a Palestinian refugee camp from which suicide bombers set out.

His film on anti-Israel student movements on North American college campuses, Confrontation at Concordia (2003), documented the clash between Jewish and pro-Palestinian students at Montreal's Concordia University after a planned speaking engagement by Israel's former prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, was abruptly cancelled.

Himel's End of Days (2005) investigated the growing belief in apocalypse and redemption among evangelical Christians and messianic Jews.

For Twist of Faith, he travelled far and wide, visiting Canada, the United States, Kosovo, Serbia, Britain, Russia, China, India, Thailand, Ethiopia, South Africa and Turkey. He also reported from Israel, his home base, and the West Bank.

His travels took him off the beaten track.

Researching Hindu untouchables in India, Himel interviewed sewage workers. "The gases are overwhelming. I don't know how they last one day, let alone years working in the sewers. It didn't take two days before I was deathly sick. I hit the floor twice at Delhi's airport from the agonizing pain of severe stomach cramps, brought on by bacterial infection. It made me think how easy it is to die in those sewers."

Travelling through China's Gobi Desert, Himel was struck by the perception that Chinese mosques are "an elegant mixture" of pagoda temples and Arabian minarets.

Investigating Judaism, he was taken by its sheer adaptability and the passion of Israelis for their identity. "It is that passion which is so essential for Jews to be Jews."

Deep in the highlands of Ethiopia to study Ethiopian Christianity, he felt as if he had gone back in time.

Himel, 52, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto day schools, was raised in a secular Zionist household in Toronto. Although he is not an observant Jew, he values Jewish traditions and culture.

As a child, his parents divorced. His mother, Malka, a former Israeli, was a prominent Canadian folk singer and part of the Malka and Joso duo. His father, Sydney, was a lawyer and a member of Canada's basketball team in the first and second Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Himel gravitated toward journalism when he was a teenager. Don Cameron, a Canadian TV producer who had covered the war in Vietnam, visited the Himel household in suburban Toronto and regaled him with stories of the fall of Saigon in 1975. "I remember feeling, 'This is what I want to do.' I was smitten."

After graduating from high school, he studied economics and international relations at the Hebrew University. "I had always had a passion for Israel. Its vigour and zest were so appealing, but living in Israel, while rewarding, was very difficult."

Returning to Canada in 1978, Himel landed a position at CTV's Canada AM program. "Then I got a chance to work as a field producer for ABC TV in Israel, covering the prime minister, Menachem Begin."

Parlaying that opportunity into a gig as a freelance Mideast correspondent, Himel contributed reports to CTV, Global Television and Fox News.

From 1982 to 1993, as CTVs bureau chief and resident correspondent, he covered the breaking stories of the day, not only in Israel but in Europe as well.

"My most memorable stories were Israel's peace treaty with Egypt and Israel's phased withdrawals from the Sinai Peninsula, the first Palestinian uprising, the revolution in Romania and the Gulf War."

When CTV asked Himel to take another assignment, he declined. "After covering massive world events in the Middle East, all else paled in comparison," said Himel, who today contributes current events pieces to PBS and Dan Rather Reports. "I also had personal relationships that I wanted to preserve in Israel."

Himel switched to the Baton Broadcasting group after he was asked to set up an Israeli operation.

Eight years ago, he established Elsash Productions, which now enjoys a reputation for innovative in-depth reporting.

Himel, who has permanent residence status in Israel, lives with his wife in the northern Tel Aviv suburb of Herzliya Pituach.

"I have a lot of roots in Israel," said Himel, the father of two grown children and a Magen David Adom volunteer medic who worked on emergency teams during the 2006 war in Lebanon and the most recent war in the Gaza Strip. "I have a great passion for this place. It's a vibrant life, and I love the fact that the Mediterranean Sea is only a 10 minutes' walk from my house."

And while he finds Israeli politics "shamelessly corrupt" and the educational system "abhorrent," he likes Israelis.

"The people are terrific. It is hard to be lonely in Israel. Everybody makes your business their business. Sometimes, it is oppressive, but if you are in trouble, many people are willing to help.

"And there is always something real to talk about. It's never just, 'What did you buy in town today?'"

A charming history of the unassuming bagel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Can there be anything more quintessentially Jewish for breakfast than a toasted bagel – make it a sesame one, please – slathered with cottage cheese and lox? Not likely, unless you're on a strict diet or allergic to flour.

The bagel is so connected with culinary Jewish identity that few observers have bothered to investigate its provenance. But as Maria Balinska reminds us in The Bagel: The Surprising History of a Modest Bread (Yale University Press), the antecedents of the bagel may not be necessarily Jewish.

Maria Balinska

In this altogether charming and scholarly book, Balinska – an American whose ancestors are both Jewish and Polish Catholic – suggests that the bagel as we know it today may well have been preceded by the Polish bajgiel or obwarzanek, the Italian tarallo and the Chinese Muslim girde.

Balinska, who bit into her first bagel in the early 1980s when she was a university student, explores its historical trajectory at some length, but she focuses her inquiry on Poland, where the bagel was a favoured snack of both Jews and Christians of every class.

However, the bagel was principally produced by Jewish bakers and sold mainly by Jewish pedlars. By the 1930s, the bagel was "a Jewish product that was an integral part of Polish everyday life," she writes.

Having explored the status of the bagel in Poland, where it was popular tavern and street fare, Balinska moves on to the United States, where it has attained universal appeal thanks to the marketing skills of the Lender family.

As best as she can determine, the unassuming bagel arrived in America in the 1880s, when waves of Jewish immigrants, among them bakers, settled in New York City. According to Balinska, the craving for bagels was instrumental in the development of the Jewish labour movement in the United States.

Jewish bagel bakers on the Lower East Side worked under appalling conditions, as she observes: "The bakeries were located… down steep flights of stairs to a space rarely higher than seven feet. Because of the rudimentary ovens, the temperature was fierce and, on the whole, impossible to control. There was no ventilation. Bakers worked stripped to their waist for 13 or 14 hours a day, seven days a week.

"Typically young and unmarried, they often lived at their workplace sleeping between the mounds of rising dough and the oven with cats, rats and cockroaches…"

In response, the first Jewish bakers' union was formed in 1885. But it soon fell apart, says Balinska without explanation. "It would take a group of other workers to organize the bakers into something more lasting," she notes.

The muckraking press lobbied for better working and sanitary conditions, and the New York State Assembly got the message. In 1895, it passed a law hailed by reformers. Bakers were banned from sleeping in bakeries. Hours were regulated. Plumbing and drainage were introduced.

Interestingly enough, cats were allowed to remain in bakeries so that they could deal with rodents.

The legislation, backed with enforcement standards, was replicated by other states in the country.

But as Balinska points out, further improvements were necessary. In 1910, Jewish bakers won a nine-hour day.

The bakers' victory ushered in a period in which the Jewish labour movement came to play a leading role among American unions.

Yet bagel baking was impervious to "mechanical challenges" for a long time. The mark of a good baker was his ability to "roll" a bagel, a skilled and demanding function. Yet there was no machine capable of performing this all-important task.

This problem was resolved with the advent of the modern revolving oven, which also accelerated the rate at which bagels could be baked, she says. "It also meant that the bagel bakeries could, at last, move out of their dingy cellars."

A staple of Jewish households, the bagel shot into mainstream prominence when a major American magazine, the Saturday Evening Post, praised it in a 1958 piece. Look, another magazine, took notice in 1961, and McCalls, a competitor, followed suit two years later.

It was left to a Polish-born baker, Harry Lender, who landed in the United States in 1927, to popularize the bagel beyond anyone's imagination.

A true innovator, Lender froze his bagels and packaged them in polyethylene bags. Now the bagel could be sold in supermarkets. As Lender put it, "So we went from freezing as a convenience to us to a marketing tool for the consumer."

As Balinska says, this was a path-breaking development that revolutionized the industry. "Frozen food was becoming integral to American eating habits as more women worked outside the home, and the daily commute to the workplace put a premium on quickly-prepared meals."

Despite the changes, the bagel was still perceived by the majority of Americans as an ethnic specialty bread. Lender addressed this issue by trying to broaden its appeal.

"When most people call it a Jewish product, it hurts us," he said. "It's a roll, a roll with a personality. You can use it for breakfast, sandwiches, TV snacks, dinner rolls – from morning till evening. We don't talk of bagels, lox and cream cheese. It limits them. Think of toasted bagels and jam, if you like."

Lender's strategy proved successful. In the early 1970s, he snagged his first nation-wide food service contract with the Howard Johnson hotel and restaurant chain. By 1977, Lender bagels were available all across the nation.

Balinska says that the widespread acceptance of the bagel was rooted in timing.

"The market for bagels was expanding at a time when the cultural mood of the country was changing. It was not just that anti-Semitism had ceased to be respectable, or that the Jewish community was growing in confidence. There was also, more generally, a shift away from the homogeneity and standardization promoted in American popular culture …"

Thankfully, toward the end of her book, Balinska takes note of Montreal's famous bagels.

"To this day," she writes, "the city's two landmark bagel bakeries, the St. Viateur Bagel Shop and the Fairmount Bagel Bakery, continue to vie for Montreal's 'original bagel' crown."

Personally, I like the bagels from St. Viateur's wood-burning ovens. But who's to say that Fairmount bagels are inferior?

Any of them will do for breakfast, lunch or dinner, and I suspect that Balinska would agree.

Serving healthy snacks

By LISA WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

About Nutrition

Q. I need help with after-school snacks. I have three kids who all come home starving, and I find it a real struggle to serve healthy snacks that please and fill them.

A. I think there are three things that need to be considered at this time of day:

- What, how much and how well have they eaten so far today?
- When will they eat next? (Is dinner in one hour or four hours, and what will they be doing in the meantime – do they have an active program now?)
- What appeals to them?

Many kids come home having eaten very little all day. They had a small, usually rushed breakfast, say they didn't have enough time to finish their lunch, didn't have a recess snack because they couldn't eat it with gloves on or were too busy playing soccer (which is fine), but then they arrive home legitimately starving, and for many kids, not eating a decent snack at this time may lead to deteriorating behaviour later.

If your kids are like most, the last thing they eat in their lunch box is the fruit or vegetables, if they eat them at all, so, often, the kids haven't really eaten much that's healthy. In that case, a meal or mini-meal sometimes works best. If it's getting close to dinnertime, serving dinner right after school can be a great way to get a balanced, nutritious meal into kids and fill them up. If dinner is several hours away and/or there are sports activities first, a mini-meal may be appropriate rather than a snack – a sandwich, soup, wrap, salad, sushi, cereal, eggs, cheese and crackers, all better than chips, cookies and ice cream.

Next, consider what they like and jazz it up. A milkshake or fruit smoothy can be full of calcium and protein-rich milk, yogurt and frozen yogurt plus fruit, but looks delightfully appealing. A sundae with cut up banana, berries and frozen yogurt, and topped with chocolate sauce, has lots of nutrition, dressed up like dessert. For a chicken caesar (most kids like caesar salad and grilled chicken), you can put the salad in a wrap. Or try soup, hummus and pita, cereal, eggs and toast, grilled cheese, peanut butter and jam.

I find at my house that if I have cut up fruit or vegetables out on the counter between after school and dinner, it will disappear. If these are not out, the tendency can be to reach for cookies or other sweets. Having it ready and visible does seem to work for anything from sliced apples to berries, watermelon, grapes, peeled carrots, sliced peppers, cherry tomatoes.

Remember, too, that some of the best and most nutritious snacks can be last night's leftovers – chicken, pasta, stir-frys, chili, soups, etc. So make extra of family favourites that can be easily microwaved and enjoyed.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist in Toronto, in private practice and at the Genesis Professional Group. If you have any nutrition questions, please send them to The CJN.

Israel tied by Greece at home in World Cup qualifier

By DAVID MAROUANI and YANIV KUBOVICH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN — Israel's 1-1 draw against Greece Saturday is the latest development in a continuing, dubious tradition. Since defeating Austria 10 years ago in Ramat Gan by a 5-0 margin, Israel has not managed – regardless of who the coach or the players were – to defeat at home a single national team that is considered at least as good as or better than it is.

The picture is equally bleak abroad. Since joining Europe, Israel has never pulled off an upset on a better team's turf. And although the 3-2 historic win over France shocked the Old World, it was a meaningless game for Israel – similar to the 2-1 win at home over Russia a year and a half ago.

"The team's big problem during the tenure of [previous coaches Richard Moller] Nielsen, Avram Grant and [current coach] Dror Kashtan is that the players are afraid to attack during home matches," says former player Alon Mizrahi. "In my day and that of Eyal Berkovic, we weren't afraid of anyone, and we attacked like wild men at home. Take, for example, the way we crushed Austria. Today, the players, and especially the coaches, are afraid of losing, and because of this fear, they don't win."

Israel hit a low point in 2003 when it played to a draw in an away match against a weak Malta squad. The outcome caught Israeli fans off guard, but senior soccer officials were hardly surprised. Coach Grant had warned his players the night before to be careful.

"If we lose, no one will remember we played in Malta – only the defeat and the fact we lost to a team that is weaker than us," he said. "I always tell my players it's better to be safe than sorry."

It seems Grant did a good job of inculcating the players with this defeatist approach, which according to the new Israeli formula, equates a tie with a win. A sign of this attitude could be read into the words of Israeli footballer Dedi Ben Dayan, who said after the game Saturday: "I guarantee a draw in Greece, as well," as if that were something to be proud of.

"When an Israeli player says a draw is enough and we shouldn't be greedy," says Yehuda Shenhar, an expert on the mentality of winning, "it shows something about our culture. People are trying to lower expectations so as not to disappoint, instead of building expectations and meeting them."

Omer Golan's equalizer in the 55th minute temporarily restored the confidence among Kashtan's squad that they could defeat their athletic rival. Yossi Benayoun, who expected the goal to give a big boost to the spectators, found himself gesturing with his hands at the scarf-waving crowd several times, encouraging it to keep cheering. After several minutes Benayoun realized that no matter how much they yelled in the stands, he just couldn't hear them.

"The spectators don't create a 'home' atmosphere, and it's not because they don't want to," says one national team player. "It's a fact the tickets were sold out. The problem is the distance between the fans and the pitch. The feeling of matches in the league in stadiums like Teddy and Bloomfield is very different from Ramat Gan."

Fans say they would prefer to see the team play in venues where Israeli squads have done well against the European competition, such as the stadiums of Hapoel Tel Aviv and Maccabi Haifa. They note the last time Israel defeated Greece was in the Kiryat Eliezer stadium, 2-1 in the 1990s, when Alon Harazi scored the winning goal in extra time.

The Greeks – 2004 European Cup champions – certainly don't insist that all their national team games be played in their national stadium. Indeed, the teams will play their next game in a 26,000-seat stadium in Crete. If Greece is willing to do this and risk the ire of fans in Athens, would it not be worth it to move Israel's games to Bloomfield Stadium and increase the feeling of a home match?

"We have no problem moving the national team games to Bloomfield," says Nir Partzelina, the stadium's administrator. "It has just never come up for discussion."

It's time the subject came up for serious consideration.

Study links youth bodychecking with increased injuries

Compiled by CJN Staff

Bodychecking in youth hockey leagues in Canada, the United States and Finland is associated with an increased risk of injury to players, a study led by York University has found.

The study, a systematic review of published research from the three countries, appears in the March issue of the Clinical Journal of Sport Medicine. It found that bodychecking, a tactic designed to separate another player from the puck, was often cited as a leading cause of injuries across age levels and divisions of play in youth hockey leagues in all three countries.

The international review of research confirms the main finding of a York-led study from three years ago, namely, that bodychecking is hazardous to young hockey players, said Alison Macpherson, a professor in York's School of Kinesiology and Health Science.

"Nineteen of the 20 studies we looked at this time showed an increased risk of injuries when bodychecking was permitted, and some of these injuries were very serious," Macpherson said. "We reviewed nine studies from Canada, nine from the United States and two from Finland. And the findings from all but one support recommendations that children should play in non-contact hockey leagues until they are at least at the bantam level – 13 years of age."

Macpherson led the Canadian study published in 2006, working with co-author Andrew Howard, a staff orthopedic surgeon and director of the trauma program at the Hospital for Sick Children. They worked together again on the review of international research, along with Joel Warsh and Serban Constantin, both York students at the time of the study.

Some of the studies from Canada, the United States and Finland included leagues with players up to age 20, but the worst injuries were in young players.

"Fractures were the most common injuries, with most of the fractures occurring to those in checking leagues", said Howard. "Hockey is a high-energy sport and this creates a potential for fractures, which prevent return to play for a very long time or in rare cases are disabling. Equally important is the risk of concussion, with repeat or even single concussions causing loss of educational and workplace performance relative to one's peers."

Warsh, who has coached minor hockey, said children clearly love hockey, whether or not bodychecking is allowed. However, there is no need to put children into situations with an increased risk of injury and by removing bodychecking from the younger groups, the spike in injuries related to checking is likely to be reduced, he said.

Do we all have a little bully in us?

Sandie Benitah

When I was a little girl, I always felt like I had a sixth sense that let me actually feel another child's pain if they were being teased or if they were sent to the corner.

I was shy, quiet and obedient, but up until recently, I never thought for a minute that I could be considered a bully.

But now I realize that I kind of was one.

In childhood books, the bully was always drawn as a short pudgy boy with scraggly hair, missing teeth and narrow dark eyes. No wonder he never had any friends!

In high school, bullies were portrayed in movies as the coolest kids in school, the most popular people around. No wonder you didn't want to mess with them, either.

But I recently realized that I didn't have to be one of the "mean girls" to make someone feel bad.

Last week, I spent the afternoon with a beautiful young tween who is every friend's dream, because she's loyal, fun and brave. She's also every parent's biggest blessing, as she was mature enough to tell them about a young boy in class who was harassing her.

Her parents felt as if their hearts were breaking as they noticed the sadness in their daughter's eyes.

I tried to make them feel better by telling them what I know to be the truth: everyone experiences teasing in their lifetime, no matter how popular they are.

I told them stories of countless people I knew who were teased. There were the two Grade 5 girls who thought it would be fun to follow little-Grade-4-me around the playground repeating everything I said. There was the popular girl in class who the boys laughed at for having a big smile. There was the cutest boy in school who for a while was teased about possibly being gay.

But then I started remembering all the stupid pranks I participated in, such as ordering a pizza to someone else's house, or crank-calling a classmate I didn't like. My friends and I had a grand old time, and now I'm ashamed of it.

On the one hand, I can easily excuse myself for my childish antics, because I was just that – a child. But really, I have to ask myself what drove me – a shy, kind obedient kid – to ever be mean? Do we all have what it takes to be a bully?

Usually, when we think of a bully, we think of someone who is maladjusted or perhaps someone who was not shown love or taught empathy at home. But I think it's easy for any of us to be mean to each other when we forget to acknowledge each other as humans rather than just random people who make their way in and out of our lives.

And maybe that's the secret to dealing with bullies, too.

We will encounter bullies our entire life, not just at school, but at work or living in our neighbourhood. They are the people that make you learn the toughest life lesson – how to believe in yourself and how to look out for yourself.

But they are also there to remind us to be aware of our own actions and hurtful ways.

Can we deal with a bully without becoming a bully ourselves?

My special tween friend did.

Instead of making her bully look stupid in front of all his friends, she decided instead to speak with his parents in an effort to make him understand the consequences of his actions.

It's hard to try to look past someone's mean streak in an effort to find some kindness behind their tough exterior. But if we don't, we might just forget that we are all capable of being mean-spirited.

And a bully without self-consciousness is the scariest bully of all.

APPLE, ASIAN PEAR & TOASTED WALNUT CHAROSET

1 1/4 c walnut halves
1 Granny Smith apple, peeled, cored, cut into small cubes
1 Asian pear, peeled, cored, cut into small cubes
2 tblsp (or more) honey
3 tblsp sweet Passover wine
1 tsp finely grated orange peel
3/4 tsp ground cinnamon
Chopped fresh mint

Stir walnuts in heavy small skillet over medium heat until lightly browned and fragrant, about 5 min. Cool and chop nuts; place in medium bowl. Add apple, pear, wine, 2 tablespoons honey, orange peel, and cinnamon. Stir to blend, adding more honey, if desired. Can be made 4 hrs ahead. Let stand at room temperature. Toss to blend and drain before continuing. Sprinkle charoset with mint; serve.

About Life

Dear Ella,

This is the first year since Josh and I got married that I am making a seder in our home. Since my parents live out of town, I will have his parents, grandmother and brother over. I was really looking forward to this, as I have always been a guest at a seder and have never hosted my own.

My mother-in-law obviously has some trust issues with me. She doesn't believe I can handle this and is taking over. She has "suggested" the menu, she has told, not asked, me what she will bring. She insisted on buying my meat for me, because she knows how to pick the best cuts. I am feeling very overwhelmed and really wanted to take charge of this. The seder that I was so looking forward to has now become nothing but a burden and a source of stress for me. What can I do?

This is My Seder

Dear This is My Seder

It's time to turn the tables. Your mother-in-law, although well meaning, is used to being the balabuste, the head honcho, the matriarch. She has instinctively jumped in to help, as this is all she knows. This is a learning experience for her as well.

These are strange waters for both of you, so you need to tread lightly. Making a seder is a lot of work, and I am sure you can use a helping hand. However, the help you require is your decision. If you need help with cooking, shopping or the menu, that's your call to make, not hers.

You need to talk to her face to face, and if necessary, you should have your husband there as well. This is his mother, and he needs to be there as an emergency buffer for you.

I'm sure she doesn't have a clue that she has overstepped her boundaries. Tell her exactly what you wrote in this letter – that you have always been a guest at other seders and this is your first opportunity to make one in your own home. Tell her you would love her help, and assign duties to her – like "it would be a huge help if you could handle the chicken soup and matzah balls. I've got the brisket and chicken covered." This way she not only knows what her duties are, but that you have handled the other stuff as well.

I know you will have a wonderful seder together. Relax and enjoy. Chag Samayach.

URBAN WRITER

I have begun blogging. I am a blogger.

For those of you who don't know what blogging is, Wikipedia explains that a blog is a type of website, usually maintained by an individual, with regular entries of commentary, descriptions of events, or other material such as graphics or video. Entries are commonly displayed in reverse chronological order.

A blog is an interesting entity that shares commentary on news or any particular subject such as Torah scrolls in Jerusalem, cooking Jewish food in Thailand, or mini collies. Many blogs, such as my own, are personal diaries of thoughts and activities. A typical blog combines text, images and links to other blogs, Web pages and other media related to its topic.

The compelling thing about blogs is that they can be very interactive. By this I mean that readers are encouraged to read blog posts (articles, ideas, etc.) and comment on what they have read. In essence, a blog creates a thread of discussion, debate or storytelling on a given topic that can go on for pages. This is the talmudic aspect of blogging. (For more on this idea, read The Talmud and the Internet: A Journey Between Worlds, by Jonathan Rosen).

There are private, personal, corporate, thinking-media-type and genre blogs. As of December 2007, the blog search engine Technorati was tracking more than 112 million blogs.

Your blog can be updated on a daily, hourly or weekly basis. (Not surprisingly, according to the Huffington Post, which features a number of well-respected bloggers, of the more than 100 million blogs online, only 7.5 million have been updated in the last 90 days.)

My blog is called Avrum's Blog and can be found at http://avrum.net. It's a work in progress, but it's showing positive results, such as an average of 150 daily hits. I describe my blog as an online community where people can present wondrous ideas about slices of life, the spirit, being Jewish and activism.

I have written blog postings on topics such as Gilad Schalit: 1,000 days in Captivity; Jews: We Don't Stand up for Ourselves; A Call for a (Jewish) Community Mobilization Plan; Have you Ever Saved a Life?; Are Old People Sexy?, and On Being a Jewish Emissary.

In order to encourage a wider community of thought, I have invited guest writers to contribute, such as Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Toronto's Kehillat Shaarei Torah and president of the Vaad Haraboni of Toronto (the main body of local Orthodox rabbis).

I'm still discovering my blogging voice, but I'm already quite excited about having the opportunity to free associate through blogging and post ideas as they come to me. It's literally invigorating.

Give blogging a try. It's free. It will give you the chance to write (something many people want to do) and be heard, far and wide, about issues and ideas that interest you. Blogging gives you a voice as loud as anyone else's.

Blogging is quickly becoming the tool of choice for many writers and a must for anyone involved in business or social activism, or an individual or group committed to a concept, product, idea or approach to change. One blog I discovered is about kippot. Who would have known there are so many newfangled designs available?

If you want to read some blogs before diving in, type Bloglines, BlogScope, and Technorati into your search engines and discover a whole new world of writing possibilities.

Consider creating a blog for yourself. Write about the beauty of the Jewish people or about ways to fight anti-Semitism. Write about poetry, the thought that just came into your mind, immigration law, gardening or darning socks.

Blogging: it's a developing world that's bringing enormous change to media, thought and our way of life.

"FUNDRAISING FOR MOUNT SINAI SHOWED ME THAT I COULD HELP A PERSON IN NEED. I JUST NEVER THOUGHT IT WOULD BE MY DAUGHTER."

When I was in labour with my daughter, Samantha, there were some complications. The news got even worse when we found out she had health problems. The stress. The not knowing. We were worried. But the nurses were so comforting and reassuring. The care we received was excellent. I have been raising funds for Mount Sinai for years and I always imagined that I was helping other people. It's funny how it all comes back in the end. It's up to all of us to help each other.
